The experience of countries with advanced democracies – some of which such as Italy, suffer from dichotomies and traditional pockets of underdevelopment – teaches us that we have to pay greater attention to the contradictions and possible divergencies which result from new forms of specific marginalisation in advanced society.

History teaches us that democracy is a value which must be constantly nurtured if it is to survive, and that it requires a conscious and constant effort from everyone. It is essential that participation, while respecting diversity of status and expression, include in any case a genuine social dialogue, as ensured by tripartism. This too was mentioned by the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne.

Tripartite agreements are a customary procedure in Italy (right now we are negotiating a comprehensive tripartite agreement on labour costs). Similarly, for the Italian Government social dialogue is not only a sine qua non amongst political options, but also an objective to be perfected constantly at both the international and the national levels.

It is precisely in this field that the best results have been obtained at the community level, after the Maastricht agreement. This agreement, of course, leaves many problems unsolved, but it also extends the powers and the spheres of influence and responsibility of the EC in the social field. It thus also leaves spaces for social dialogue.

The experience of the Community as it faces new problems and obstacles on the path to integration such as the negative outcome of the Danish vote a few days ago proves that the transformations that we are witnessing also concern the West. It would be quite wrong to think that the Western democracies can remain unaffected by the major upheavals which are taking place at the moment. Economic interdependence and the common problems of energy and the environment do not leave room for any isolationist policies. The definition of new rules of behaviour is essential for the industrialised West in its relations with the rest of the world.

We are witnessing a host of changes and we have the duty to take upon ourselves new responsibilities, and not to export our errors. We must define instruments and ways and means of employing our energies and resources to defend human rights and combat all discrimination in whatever form it may take.

The rules of the ILO are an essential guide in directing international initiatives. We must consider the application of these rules a priority.

We believe the technical cooperation extended by the International Labour Office should be used to improve the application of the Organisation's basic rules and to foster social relations based on freedom and participation.

The Italian Government will continue to make its contribution in the way outlined, by cooperating in multilateral initiatives and by continuing and intensifying bilateral initiatives.

The recent law which authorises cooperation with the countries of central and eastern Europe, together with an older law concerning cooperation with developing countries, provide us with the appropriate tools to target our work to help develop the human resources and the specific strengths of each country.

In the framework of international cooperation, the Turin Centre has a decisive role to play. Italy will continue to support the Centre and the implementation of the long term development programme. As the Director-General's Report underlines, the Centre needs to change its programme and its structure and adapt it to the new needs in the fields of training.

Mr. DE VRIES (Minister for Social Affairs and Employment, Netherlands) – I would like to join my colleagues in offering my congratulations to the President on his election. May I also take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General on his Report.

Both the theme, democratisation and the ILO, and the content of the Report should provide excellent material for an interesting discussion.

Democracy, as we understand it in my country, would comprise a number of elements, such as control of policy-makers by the people, political equality, political freedoms, and majority decisions in cases of difference of opinion.

Today I should like to single out one question which the ILO is especially qualified to contribute to: this is the issue of political freedom. We all are familiar with the role of the ILO in upholding fundamental freedoms, like freedom of association and collective bargaining, and in encouraging democracy at national and intermediate levels. And when I talk about democracy at the intermediate level, I am of course referring to tripartism, a principle that is so dear to this Organisation.

Tripartism means that workers and employers should fully enjoy the opportunity to play an active part in democracy. The State also has a task to fulfil in tripartism. It is a good thing that these issues were discussed in the tripartite meeting in Brussels which the Director-General was kind enough to organise last April.

As we have learned from recent experience, political freedom is closely linked to economic freedom. In this context it is interesting to see that, the late Frederick von Hayek, the economist, has been vindicated to a certain extent in his absolute belief in the operation of the free market. His scepticism, expressed in works like the Road to serfdom, as to the ability of mankind, and especially of politics, to shape the economy has been proved right in industrialised countries as well as in countries in Central and Eastern Europe. This, however, in my conviction, is no justification for rejecting the concept of social justice as he does. As the Report of the Director-General states "...the law of the market cannot be the law of the jungle". In this respect we may draw some inspiration from last year's Papal Encyclical Centesimus Annus, in which the social doctrine of Rerum Novarum was reiterated and updated.

Centesimus Annus asserts the right of workers and employers to form associations to represent their interests.

This right of association is a natural human right that precedes the integration of man into political society. The key element inspiring this teaching is the role the State should play in the relationship between the social partners. On the one hand, it should act indirectly according to the principle of subsidiarity; on the other hand, it should intervene directly according to the principle of solidarity.

I would like to commend these two principles to the Organisation. In the first place, the part that the ILO can play in the field of solidarity is evident. It is deeply involved in technical cooperation in the world's poorest areas. As for subsidiarity, standard-setting by the ILO has, as a rule, respected the rights of individual members to choose their own way of implementing the principles laid down in the international labour Conventions.

In this context, it is interesting to note that the ratification record of new Conventions since 1975 has fallen lower than ever before. Some ascribe this negative development to the unduly detailed character of Conventions produced since that date. It is certain that before 1975 there were a number of broadly formulated Conventions, which have proved not to be too vague to be applied effectively.

Consequently, I urge that more respect should be paid to the principle of subsidiarity. In the European Communities I initiated a discussed on the notion of subsidiarity. Such a discussion might also be useful in the ILO.

One of the attractive features of ILO standard-setting is the obligation of governments, according to article 19 of the ILO Constitution, to bring Conventions before the competent authority for the enactment of legislation or other action. In this way, parliaments have been informed of the content of all Conventions and of the opinion of the government on them, even if governments do not have the intention to ratify them. In this way, the fathers of the ILO Constitution attempted to ensure that parliaments would be fully informed about international labour Conventions. Its intention is to ensure that the public at large is also informed, an essential contribution to democracy.

In this context I trust that developments in the European Communities, tending to a certain EC competence in this respect, will allow for a continuation of this democratic ILO tradition.

Finally, I would like to conclude on a positive note. As you know, the Netherlands has always considered industrial democracy to be an important element of democracy in general. Consequently, we have an extensive system of information and consultation of workers at the enterprise level. I am pleased to be able to inform you that we will shortly be ratifying the additional protocol to the European Social Charter of the Council of Europe. On this ratification, the first international instrument that embodies the principle of information and consultation at the enterprise level will enter into force.

Miss SIMPSON (Minister of Labour, Welfare and Sport, Jamaica) – On behalf of the Jamaican delegation, I take tremendous pleasure in extending very warm congratulations to the President and the Vice-Presidents on being elected to preside over the deliberations of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that under the President's leadership, assisted as he will be by his very able Vice-Presidents, this Conference will benefit our peoples.

My delegation views the Director-General's Report to this year's Conference as a remarkable declaration of faith in the invincibility of the human spirit. On every page of the Report, the absorbed reader, by the inward stretch of the intellect and the outward reach of the imagination, shares in the recent stuggle of the greater portion of humankind not only for freedom in all its diversity, but also for the full development of the human personality. We salute the Director-General for his effort in producing a brilliant Report, that gives a sense of place and purpose to humanity the world over.

Democracy and the deepening of the democratic process have always been on the agenda of concerns of the people of Jamaica. The notion of freedom that underpins democracy has always been viewed by us as the only reliable path for the survival in dignity of a region of the world whose history chronicles the exploitation of labour, the psychic violence of racism, and social and economic marginalisation. It is for this reason that my delegation views the theme of this year's Report to the Conference with such admiration and satisfaction.

Situated as we are in the Caribbean basin, we are strategically placed to observe, analyse and conclude that change in the global order has proceeded at a rapid pace, and has had profound effects on all aspects of life of the peoples in the industrialised countries, developing countries and former socialist countries. These changes have been even more dramatic in the last five years.

The cold war is now behind us. In its place has developed one military superpower, instead of a world order which was previously based on two world superpowers striving for allegiance and support of countries in the developed and developing world. Economic power has now been more evenly spread amongst a number of highly industrialised countries. An era of world peace is now with us.

The last two decades have seen an increasing movement towards regional economic groupings. In all of this, democracy as a form of political organisation, the recognition of human rights and the extension of individual freedoms have largely superseded the dictatorships and repressive regimes which were so widespread just over 5 years ago. In these areas, great satisfaction must be expressed at the accomplishments of peoples all over the world.

We wish, on the basis of the suggestions contained in the Director-General's Report, to suggest that we should waste no time fighting the past. The challenge confronting us now, as we see it, is to build the future.

Again, the Report points us in the right direction. "No effort", says the Director-General, "must therefore be spared to prevent the hopes born of political liberalisation from being frustrated by upheavals in the economy".

My delegation wishes to encourage fellow delegates to concentrate on arriving at a framework, out of which can emerge a clear direction that leads towards greater economic democracy, where the political ideals of democracy are incorporated into the sphere of economic endeavours, efforts and activities.

The democratisation of the way in which the global economic system works must reinforce the virtues of a set of principles based on liberty and equality. Economic democracy in this regard means a particular approach to economic development, one that preserves the national integrity of society and recognises and surmounts the external conditions imposed by historical factors and political geography. While there can be no eternal blueprint there must be a consistent set of values that radiate in our thinking.

Furthermore, economic democracy will foster the acquisition of real worth by all citizens, and particularly by those who are currently without any economic resources. What has led to the crisis of governance in the world political system today is the feeling of the mass of the population in the world that they have been deprived and wronged by economic systems that have failed to function in their interests, and that they play no part in the decision-making process. To transform this negative attitude we need clearly to make the values of democracy more universal.

We are happy to note that the International Labour Organisation is committed to concentrating more explicitly on supporting the establishment of more open and just societies. Jamaica has benefited tremendously from the Organisation over many years and I wish to put on record the gratitude of the Government and people of Jamaica for past and continued assistance in the development of our public institutions.

My country is firmly committed to the pursuit of the good government of society in all its dimensions – political, technical and institutional. For us, governance has come to mean the capacity to exercise authority, solve problems, resolve conflicts and implement programmes and policies.

With the rise of open market economies and the advance of pluralist political systems throughout the world, the only winning strategy will be the establishment of an environment that complements these mega-trends by establishing an enabling environment for both the public and private sectors, by strengthening key institutions to ensure concern for social equity, commitment to the rule of law and a committed political consensus.

This Conference is very important to us. Like so many other countries represented here, our struggle to deepen our democratic process is not perfect in every way. But it is precisely because what is not perfect has the potential to become better that we have chosen to have a presence at this Conference in order to match our words and our thoughts and our knowledge with the actions that are proper to the situation and circumstances of the day.

We salute the International Labour Organisation in its effort to promote democracy around the world and stand committed to support any activity that the Organisation may pursue to this end.

Long may democracy prevail. May the democratic process deepen and the peoples of the free world be ultimate victors, whether or not they occupy the seat of power in the days that lie ahead.

Original – Bulgarian: Mr. VANOV (Minister for Labour and Social Affairs, Bulgaria) – Allow me to congratulate the President on his election to this position of responsibility and, through him, to wish a fruitful debate to the participations in the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

At the outset of my statement, I would like to stress the great importance which the Republic of Bulgaria attaches to its relations with the International Labour Organisation. Mindful of the leading position of this Organisation in international relations concerning social problems, we are convinced that the expansion of technical cooperation and a still more active share in its overall activity will contribute to the progress of our country.

There can hardly be a more timely topic for discussion by this august body than the issues raised in the Director-General's Report, which are of the greatest importance to the international community at large, and to my country in particular.

The principal object which the people and Government of the Republic of Bulgaria have set themselves at this stage is to build a democratic society and make the transition to a market-oriented economy. The general and local elections, held in October 1991, and the presidential elections in January 1992, marked a crucial stage in this peaceful transition. As a result, new legislative and executive bodies were elected at all levels and the first Government, consisting entirely of representatives of the Union of Democratic Forces, was formed.

Admittedly the transition to parliamentary democracy and the market economy has proved considerably harder than expected at the outset. Nevertheless, in the past six or seven months we have achieved a great deal in the implementation of comprehensive reforms in social and labour relations.

The Union of Democratic Forces, as a ruling coalition, is concentrating its efforts on the creation of a legal framework for the market economy and the consolidation of democratic institutions. The incumbent National Assembly has speeded up its work on the codification of the processes of privatisation and restitution of foreign investment and the restoration of agricultural land to its former owners. We view these processes as a key element of the reform. I should say here that, in carrying out the legislative reform in the area of ownership, we proceed from the understanding that privatisation should combine economic expediency with social justice. This principle underlies the legislative acts regulating the economic reform. A number of bills will be voted into law to regulate labour relations, employment, social security, social assistance and so forth.

Along with legislative measures, a number of steps have been taken towards practical implementation of the reform. Among them I would particularly single out the anti-inflationary measures, the measures to stabilise the balance of payments and to restructure manufacturing industries in line with the requirements of the market. The transition to a market economy, which is the main objective at this stage in the economic and social development of the Republic of Bulgaria, is accompanied by difficulties.

The contraction of traditional markets as a result of these factors has had an extremely adverse effect on manufacturing activity which was, in any case, severely depressed by the policy of financial austerity which the Government is compelled to implement. In turn, this has led to deep cuts in personal incomes and to considerable unemployment and has forced the Government to make structural and personnel changes in its composition in order to reactivate the reforms. The urgent need to speed up the economic reform has prompted the present Government to seek ways of revising the approach to social dialogue and its organisation. The idea behind a streamlined organisation of social dialogue is to achieve effective results conducive to an acceleration of the economic reform. Significantly, there is a public consensus that the promotion of tripartite partnership is one of the key factors in a radical replacement of the system in conditions of sustained social peace.

The Government of the Republic of Bulgaria is convinced that the more points of convergence are identified, the more feasible it will be for labour relations to turn into a constructive factor for social development. Problems can be resolved more quickly and at a lower social price when the social partners are engaged in a sustained dialogue and labour relations are based on a well-considered and carefully weighed cooperation rather than on methods of dispute and pressure. The difficulties in the selection and construction of an adequate model of labour relations arise precisely from the key characteristics of the workers' and the employers' organisations in the country, as appropriately reflected in the Report of the Director-General and in the discussion paper submitted by the International Labour Office at the symposium on tripartism, held in Brussels in April 1992. The Government takes a positive view of the joint conclusions adopted by the International Organisation of Employers and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions during this symposium. The Government furthermore agrees that employers and trade unions should pursue their own dialogue so as to reduce the dependence on central Government. Along with that, we do not deny the need for tripartite consultations and cooperation. In corroboration, I would like to indicate that the Rules of Procedure of the National System of Social Partnership were adopted only days ago. The range of topics covered is rather wide, extending to labour legislation, social security and living standards, labour and social disputes, collective bargaining, structure of consumption, wages, level of employment and stabilisation of the country's socio-economic situation. The guidelines and organisation of this cooperation were worked out to take into account the new realities in the country and the fundamental provisions of the instruments of the International Labour Organisation. This is a decisive step in democratising industrial relations based on autonomy of the parties, pluralism and participation in decisions that affect them.

In conclusion, I would like to point out that the treatment in the Report of fundamental human rights and the protection provided by international labour standards, freedom of association and non-discrimination in employment are of particular interest to us. In this connection, we are to carry out joint activities with the International Labour Office. In the autumn of this year we will hold a workshop on these matters together with the International Labour Standards Department. We are aware of the importance of this and it gives us reason to declare our support for the policy of the International Labour Organisation of closely linking technical cooperation with fundamental international standards in the area of human rights.

As is known, the Republic of Bulgaria was admitted to membership in the Council of Europe on 7 May 1992 and negotiations have already started on the country's association with the European Communities. On this basis, the gradual integration of the Republic of Bulgaria with the social and economic structures of Western Europe may confront us with problems which pose a challenge to unifying Europe now. We must not forget that these are problems of the day and that they require concerted efforts to overcome them quickly. To this end, we need help in the form of technical cooperation aimed at successful implementation of our legislative reform, at training the social partners and particularly the employers. The idea is to overcome the dividing lines between us, so that we can join the international social dialogue and work for the fulfilment of the tasks which the ILO has set itself in its Constitution and which are specified in international labour standards.

Original – Spanish: Mr. GONZALEZ DUBON (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, El Salvador) – I should like to express the pleasure of my delegation at the President's election to chair this session of the Conference and extend these congratulations to the Vice-Presidents. I should also like to express my appreciation to the Director-General for the task he is accomplishing at the head of our Organisation which is reflected in his Report, and extend a friendly greeting to the distinguished delegations, new Members, observers and special guests.

The programme of the Government of El Salvador has four goals: peace, democracy, economic development and priority in the social sector to combating poverty. We conceive of peace in the political sense, not as an end but as a means, forming part of a process of consensus enabling all Salvadorean people to achieve reconciliation within society.

President Cristiani in his inaugural message of 1 June 1989 said that he was ready to work, from the first day of Government, for peace, taking care not to undermine in any way the institutional framework.

Progress has been slow, but sure. The first meeting between the Government and the FMLN was held in Mexico City in September 1989. This led to the Final Peace Agreements, setting out the conceptual framework for the negotiations and establishing rules of procedure. The second meeting between the parties took place in San José, Costa Rica, in October 1989 when the Government proposed that from that time on hostilities should cease immediately and the members of the FMLN should be integrated into the peaceful and democratic life of the country, facilitating the establishment of the FMLN as a political party. Under the agreement signed in San José, it was made clear that there was a need to achieve agreement on the cessation of armed conflict, the respect of the rights of the civilian population and a timetable for the cessation of hostilities.

In the Palais des Nations at Geneva, right here where we are meeting now, the United Nations agreed to use its good offices and conclude, together with both parties, an agreement, which was signed on 4 April 1990. The intention of this process of negotiation was to end hostilities by political means and promote democratisation of the country, guarantee full respect for human rights and reunify the society of San Salvador, and no unilateral abandonment of negotiations.

Further to this, an agreement was signed in Caracas on 21 May 1990, establishing a general agenda and a timetable for the negotiations.

The first positive result of all this preliminary phase was the Agreement on Human Rights, signed on 26 July 1990 in San José, Costa Rica. This was followed by the agreement of 27 April 1991 signed in Mexico, setting out fundamental reforms of the Constitution in the fields of human rights, the electoral system, the judicial system and the armed forces. These unique constitutional reforms, without precedent in the institutional life of a republican system have already been ratified by the Legislative Assembly.

As regards human rights, the Office of Attorney for the Defence of Human Rights has been created, with the task of ensuring that these rights are respected and guaranteed and of initiating investigations into any violations which may occur. As concerns the electoral system, the body responsible for the enforcement of the law in this respect has been upgraded to the status of a supreme electoral court comprising five judges from different institutes, of different shades of political opinion. In the political field, the FMLN has been allowed to become a legal political party. In the area of administration of justice, a National Council of the Judiciary has been set up as a body independent of the judicial system. But the most far-reaching reforms have been in relation to the armed forces. The Treasury Police, the national guard and military institutions have disappeared and have been replaced by two new bodies – the Academy for Public Security and the National Civil Police.

The final phase of the peace process has been taking place as follows. In September 1991, at the United Nations headquarters at New York, the National Commission for the Consolidation of Peace (COPAZ) was set up, to be responsible for supervising the implementation of all the political agreements in conjunction with ONUSAL, the United Nations observation mission. You will recall how, at the last minute on 31 December last, the Agreement of New York was signed providing for the signing of the final agreements on 16 January and putting an end to hostilities on 1 February. The final push in both cases was given by President Cristiani himself.

The agreements are being implemented. On 16 January the peace agreement – or Chapultepec agreement – was signed. On 1 February, the cessation of hostilities or cease-fire began and COPAZ was formally set up with representatives of all political parties, the Government and the FMLN. Recently, a forum for economic and social consultation was set up, and is a tripartite body, as encouraged by the ILO.

The aim of the forum will be to create a new society, and encourage the signing of a package of agreements to help improve the country's social and economic development in the interests of all people of El Salvador.

The Government has given the forum the priority task of revising labour laws to promote and maintain a climate of harmony in industrial relations without detriment to the unemployed sectors and the public in general in a social market economy. We hope that very shortly we shall have modern labour laws which benefit producers and consumers.

It is appropriate on this occasion to announce too that the Government of El Salvador, through the Ministry of Labour, has carried out the necessary studies with a view to proposing to the legislative Assembly the ratification of all ILO Conventions laying down standards for the protection of women and young persons in employment.

As concerns wage policy in the private sector, for the third successive year the minimum wage has been increased for industry, commerce and services. This increase took place with the tripartite consensus from the private sector, workers and the Government in the national minimum wage council and amounts to a 15 per cent increase.

Within the general framework of the whole process of the institutional modernisation of labour legislation, supplementing the modern labour code which emerged from the forum for consultation, will have a new organic act, drawing by the Ministry of Labour covering the new institutions of the Ministry. We will also be presenting a Bill on apprenticeship, skilfully regulating the training and protection of young apprentices. And in the field of vocational training a national system and a national council for vocational training will be set up. The council will be a tripartite body to lay down standards and guidelines for all policy covering skilled and semi-skilled workers, thus satisfying the demands of modern industrial retraining to aid economic and social development.

The choice of Democratisation and the ILO as the subject of this session of the Conference, has given my delegation the opportunity to tell you about the progress made in the process of peace and democratisation in El Salvador, prerequisites of a society based on the rule of law, which respects social justice and the humanisation of the Salvadorian people. There cannot be social peace without democracy, nor political democracy without economic democracy. I should like to close by mentioning the speech made by President Cristiani at the 33rd Annual Meeting of the Board of Governors of the Inter-American Development Bank at Santo Domingo. He said that there would be major reforms in the social sectors and an integrated policy drawn up, since he could not conceive of education without health, health without nutrition, nutrition without housing, housing without work, work without welfare provision, welfare provision without development and a strengthening of the family, and effective protection of the environment.

Mr. COOK (Minister for Industrial Relations, Australia) – First, let me congratulate the President on his election to preside over this session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that, under his guidance, the Conference will achieve constructive progress in relation to the many important items on its agenda.

I am particularly pleased to announce that, today, the Australian Government will lodge its ratification of three maritime Conventions with the Director-General. This brings the number of ILO Conventions ratified by Australia to 51. It is anticipated that, over the next 18 months, Australia will be ratifying more Conventions. These should include the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141) and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) which would complete our ratification of all the ILO's basic human rights Conventions. Australia has a federal system of government. Therefore, the strong commitment to Convention ratification reflects not only the view of the federal Government, but also the views of our State and Territory governments as well. We believe that the Conventions are fundamental to establishing and protecting minimum standards of employment and encouraging adoption of such standards internationally.

Last year at the Asian Regional Conference I announced a substantial increase in Australia's assistance effort to the ILO in this region. Our programme is designed to help implement international labour standards in the region and to provide the ILO with a flexible "quick response" capacity to meet areas of emerging need. Australia, with the full support of our social partners, will be active in seeking out further opportunities to contribute to the ILO's work in the field.

I welcome this opportunity to speak on issues raised by the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO. In this forum last year and in my speech to the ILO Eleventh Asian Regional Conference last December, I stressed the need for reform of the International Labour Organisation – so that the Organisation can contribute more effectively to improving international labour standards and social conditions during an era of momentous political change.

As the Director-General emphasises in his Report, the trend towards democracy and the associated liberalisation of markets may entail substantial short-term economic and social costs. Consistent with its mandate, the ILO must respond with all possible speed and effort to help fragile democracies deal with this challenge. It is important, however, that the ILO's efforts in this area be prioritised to ensure that its vitally important role in assisting the implementation of fundamental labour standards in developing countries is not diminished

We must be realistic about where the ILO's activities can have maximum impact. The ILO can only work effectively in a member State where there is reasonable political stability and at least a broad consensus about what must be done and how it might be achieved. The task may be too great for any one agency, even on matters falling squarely within its mandate. The ILO must therefore continue to develop strong links with other UN agencies and bodies such as the IMF and the World Bank so that a properly co-ordinated effort can be pursued.

The Australian Government believes that, to promote and sustain socially responsible development in line with democratic principles, the ILO should aim at the objectives of: securing recognition of fundamental human rights by the new democracies including through the implementation of international labour standards; encouraging dialogue between governments and the social partners to build the consensus needed to develop economies which reflect broad social, and not merely economic, goals; helping strengthen national institutions which enable effective and free dialogue; equipping itself to provide the help its constituents need to face these challenges.

Respect for fundamental human rights and social justice are the values which guide the ILO. The great changes taking place around the world pose serious threats to the achievement of these objectives. The ILO must continue to ensure that the implementation of its labour standards is the foundation for socially responsible development.

It must therefore be able to respond to requests quickly and with authority. Its priorities must be in harmony with - and have the effective agreement of - the great majority of its membership.

At the regional level, more emphasis should be placed on tripartite consultation to identify areas of priority need and action. This means that the ILO's constituents must have better information on organisational priorities, resource constraints and evaluation of current activities. At the national level, strong institutional structures are needed to plan and implement adjustment policies and programmes.

The ILO is right to allocate substantial resources and effort to assist the development of employer associations and trade unions, because the social partners must be independent, representative and well-informed if they are to speak authoritatively for their members. It is also right to recognise the important role of labour ministries within governments in shaping economic and social policy.

The Director-General's preliminary Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 provide the opportunity by which the ILO can make itself better equipped to support its constituents. The International Labour Office now has the task of translating the proposals into a concrete programme of action. Full advantage must be taken of this key opportunity to implement reforms. The approach must be bold and exhaustive. We do not want to be disappointed with the outcome.

While the basic structure of the ILO's major technical and support programmes must be maintained, each needs to be examined afresh to ensure that it reflects current priorities, justifies the resources it has received and operates practically and effectively. In many cases major changes will be required within programmes to make way for new priorities.

The Australian Government supports changes in the structure of the International Labour Office to provide a stronger capability to manage operational activities and to provide rapid effective advisory services at the area and regional office level. But, moving scarce resources to the field has to be balanced against the need to maintain a strong central focus in information gathering, analysis, policy advice, programme formulation and evaluation across all the areas within the ILO's mandate.

The Programme and Budget for 1994-95 will mark an important milestone in the reform of the ILO. The change in direction which is envisaged by the Director-General's proposal will take several years to accomplish. It will require a strong, constant commitment to reform by all of the ILO's constituents. Against this background, I wish to put forward some more specific reform ideas on behalf of the Australian Government.

Some of these ideas are already on the agenda of other ILO participants. All of them would strengthen the ILO's role in helping democracy progress and assisting member States in other ways.

First, the Australian Government considers that a review of international labour standards is now critical to ensure their continuing relevance. This review should cover the development of new standards and the rate at which they are adopted, the revision of older standards and the most appropriate supervisory and reporting procedures. Current reporting arrangements are creating real strains. Many member States, including Australia, have voiced their concern that the workload is becoming unmanageable. It is not enough to discuss strategies and review progress once every four years at the ILO's Regional Conference.

One approach to better consultation would be to establish tripartite advisory groups. These could meet ILO staff during each Conference to examine programmes at the country and regional level, resource levels and evaluation of performance against objectives.

The way the Governing Body and its Committees function needs to be reviewed. The time consumed is very high, six to eight weeks per year. The cost is also very high, 14.6 million dollars in the current biennium.

Finally, a steering and coordination mechanism is needed to ensure control and guidance for the process of reform. Though this is a role the Governing Body itself could undertake, it may be more practicable for the Officers of the Governing Body to take up this responsibility.

In conclusion, the Australian Government supports the Director-General's efforts to reform the ILO to improve its effectiveness and relevance. We continue to stand ready to assist this process in any way we can. We urge our fellow ILO constituents to join us in this cause.

Original - Portuguese: Mr. TORRES COUTO (Workers' delegate, Portugal) - Mr. President, I should like firstly to greet you warmly, and pay tribute to a citizen who never forgets social concerns. As a Portuguese it is a great pleasure for me to see that this Conference is being led by a compatriot who has played a very important role in the life of our country. It is a great pleasure, therefore, for me to address this Conference, as it is presided by a friend, and a person who is widely respected in my country.

I should like to stress the importance of the Report of the Director-General; it eloquently describes the progress of democracy in different regions of the world and the role and activities of the ILO in this field.

I should like to acknowledge the excellence of the Report of the Director-General in so far as he calls our attention to the fact that the liberalisation of markets can cause inflation and unemployment. The strengthening of democracy and freedom means that the right to well-being should also become a reality and this requires greater solidarity.

The message which I bring you on behalf of Portuguese workers is a message of concern, of hope and of solidarity.

We are concerned with the state of the world and with the suffering and horror experienced by millions and millions of men and women, whose civil rights and dignity are still violated and frustrated daily. Peace and harmonious progress cannot be built while the differences between North and South, between rich and poor, between the free and the oppressed persist. We are concerned with the martyrdom of the peoples and workers of Africa, Latin America and many regions of Asia. We are also concerned with the situation in central and eastern Europe. War and barbarity are turning back the clock in Europe. The threat of death and hunger weighs heavily today on millions and millions of Europeans.

The world needs to take a new stance. All the goodwill and all technical and material means must be mobilised so that wars will be replaced by peace, so that work will replace unemployment, so that harmonious economic and social development will eradicate hunger, misery and the degradation of natural resources so that freedom and democracy will replace oppression and the violation of human rights, and so that freedom of association and social justice will eliminate the exploitation of men and inequality.

This Conference is concerned with two serious problems of our day and age: the prevention of industrial disasters and the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer.

In the first case, the entire underlying philosophy behind the organisation of economy is being questioned. The economy should serve man without attacking nature. Man should be the subject and the receiver of economic activities and must not be sacrificed to them. The instruments which are to be adopted should guarantee that priority is given to prevention by identifying and eliminating the causes. Industrial disasters are rarely unavoidable. The wealthiest and most developed countries and large multinational groups should be required to foot the bill for changes which may be needed.

In the second case, that of workers' claims, it is vital to understand that the interest of any man or woman are always less well defended than those of an enterprise, organisation or the State. For workers, the loss of their claims may mean hunger, misery and despair for their families.

In Portugal we are unfortunately witnessing greater numbers of bankrupcies and the closing down of companies. Workers feel vulnerable: employment is becoming more precarious and unemployment is growing. Even in the public service, thousands of workers fear for their jobs. The threat of social problems hangs over the heads of tens of thousands of workers and their families. It is essential that workers' claims should enjoy a higher privilege than those of the State, social security or any other privileged claim. But we must go further: a wage guarantee fund to ensure that workers in all events always receive wages due and compensation for dismissal should be set up by company contributions in every country.

I said previously that the message that I bring to this Conference is one of hope and solidarity.

There are clear signs which encourage the hope of a better world. Dictators are falling, countries are becoming more democratic, apartheid seems to be reaching its end, and some African countries, such as Angola are tasting peace. The need for military investment is falling and the resources thus freed can be transferred towards peace, democracy and the building of a new, more just, international order.

However, for this hope to become reality, solidarity must be encouraged. Silence in the face of the violation of human rights, indifference in the face of hunger, misery and suffering, are not compatible with humanist ethics which must guide humanity at the end of this century.

I should like to take this opportunity to call the attention of the international community and of this Conference once again to the systematic violation of human rights and trade union rights which has been affecting people for more than one decade, victimising thousands of workers in a genocide which culminated in November in the cemetery of Santa Cruz. I refer, of course, to the murder of the Maubere people, and I hope that this Conference will condemn these events and show its solidarity for East Timor. Only with solidarity can we build a better future...

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The Indonesian delegation wishes to raise a point of order.

Mr. PASARIBU (Workers' adviser, Indonesia) – The Workers' delegate of Portugal has strayed from the topic under discussion, that is, the Report of the Director-General, Democratisation and the ILO. Moreover, this august body is not supposed to deal with political questions, which fall within the competence of the relevant United Nations bodies.

I therefore request you, Mr. President, under Article 14 of the Standing Orders, to direct the speaker to confine his remarks to the subject under discussion.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – It is impossible to call to order a delegate who has already finished his presentation.

I now give the floor to Mr. Tsolmon, Minister of Labour, Mongolia.

Mr. TSOLMON (Minister of Labour, Mongolia) – On behalf of the Mongolian delegation and or my own behalf, I wish to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the Chair of this Conference. We are confident that under his able leadership this Conference will come to a successful conclusion. I would like also to extend our congratulations to the Vice-Presidents on their election.

May I also address our thanks to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and his staff, and express appreciation for the valuable Report they have prepared. The historic developments we have witnessed over the past few years make the choice of the Report's theme, Democratisation and the ILO, very timely and appropriate. This confirms the fact that the International Labour Organisation is playing a significant role with regard to the developments occurring in the world.

As the Report rightly points out, "democratisation is nearly always accompanied by a change of economic system or (...) by a challenge to the role of the State in economic matters". Proof of this is the developments that have taken place in my country over the past two years. During the process of democratisation of our society, the Government has implemented economic reforms directed towards the transition from a centrally planned economy to a market economy. During this period we have undertaken a number of measures aimed at the privatisation of state property and the liberalisation of prices and foreign trade. Much attention has been paid to laying down the legal basis for market relations. A number of Bills have been drawn up and passed by Parliament.

Today, the privatisation process in my country has gained full momentum. The first state of privatisation, covering small enterprises, shops and restaurants, has been completed. Over 60 per cent of small and medium-scale enterprises and 40 per cent of large-scale enterprises have already been privatised. As a result, the role and impact of the private sector in the national economy is increasing rapidly. Apart from the privatisation fo state-owned enterprises, policies are being pursued to support newly emerged private enterprises and assist them in moving towards market relations.

However, in the process of restructuring the economy and privatisation new problems are arising in the field of labour and social security. One of the most important problems today is that of employment. Unemployment, in particular among young people and women, is continuing to increase considerably. Because of the limited investments in creating employment, the Government is paying considerable attention to promoting self-employment and small businesses. The reforms carried on in the field of labour call for closer cooperation between the Government and its social partners in order to address labour-related issues together and to develop sound industrial relations.

At the beginning of this year we set up a tripartite commission to regulate social and labour relations. We have also concluded a general agreement between the Government, trade unions and employers. In this context, we fully support the idea that the ILO should play a prominent role in encouraging tripartite cooperation within its member States in order that the market economy be more effective.

Turning to the issues which are on the agenda of this session of the Conference, I would like to express our satisfaction and to stress that the ILO, faithful to its tradition, has not failed to place on it such issues as the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, adjustment and human resources development and the prevention of industrial disasters. These issues, fully in line with the ILO's mandate and noble concerns, are directly related to the problems being raised by the profound and rapid changes in the world.

My delegation supports the adoption by the Conference of the Convention and Recommendation aimed at protecting workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. For countries with small populations, like Mongolia, the development of human resources is of utmost interest and importance.

In order to overcome the changes in the structure of labour markets we do not need to improve the training system to make it more flexible and capable of responding more promptly to the new demands of the occupational environment.

We are also paying special attention to the issue of occupational safety and health. A new unit, the Labour Inspection Department, has been set up in the Ministry of Labour. The ILO's Conventions related to this subject, namely the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) have recently been submitted to Parliament for ratification. A Bill concerning occupational safety and health is now under preparation. I would like to take this opportunity to express our thanks to the ILO for the comments and observations it has made on this Bill.

Mongolia has always attached, and continues to attach, great importance to technical cooperation with the ILO. On behalf of the Government of Mongolia, allow me to thank the ILO Regional Office for Asia and the Pacific for the valuable assistance and support that it has given my country. I should like to reaffirm the strong desire of the Mongolian Government to continue, and to further develop, its cooperation with the ILO and with all its member States.

I am pleased to welcome all the countries which joined the ILO since the last session of the Conference and wish them every success in their future activities.

Original – Arabic: Mr. DAHLAN (Employers' delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like to start by congratulating – on behalf of the employers in Saudi Arabia – Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and to wish him every success in his work.

On this occasion I should like to extend greetings to all my Muslim colleagues present here today which an important festival for Muslims – the Feast of the Sacrifice.

I should also like to thank the International Labour Organisation for having organised this Conference which takes us one step further in our quest to increase participation in the formulation of ideas and approaches to help mankind. The fact you are dealing with a number of vital issues such as democratisation and human rights is further proof that you are making great strides forward in the history of labour. This is not surprising because the ILO has always been concerned with collective action for the protection of basic rights. The ILO has a long and rich experience in trying to promote systems covering all areas relating to workers and their needs. It has also always tried to increase cooperation between the various member States, in order to create a climate likely to preserve these rights.

And if you add to the question of human rights other items of discussion on the agenda – such as the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer – then you will see that we are confronted with a vast area for discussion to try to find solutions to these many questions in a large number of countries.

So far as we are concerned, in Saudi Arabia, we have always had a clear view of what should be the rights and well-being of present and future generations. At the same time, we are trying to incorporate all new developments around us, because our civilisation, culture and values allow us to incorporate all these new trends. The new regulations which have just been promulgated on the Government, dialogue and regionalisation, are proof that the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is a State with modern law where people participate in important decisions. They are an indication of the extent of interaction throughout society where all the citizens are part of a national melting-pot – and considered as both the means and objective of development.

Whoever reads closely the text of the basic legislation in my country will understand the extent of political will in Saudi society – which is the will of all its members, from the highest to the lowest – including all those with a responsible position and all workers in the public and private sector. This legislation upholds the basic freedoms of Saudi citizens and the protection of men and women, in accordance with the Islamic shari'a and is in harmony with the changes occurring throughout the world.

In line with this approach the policy of the Kingdom is particularly concerned with local workers, who are vital for present and future development. Indeed, it is characterised by the following:

(1) The continuous expansion of job opportunities provided to the national labour force and the possibility for all workers to undergo vocational and technical training in vocational training and technical centres throughout the regions of the Kingdom, in order to respond to the various needs and changes in the economic sectors. In addition efforts are made to raise the living standards and health of this labour force.

(2) The opportunity provided to all Saudi citizens to study free at all levels, both within the country itself and abroad. The State has devoted a great deal of its efforts and possibilities towards training millions of pupils and students, tens of thousands of scientists, professionals, experts and administrators and thousands of skilled persons capable of shaping the future and dealing with the most advanced technologies.

(3) Wages and social and medical protection granted by the Government are considered amongst the highest in the world. The Government constantly grants wage increases and provides social stability, with a view to softening the impact of rapid social and economic changes occurring within the Kingdom.

(4) As regards the protection of workers' rights, the Kingdom claims to be a pioneer in this field. For instance, in the event of insolvency or bankruptcy of a company, the labour code states that workers' claims have priority. This proves beyond a doubt that workers in the Kingdom enjoy total protection of their rights, whether they are Saudi citizens or not.

Experience has shown that whatever successes have been achieved – either now or in the past – it is the future that most interests workers. This may be attributed to two main reasons:

(1) Man, by his very nature, is intrigued to know what the future holds in store for him. Whatever present conditions may be and in spite of optimistic signs, man is always worried about his future.

(2) There is no limit to people's aspirations, because whatever they acquire in material, social and cultural terms, they always want more. This is the law of nature.

It is for this reason that we must ask ourselves at this Conference what we can do in the future for workers, over and above everything that has been acquired in the past in the area of human rights – in spite of many difficulties and challenges. Indeed, the way contemporary societies are evolving does not allow us to leave the future of workers and peoples to chance. It is vital to plan this future so that it allows all countries to provide their citizens with a better life so that they might find self-fulfillment and stability within a new international order.

I am therefore not exaggerating when I say that the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia has made great advances in providing a better future for its people, taking account of the fact that its principles and values are vital to development. Let us not forget that our unique system, granting security and stability to citizens, has proven that it is most capable of fulfilling man's aspirations for greater freedom, peace, well-being and progress.

Furthermore, I am extremely optimistic about the outcome of this Conference because the frank dialogue that is taking place within these walls will allows us to reach solutions that will have a beneficial influence on human rights in our contemporary world.

Mr. TAN (Workers' delegate, Philippines) – I congratulate the President on his election and express our best wishes for the success of this Conference.

It is just as well that at this year's 79th Session of the International Labour Conference we address ourselves to democratisation and the role of the ILO in advancing its aims. That democratisation has once more become predominant in the world's changing political contour is by itself a moral victory for the international organisations, whose foundations have been laid upon the precepts of democracy and whose consistent actions for its advancement are bringing it to fruition. Nevertheless the death throes of totalitarianism and the retreat of many authoritarian governments do not ensure the victory of would-be democrats as, to paraphrase an old adage, even the road to hell is littered with good intentions, and the wounds of violence perpetrated by undemocratic regimes on the human spirit and in many communities remain unhealed.

This is even worsened by the turbulence of democratic transition, with the resurgence of ethnic violence, and the persistence of military regimes that continue to lord it over many Asian and other societies, or where the still tight grip of one-party States has so far successfully resisted the mounting pressure of popular movements for democratisation.

On the other hand, new democracies who are at best fragile have been weakened further by their failure to convert their political victory into tangible economic gains for their people, all because the crisis of the international economic order – a euphemism we fondly use to allude to the failure of industrialised countries to set their economies in order – continues to hamper the possibilities of economic growth and social equity in their underdeveloped societies.

For what use is democracy to people who are hungry, to children who are malnourished, to the increasing many who still wallow in poverty and illiteracy? The experience of my country, the Philippines, may be most instructive of the travails of new democracies. It is not enough for people-power to dislodge a dictatorship. The same power must be harnessed with utmost urgency to re-establish democratic institutions and to rebuild the economy shattered by the bureaucracy and abuses of the past regimes.

International cooperation must be sought and given for these efforts even to begin to succeed because, even if we attempt to push forward the frontiers of our democracy and revitalise its functioning, the forces of darkness, whose previous policies and continuing resistance have mired our economy in stagnation and instability, still lurk in the cracks and crevices of our democratic ideals, seizing every opportunity to pounce on our victory. They are often helped in their evil intentions by the onerous structural adjustment measures imposed on decrepit national economies by international banking and financial institutions.

In our country as well as in others which are similarly situated, the question has been asked before and we must raise it again: can the bitter pill prescribed by these international loan-shark institutions, which often give an overdose of allegedly temporary medication that becomes permanent structural adjustment, really be the cure for our ailing economy? And yet we find that a democratic framework in an environment of freedom, which we must defend by the very ways of democracy itself and the responsible exercise of freedoms are the best antidote to the sinister forces which would like to re-establish the dictatoship that they so enjoyed in the past. Free and honest elections, such as we have recently experienced under the aegis of political pluralism and the principle of democratic alteration of power, stand the best chance of affording real choices for people and their leaders to reach a national consensus.

However, the international economic crisis that keeps on stoking the fires of our own old-pervading domestic crisis has gone for so long that the longer medication takes the less faith we have in the doctors of international economy and their local counterparts. We cannot, for example, see the light in the long tunnel of deregulation and liberalisation when workers, such as ourselves are made to bear most of the burdens and share the least of the benefits of growth and development. Also, we see the need for the wisdom and equity of moving towards more market-oriented strategies. So we get at least the social protection that should have accompanied our acquiescence to these policies.

Yet the liberalisation of trade, investment and finance has gone far ahead, leaving our basic freedoms underdeveloped and confining to reneged promises the respect for human and trade union rights which remains shackled to date in so many developing countries and newly industrialised ones.

Perhaps this is where international governmental organisations, and especially the ILO, can contribute by further widening the democratic space and creating the proper international environment that would allow the dynamics of a socially responsible market economy to take root in our societies and thus improve the chances of greater economic growth and broader social development in societies like ours which need them most.

We must therefore praise the Director-General whose Report to this Conference speaks about the three areas in which the ILO can alter the situation in a country in the throes of transformation in its pursuit of stability.

First, the ILO must conscientiously promote observance of fundamental human rights in all respects, but especially as regards employment and freedom of association. At the same time it must strengthen its various activities to maintain its practical action commensurate with its moral authority.

Secondly, the ILO must take energetic action to encourage a market economy while emphasising the social dimension and adequate social protection, especially for the most vulnerable sections of the population. The market acting alone shows no concern for social equity and the common weal. It is thus necessary for enlightened human beings and institutions to ensure that the social aspect of the market is not left to the greed of the enterprising or crushed by the wheels of unbridled competition.

Thirdly, the ILO must strengthen tripartism and collective bargaining via its various schemes of technical cooperation. This is perhaps the main contribution it can make to strengthening democracy and to revitalising a moribund economy.

In these three areas of priority, the ILO and all of us must help the workers overcome, the pains of adjustments, and thus calm the turbulance of social transformation that have taken hold of the world today. But in all these endeavours it is the ILO's primary role in the community of international governments and institutions always to influence decisions that will broaden the social dimension of market-oriented processes and ensure greater social protection and participation ... especially to the weakest sectors of the population during structural adjustment initiated and sustained by these institutions.

In so doing, the ILO will not only have not increased its relevance in the international community but it will also have shown to the community of nations that cooperation and solidarity are the most dynamic means for creating one world of peace, harmony and prosperity for all.

COMMUNICATIONS TO THE CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) – Before starting our work this afternoon I would like to ask the Clerk of the Conference to read out two communications that I have received from the Government of Austria and the Government of Switzerland respectively.

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The communication of the Government of Austria is dated 9 June 1992 and reads as follows:

> Mr. President,
> The Federal Government of Austria has repeatedly voiced its opinion that there are no legal grounds why the former Federal Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia should automatically be succeeded by the Federal Republic of Yogoslavia at international level, as advocated in the statement submitted by the representative of the Republic of Serbia and Montenegro of 27 April 1992. Any possible participation of the delegation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the work of international organisations cannot therefore be considered as a precedent.
> As regards the criteria for a possible recognition of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, account should be taken of the principles adopted by the European Community on 16 December 1991 concerning the recognition of new States. In this context, Austria attaches particular importance to the respect of human rights and the protection of minorities.
> I request you to bring the content of this letter to the attention of delegates at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.
> Mr. President, I beg to remain.
> (Signed) Christian STROHAL,
> Permanent Representative of Austria, a.i.

The second communication, from the Government of Switzerland, is dated 10 June 1992, and reads as follows:

> Mr. President,
> The Federal Council of Switzerland has taken note of the declaration of the representatives of the peoples of the Republic of Serbia and the Republic of Montenegro, dated 27 April 1992, according to which the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia continues the State, the international political and juridical personality of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.
> This declaration raises the question of whether the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia represents the continuation of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia as a member of the international organisations, including the International Labour Organisation. Indeed, Switzerland has not recognised the automatic continuity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the international organisations.
> Until these questions have been resolved, the participation of the representatives of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the work of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference should be without prejudice to future decisions by the Government of Switzerland, and should in no case constitute a precedent.
> I request you to bring the contents of this letter to the knowledge of the Conference.
> I remain, Mr. President,
> (Signed) M. de RIEDMATTEN,
> Ambassador and Head of the Permanent Mission > of Switzerland

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) – We now shall continue our discussion of tthe reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. NWAMUSHUATE MABUMO (Workers' delegate, Mozambique) – First of all allow me, on behalf of all Mozambique workers' organisations, to congratulate the President on his deserved and unanimous election to the high office at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We are convinced that under his experienced leadership the deliberations of this session will bring about constructive debate and effective substantive conclusions.

We believe that it is most appropriate and timely that the Director-General of ILO has selected democracy, education and economic development as the themes of his Report.

We would like to address in this plenary some aspects that are of great concern to us in relation to democracy, education and economic development, in the hope of contributing to a profound joint reflection on these great and complex problems of developing countries, in particular, and the whole of humanity, in general.

Democracy is a fundamental and indispensable principle whose nature requires social dialogue and political will amongst men, nations and countries in order to safeguard the following values: freedom of individual expression collective opinion and organisational forms; mutual respect for different opinions and their manifestations; mutual respect for socio-economic, cultural and spiritual rights of each group within society.

It is true that from the historic moment in which people integrated and became interdependent, the principles of democracy forcefully applicable to relations between peoples and countries.

These relations were for a long period governed by a backward and jungle rule of "dominator" vis-à-vis "dominated". In short, "eat or be eaten". Today, unless this negative principle is totally eliminated, the whole of humanity will live under this disastrous situation.

It is our conviction that the principles of democracy, if not faithfully applied at the level of relations between people and countries, will always be in danger at local level, resulting in conflicts amongst nations.

What see today is that a failure in appying democratic principles in international economic relations has provoked a loss of immense intellectual capacities. Hundreds of millions of children are denied their legitimate rights to education, health, food, clothing and happiness.

This historic phase of democratisation requires a more elevated level of knowledge, not only to counteract the degradation of our planet, but also to promote a more accelerated development that will more fully meet the real needs of mankind. Education is one of the factors that requires great investment in the medium and long term, since it can improve living conditions for the whole of society.

When the economy of any country is unstable and unbalanced, the education and health sectors, which are vital elements for the rehabilitation of the same economy, are deeply and seriously affected, leading to a vicious circle in which there is no economic development, because there are no financial capacities to elevate the technical and scientific levels of the population.

It is also true that countries liberated from colonialism have given great efforts to education and health after achieving independence but, most unfortunately, such efforts were purposely hampered or frustrated by the degradation of their economics due to various well-known reasons.

Today, we witness the international market of labour, the so-called "intellectual market" where developed countries are recruiting experts and scientists from underdeveloped countries at lower salaries in relation to their nationals, thus brain-draining these countries at the cost of their underdeveloped economy. This state of affairs is caused by international economic conditions which are unbalanced between North and South.

We are of the opinion that there is an urgent need, an historic obligation, in the interest of a sound world economy, for developed countries to contribute effectively with all political will to developing countries, in particular Africa, to efforts to bring about a sound African economic integration by the year 2000.

The violence which manifests itself all over the world – misery, illiteracy, disease, hunger, malnutrition, nakedness, contaminated drinking water – which kills and degradates billions of human beings, as well as the dangers of ecological catastrophy constitute a reality of our days that should alert us to take urgent and effective measures which would prevent a social catastrophy.

Finally, I do not wish to leave this rostrum without reiterating an urgent appeal, launched last month by my Government jointly with workers' and employers' organisations, to the international community to give assistance to Mozambique in terms of food, materials and financial means to alleviate a very grave situation faced by the Mozambican population due to a prolonged war of aggression, drought and, recently, oil pollution on part of our sea coast.

Mozambican workers are confident that the ILO, through the Director-General, will give a very positive response to our appeal through its member States.

Original – German: Mrs. ENGELEN-KEFER (Workers' delegate, Germany) – What do we expect in 1992 from the International Labour Organisation by way of the strengthening democracy and social justice?

These have been the basic aspirations of the ILO since its inception. The desire to fulfil them is the driving force behind the commitment by so many countries in this Organisation.

Of course, things have changed over the course of the 73 years of existence of the ILO. Democratisation moves forward, even if there have been moments of regression. However, democratisation at the political level and the establishment and functioning of free trade unions and employers' organisations are not possible without true democracy.

Gradually dictatorships are being swept away in Africa, Asia and Latin America and since the beginning of this year the Wall between East and West in Europe has ceased to exist.

Unfortunately, democratisation is not always of a lasting nature. It is sometimes accompanied by terrible bloodshed and is not always accompanied by the necessary social justice – without which no form of State, not even democracy, can survive in the long term.

That the ILO can give considerable assistance was recalled to us by a guest of honour at the Conference, the Head of State of Zambia, Mr. Chiluba, of Zambia, who very eloquently spoke of the example of his own country. I would also like to recall that the fall of the Wall between East and West and the resulting unification of the country of Germany would not have been possible without the assistance provided by the ILO.

Here, I would like repeat emphatically the warning given by Mr. Chiluba. Without effective help in these young democracies in the fight against poverty, hunger, misery and hopelessness they will not have any chance of survival. This applies to Africa, Asia, Latin America and now, also, for Central and Eastern Europe.

The cold war between East and West is now over. We now for the first time have the chance for worldwide peace. But as long as social injustice on such a scale continues to grow, we shall remain far from permanent democracy and justice.

Only two hours away from here, in Yugoslavia, there is a deadly, murderous war going on which every day is destroying human lives and bringing in its wake untold misery.

We are facing problems today that are greater than any since the end of the second world war. Have we not lost something of our sense of social conscience? Is it not time, perhaps, to take decisions? Do we not recognise our failure to achieve our objectives? The objectives of the ILO and the United Nations. The hopes of the founding fathers have not been fulfilled, the hopes for social equality, a genuine international community. There is a gulf between standards and reality.

Of course, there is talk of a new international economic order although unfortunately nothing specific has yet emerged. Neither is there any sign of wide-ranging political movement which would make it possible to justify appropriate social alternatives to the growing internationalistation of capital.

In contrast to the period after the two World Wars, there are no new paths opening up for the materialisation of social ideals and hopes.

After the fall of Communism there emerged in many places a blind hope in market forces which can lead us only to a Wild West kind of capitalism if we do not apply the appropriate social correction measures.

Our experience in Eastern Germany has shown that the market process must be strengthened during restructuring and that at the same times a social framework must be established to regulate the whole, so that what happens on the market is not contrary to social objectives and the freedom of others.

If we wish to avoid extreme solutions which are dangerous and unacceptable, a balance must be found between market efficiency and social policy.

The assistance provided by the West so far in the reform process is not sufficient. It is devoid, I believe, of the vision and readiness which characterised countries and social groups which had participated in the Marshall Plan after the War. Aid from donor countries must be substantially increased and better coordinated, as was recommended in the joint declaration of the IOE and the ICFTU at the ILO symposium on tripartism in Europe in April of this year.

There is often a lack of proper social conscience. In the same way there is often an absence of political will to adress the social problems and to use genuinely social measures to help shape the market economy process.

This has catastrophic effects which go deep into our Organisation.

We must as trade unions and employers' organisations note that the instruments of our Organisation are tending to become blunted in their effect. I would like to ask the Director-General to correct this dangerous trend.

Firstly, the standard-setting activity of our Organisation, through the intermediary of the International Labour Conference, should not be restricted. It is an error to believe that if there is already a certain number of international labour standards, then this is sufficient. Political, social and economic circumstances change constantly and the same is true of requirements regarding national and international social standards.

It is for this reason that we cannot pause in our task or accept any slowing down in the progress made.

Or course, there must be constant supervision of the ratification and observance of international labour standards at the level of the member States. In this respect the ILO as a world-wide organisation has supervisory machinery of a very high quality.

We would like to ask the Director-General to do everything possible to prevent this supervisory machinery from being jeopardised or simply blunted. In the Governing Body we have seen there are gross violations of both human rights and trade union rights in the developing and developed countries. These matters are always on the agenda. They show clearly that we need strengthen international standard-setting activities. We must also strengthen the respect for the basic rights of employees and workers and for human rights.

I would also like to ask the Director-General to ensure that the standard-setting activities of the ILO are not subject to restrictions imposed by the European Community. In Germany, the Government and employers are together calling for the abrogation of essential international labour standards.

As a trade union organisation we see this as a sign that some industrialised countries feel they can take certain liberties.

Furthermore, steps must be taken to ensure that the autonomy of member trade unions and employers' associations in the preparation of new instruments is not restricted. Such conflicts are increasingly frequent in the various technical committees of the ILO.

These then are our expectations from the Organisation – that the opportunities offered by the destruction of the Wall between East and West are not wasted and that they can be used to create a lasting world peace.

The ILO must not limit its activities as some would often wish. It must of course adapt to the rapidly changing world conditions. It must show greater commitment in Central and Eastern Europe, although not be to the detriment of the pressing tasks which await us in the developing countries.

At all events, our Organisation must remain the bulwark of peace, democracy, humanity and social equality. We have as much need of all this today as we had in 1919 when this Organisation was founded.

Mr. FORSYTH (Minister of State for Employment, United Kingdom) – I would like to begin by congratulating the President on his election. It is not only a well-deserved tribute to him personally, but also an honour for Portugal and for the whole of our European region. I myself regard it as a great privilege to have this opportunity to address the International Labour Conference on the important theme of democratisation, which I am particularly pleased was chosen by the Director-General for his Report to the Conference this year. But I hope to demonstrate also the support of the Government of the United Kingdom for the ILO's commitment to administrative reform by sticking scrupulously to the ten minute time limit for my speech.

It has been 71 years since the International Labour Organisation, having held its first two sessions in Washington and Genoa, first met in Geneva. In those 71 years the International Labour Organisation has witnessed and contributed to remarkable transformations in every aspect of society. But none, I would suggest, has been more remarkable than the untiring pursuit of freedom and democracy throughout those years by the peoples of the world.

There have, of course, been many setbacks along the road. All too many of the countries gathered together at this Conference have, over those 70 years, experienced periods when democracy was extinguished by forces from either the left or the right. There remain many countries today where democracy is not yet the reality that many of us would wish to see.

Nevertheless, there is now more reason to be hopeful about the strength and extent of democracy than perhaps ever in the life of this Organisation. Not only in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, but many other countries of the world as well, new democratic forces have taken hold which are genuinely seeking to respond, often in very difficult circumstances, to the desire of their people for a freer and better life.

But democracy is not a plant which can flower and survive in an arid or barren climate. Only by giving individual men and women the freedom to improve and better themselves and to profit from their own efforts can we ensure that political freedom becomes established within the foundations of society. As the Director-General's Report itself says:

> It is a striking phenomenon that democratisation is nearly always accompanied by a change of economic system or, at the very least, by a challenge to the role of the State in economic matters. The countries subject to totalitarian regimes all considered that the population's well-being could not be improved without a change of economic model, and they are resolutely undertaking the transition towards the market economy... They consider the market economy as both a guarantee of prosperity and an indispensable ingredient of regained political liberty.

These are words which I wholeheartedly endorse. They recognise the reality that political and economic freedom must go hand in hand. It is impossible to have one without the order. Moreover, the Director-General's words do, I believe, point to the areas in which the ILO should increasingly be devoting its efforts to ensure the long-term health of democracy in its member States.

Making the transition to a market economy in a society which has for more than a generation been subject to the dead hand of state or centralised control is far from easy. The immediate consequences, both for the industries which have become outdated and uncompetitive and for the people whose skills and education have often failed to keep up with the demands of the wider world, can be difficult and traumatic. That is why my Government applauds the efforts which the ILO has been making to help those countries carrying out this difficult and painful transition to do so in a way which reduces to the greatest possible extent the inevitable difficulties which they will be experiencing.

I am pleased to say that my own Government has been ready and willing to play its part. We decided in 1989 to set up a special fund – which we called the "Know-How Fund" – to provide assistance to the countries of Central and Eastern Europe as they moved towards democracy and a free market economy. We sought through the Know-How Fund to provide practical help, in particular as these countries move, as they must, to restructure their labour markets. We have sought to help them establish employment services and social security systems, develop training for new skills and create an enterprise culture which allows and promotes the growth of small firms and self-employment.

We are now providing such assistance in Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Bulgaria, Romania, Russia, and increasingls in some of the other new republics of the former Soviet Union. I hope that these efforts are seen as useful and practical by the Governments of those countries. Indeed, I have learned today that they have.

At the same time, we do not believe that any one country can have a monopoly of wisdom as to how such assistance can best the deployed and made effective. Self-evidently, no one country can provide more than a fraction of the assistance which is necessary. Accordingly, we have supported and will continue to support the efforts of the International Labour Organisation and other international bodies to monitor and disseminate information about such assistance programmes, to ensure that we learn from each other what forms of help are likely to be most useful and practical and do not, however unwittingly, duplicate what others are already doing.

Indeed, it was in this context that the British Government hosted a round-table meeting in London earlier this year which brought together the labour ministers of 11 countries of Eastern Europe and the Republics of the former Soviet Union to examine ways of making our assistance more effective, particularly in the area of help for small and medium-sized enterprises. We are particularly glad that the Deputy Director-General of the ILO was able to participate in what proved to be an extremely useful and valuable event.

I would like to finish by saying something about the ILO itself and about the moves taking place towards its reform. The 1980s have been a watershed in many areas of national and international life. In my own country, we have seen huge changes in working methods and patterns. We have seen business reorganising themselves so as to be able to respond more flexibly to the pace of technological change and to the needs of their customers. We are seeing the disappearance of large mass-production units with employees doing the same basic job for a standard number of hours each week. More work is now being done in small units, with each member of the unit contributing a range of skills.

Such changes are, in different degrees and at different speeds, being mirrored by similar and other changes in many other countries of the world. Such changes inevitably need to be reflected in the work of the International Labour Organisation. We need to ensure that the ILO is well equipped to influence and respond to the rapid political, social and economic changes taking place throughout the world.

Accordingly, my Government strongly backs the efforts of the Director-General to focus attention on those areas where the ILO has the maximum potential to support the transition to democracy and a market economy and, conversely, efforts to reduce or withdraw from those activities which may once have had a rationale and a place within its programme of work, but which now appear increasingly irrelevant in the fast-changing world of the 1990s. We believe that the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 pave the way towards an ILO which is increasingly relevant to the needs of its Members. The task now is to translate those proposals into a concrete plan of action.

The ILO needs to maximise the cost-effectiveness of its activities by scrutinising and, if necessary, reforming every aspect of its work – this Conference included. If the ILO is to help its Members meet the challenges of democratisation so ably set out in the Director-General's Report, it needs to focus more of its expenditure and effort on activities that will achieve that end.

We have the privilege to be living in an era in which democratisation has made strides which to many of us seemed unimaginable only a few brief years ago. We need, through our efforts both as individual States and as Members within the ILO, to do the maximum to ensure that this process is strong and irreversible. I have every confidence that we shall succeed.

Mr. SANGMA (Minister of State for Labour, India) – May I extend on behalf of my delegation and myself the warmest congratulations to the President. I am confident that under his able guidance and that of the two distinguished Vice-Presidents, this session of the Conference will reach meaningful conclusions on the various items of the agenda. I would also take this opportunity to offer my greetings to the Director-General and his colleagues for the excellent support they have always given to our deliberations.

My delegation has studied with deep interest the Report of the Director-General on Democratisation and the ILO. Democracy was an article of faith with Indians long before independence in 1947. Our Constitution has declared India a Sovereign Democratic Republic. We are aware that the Constitution of the ILO articulates the same faith. It is a matter of pride to us that our commitment to the democratic system has been progressively nurtured and deepened by our faith in secularism and equality. We are aware that democracy as a political system and way of life evolves from the aspirations of the people. The significant political changes that we have witnessed in recent years in the Eastern part of Europe are expressions of these aspirations. But while democracy may be a very recent phenomenon there, many countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America adopted democracy as a way of life and political system in the fifties and the sixties. It is to their credit that, despite economic difficulties and lack of adequate support from the international community, these countries in the developing world have maintained their faith in democracy. While all countries and all international organisations must support the adoption of democratic values universally, it would be a disservice to the old democracies in the developing world if the international community were to give preference, both material and moral, to the sustainment of these democracies only. Poverty anywhere is a danger to democracy and ultimately to prosperity everywhere.

Democratic values have to be safeguarded from practices which pose a threat to democratisation. The most pernicious of these threats today and in the years to come is terrorism, which is increasingly supported by nacro-trafficking and is often externally inspired and supported. No State which sponsors or supports terrorism in another sovereign State can be truly democratic since its value system inculcates callous disregard for the most precious of all human rights, namely the right to life and liberty. Genuine practitioners of democracy must abjure terrorism in practice; lip service is not enough.

We in India have recently embarked upon a number of initiatives in our macroeconomic policies as part of the process of structural adjustment. These measures include restructuring industry and trade. We are aware that many hard issues will be thrown up by this process. We are trying to ensure that even in the changed circumstances the interests of workers are needed to the full. We believe that cooperation between social partners in the true spirit of tripartism is the most effective way of finding lasting solutions. We have, in the last year, undertaken wide-ranging consultations through our tripartite committees and otherwise. While each country has to evolve its own strategies and areas of cooperation for its developmental programmes, for my country the stage has come when there is a need for greater understanding among international organisations to support the national effort. We have, in this context, greatly welcomed the item on the agenda relating to structural adjustments and look forward to sharing our experiences with member States.

We also welcome the emphasis that has been placed on poverty and problems of the informed sector. We recognise that the growth of employment opportunities and the meaningful involvement of people in productive activity is extremely important for sustaining democratic systems. In my country, we have considerably stepped up our efforts in this regard. We have launched several innovative and specific anti-poverty programmes and would welcome sustained and substantive support in this endeavour. We also note with interest the new focus on the development of human resources and look forward to the report of the Committee on Human Resources. These two issues – poverty and the development of human resources – are extremely relevant to our present stage of development.

Against the background of restructuring industry, the question of the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer has long been recognised in India. If the proposed Convention is adopted and ratified by all countries, the mandatory payment of workers' dues in the event of insolvency would be a normal incidence of cost in the event of enterprises closing and would not be considered as an additional burden for the industry. We commend the efforts of the session of the Conference last year which led to the drafting of an instrument on the subject. Our objective should be to adopt a flexible Convention so that a large number of countries are able to ratify it.

In choosing the subject of "prevention of industrial disasters" for formulating a Convention, the ILO has sought to address an issue of considerable importance to workers worldwide. The Government of India has taken a number of measures to strengthen the major hazard control system.

We are hosting next April the Thirteenth World Congress on Occupational Safety and Health. The first such conference in the developing world, and I have the pleasure of inviting every one of you to participate in that Conference.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General for his comprehensive report on the conditions of workers in South Africa. The positive developments in South Africa are a result of united action by the international community. We must, however, strike a note of caution as more needs to be done before racial discrimination is completely eliminated. Pressure on the South African Government to hasten the end of apartheid in any form should continues with unrelented vigour.

The Constitution of the ILO mandates that the activities of the Organisation should be directed towards promoting economic development within a framework of social justice. Standard-setting and technical collaboration are twin instruments for achieving this objective. India has always attached great importance to the ILO's standard-setting activities.We recently ratified the Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136), and the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160), taking the total number of Conventions ratified by India to 36, and we are reviewing the question of ratifying a number of other Conventions. We feel that the technical cooperation activities of the ILO should have due priority so as to hasten our primary objectives of eliminating poverty, encouraging human resource development and enhancing opportunities for gainful employment. In the final analysis, our success will depend on the cooperation and coordination we achieve to attain our common goal, namely to find work for all and to preserve and cherish all human values.

In conclusion, I would like to congratulate the Director-General for the excellent work done by the ILO under his able leadership. I offer my best wishes for the success of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and look forward to productive deliberations.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ROSAS (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Panama) – I am honoured to address this select audience and I would like to extend the greetings and congratulations of my Government and my delegation to the honourable Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his honourable election to chair the discussions of this International Conference, and also to Mr. Solórzano Martinez and the other Vice-Presidents on their election. Furthermore, I would like to express our highest esteem of the distinguished Director-General of the International Labour Organisation and of the honourable delegates of the countries represented at this the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Report of the Director-General on the burning theme Democratisation and the ILO concerns us all. It is a challenge for developing countries to establish and implement programmes to bring about far-reaching improvements in the economic, social and cultural fields in an atmosphere of freedom, respect for the fundamental rights of human beings, and for social justice, all aspects which embody representative democracy.

The topic is of crucial importance for the people of Panama. In the light of a return to a regime of freedom, democracy and justice, and having overcome the institutional trauma of the past few years whose negative effects had repercussions not only in the fields of public freedom, of civil rights and illegal political order, but also in the field of national production. These repercussions were so great that they are still being felt and are proving to be a hindrance to the recovery process even now, two years after our return to a state of law represented by the Government that was elected by the people during the elections in May 1989.

Indeed, during the gloomy times of the de facto governments, and more specifically during the 1980s, the Panamanian economy showed obvious signs of impairment in every respect. This situation further deteriorated as of 1987 as a result of the institutional crisis which affected the country and became more acute with the painful events that preceded the process of transition from an authoritarian and corrupt regime to a democratic, organised and transparent one at the end of 1989.

In the financial fields, the public debt exceeded $6,200 million – way beyond the credit worthiness of the State. This is currently one of the most severe obstacles to our economic recovery and to our achieving the growth and development rates demanded by our social requirements.

The general reduction of economic activity had certain negative consequences on the labour market. We found ourselves at the end of 1989 with an unemployment rate which exceeded 25 per cent of the economically active population. This situation has its repercussions on the social and economic conditions of Panamanian families, 50 per cent of which, according to reliable estimates, live in a state of poverty; that is, they cannot cover their basic needs.

In this connection the distribution of income is a factor of great concern. We have observed that poor families, that is 50 per cent of the population, only receive 18.6 per cent of total income. This means that the other half of the population, not considered to be poor, receives 81.4 per cent of the income generated in the country. The immediate return to full constitutional order has re-established the validity of the individual and social rights of the people of Panama: freedom of expression, freedom of assembly, religious freedom, freedom of movement, freedom from fear, equality before the law without exemptions or privileges, the inviability of the home, the right to the social benefits of the public health system, the right to social security and assistance, the right to work with a set of protective standards for the true exercise of freedom of association and the right to strike, the right to a minimum wage, the right to damages in cases of unjust dismissal, the right to free vocational training, and the right to trade union education and training.

Likewise, my Government has re-established the importance of universal suffrage as an undeniable duty, confirming equal, universal, secret and direct voting. It has established political pluralism represented by political parties that are functional organs of the nation. It has renewed the importance of autonomous electoral jurisdiction to guarantee the freedom, honesty and effectiveness of universal suffrage.

However, this democratic rescue cannot restrict itself solely to political freedom and individual rights. It has become part and parcel of the foundations of the economic and social recovery of the country. In this respect, during 1990 and 1991 the economy started a dynamic recovery process. The gross domestic product rose by 4.6 and 9.3 per cent respectively. We hope that there will be even greater growth this year. This recovery has been reflected in an improvement of the employment level by absorbing the growth of the economically active population.

My ministerial administration is aimed at creating closer ties between the production sectors, advocating social and labour consultation for the adoption of the measures necessary for the economy to recover, for production to increase, for unemployment to fall, for the number and quality of jobs to rise, for the economic benefits of production to be distribute more fairly, whilst preserving and improving general working conditions and workers' social benefits.

With this aim in mind, we have organised a symposium on social and labour consultation. In a joint statement submitted by the representatives of the workers', employers' and government sectors, it is stated that "all sectors must make every possible effort if the serious problems facing the country are to be overcome" and also that "the representatives of the workers', employers' and government sectors repeat that dialogue is the best way to overcome current problems". To this end they agreed to set up a tripartite working group which has already started its consultation work.

With the same aim, the Ministers of Labour of Central America, Belize, Panama and the Dominican Republic, in our fifth meeting held in Panama last April, recognised that within the process of consultation which is being developed in the region, the importance of tripartism in the discussion and consideration of social and labour policies is conducive to the incorporation in our legislation of the idea of economic growth linked to social developments, so as to reduce the well-known differences between the various sectors of society.

To this end, we have improved the taxation system in Panama and have exempted from income tax more than 250,000 workers earning less than $350 per month, including workers who receive tax rebates for dependent family members.

The minimum wage, which has been in force since 1983, is being studied by a national tripartite committee and will be revised by the Government as soon as possible taking into account basic family needs.

My Government is eager to implement, preferably within the framework of social and labour consultation, the measures which will lead to a better life for Panamanian families in the economic, social, cultural and political fields, in a climate of freedom, democracy, justice, legal security and institutional stability. We wish to thank the ILO for its cooperation in helping us to achieve these objectives.

Original – French: Mr. VERONESE (Workers' delegate, France) – A symposium recently held jointly by the International Labour Organisation and the Ministry of Employment and Labour of Belgium permitted a large-scale exchange of opinion between workers, employers and governments from all over Europe.

In view of its commitment to the prospect of tripartism in Central and Eastern Europe, concern was obvious at the seminar over the dramatic effects and social and economic consequences in these countries as they are forced along the path of capitalism for the sake of liberalism.

The Director-General's Report on democratisation reflects this. I would like here, to highlight amongst many others, five questions.

Firstly, is the market economy incompatible with nationalised enterprises and trade sectors? In a great number of countries and in France experience has shown that there is no incompatibility. Why then is there a tendency to pass over this important fact? Why leave the field clear for employers and governments who can only concieve of a market economy dominated by private capital and subject to its rules, restrictions and its risks? The 15 million unemployed of the EEC can testify to this. For them, what is required is to establish a relationship, a state of mind and minimum rules to ensure the return of capitalism in these countries. But there is, at the same time, growing anxiety everywhere in the face of the risks of major social disruption; wars and armed conflicts are already springing from the inequalities of development.

Beyond the foreseeable future, are we not on the verge of a new struggle by humanity for liberty and democracy, a struggle quite different in nature and much more complex than the simple crusade that the supporters of so-called liberalism may have imagined?

The second question is why should employees who, in conditions that we all know, have created wealth and have thereby acquired social rights and means of participation in the management of enterprises, accept social defeat today because the capitalist system is trying to impose its rules and regulations?

These workers want, with democracy and liberty, a good life. But they see vultures swooping down who buy up at cheap prices and dislocate the productive machinery, plunging millions of men and women into unemployment at record speed, and making big cuts in the welfare budgets. A new race of adventurers is proliferating, whose first aim is not the development of production to meet the needs of the people and the country.

Freedom at this price? It is quite obvious that the great industrial and financial groups and the great powers have decided to operate a terrible and lasting policy of debilitation – all the better to carry out their strategy of domination over the planet, faced as they are with their own development crisis.

The third question relates to an obvious fear: how do you avoid social disruption?

The answer is all in the art of trying to make trade union and employees participate actively in the renewal of capitalism that dominates the market economy and, through tripartism, make them take on a share of social responsibility.

As if they were both really on the same footing. And yet we have so much experience of these structural adjustment schemes, economic constructions which put people into a kind of a strait-jacket of endless political austerity, autocratic decisions by the IMF, the World Bank, the G7, and now the EBDR. For whose benefit? Has any one of these countries really managed to escape from underdevelopment and satisfy the needs of its people? The ILO must use all its experience and authority to point to other solutions that will ensure the application of its standards so as to achieve real social progress.

Fourthly, what if the workers or their unions were to endeavour to promote new forms of cooperation and solidarity on the basis of the needs and aspirations of the working world in all its diversity towards progress and social justice?

This would presuppose that the ILO with its experience and competence should devote itself more than ever to its mission, which is to contribute to improving the well-being of the workers and, to this end, set standards and adopt Conventions and Recommendations backed up by adequate control mechanisms.

In this area there are of course conflicting interests, and it is essential that the ILO should preserve its independence as regards an economic system which, even if it is predominant, must be examined all the more critically because of its sharply contrasting interests. More significantly, the crisis in which this system finds itself is evident when we examine and analyse the state of the world, with its increasing areas of poverty, its deepening inequalities, the greater numbers of disadvantaged side by side with the considerable human and financial waste which they feed. And yet employers and governments dispose of considerable means and mechanisms whereby they may impose their conceptions and choices of strategy, be it financial or political.

It is therefore not the role of the ILO to participate in the support and training of the employers, especially in these Central and Eastern European countries, or to reduce its capacity for reflection and action for the establishment of a trade model that could be exported to all regions of the world. There are mechanisms other than tripartism by which to achieve a positive solution for wage-earners and their families. The true problem here is that of strengthening the organised force and unity of the workers.

The ILO has more to do than to serve as a pedestal for privatisation and prepare the workers to submit to it. The evolution of productive forces following from the computer revolution, the evolution of social relationship with the upsurge of democracy, require the development of all the capacities of men, women, of the young generation.

For this reason, the multiple choices of individuals, social groups and peoples must be respected and encouraged to enable them to decide on their own system and innovate in all areas.

The fifth and last consideration is can the institution not contribute to the creation of another type of growth, giving priority to an active struggle against all social exclusions and the inequalities they foster: growth which puts emphasis on the resources and economic potential of every country, which can be enhanced through cooperation to open up considerable areas for development.

In these conditions, the workers' group must intensify its efforts to support the promotion of stable, well remunerated employment for skilled workers, and good working conditions. Workers with good individual and collective guarantees and regulations which ensure job security and contribute to efficient development

This investment is indispensable in order to permit social and occupational mastery of rapid changes in techniques and technology.

This efficient growth will, in turn, permit the redistribution of wealth to increase salaries, reduce working time and finance social proteciton.

We continue to call for economic and social democracy at all levels; improved collective capacity so that workers may participate in economic and social choices affecting their conditions of work and life and the development of cooperation among workers in their occupational life.

This advance of economic and social democracy is essential on the part of and for the workers themselves, management, governments and public opinion. It is a basic prerequisite for a more decent life, a more normal society, and for stronger organised trade unions.

There is important and urgent work here for the ILO.

There is so much to do to support the most disadvantaged throughout the world encourage their progress.

Let us not wait too long but open up new ways, for should we not open new doors to collective bargaining and tripartism, so as to obtain true efficiency in the workplace and employment for everyone?

Original – German: Mr. HESOUN (Federal Minister for Labour and Social Affairs, Austria) – First of all I should like to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their election. I am convinced that under their leadership, we shall be able to achieve the positive results that we all seek.

The Director-General has devoted his Report this year to the role of our Organisation in the democratisation process in countries undergoing reform. The ILO has always endeavoured to defend the democratic values enshrined in its Constitution, even in difficult times. This is due, not least of all, to its structure – unique in the United Nations system – of tripartism. Today, when people in all part of the world are striving more than ever before to attain democratic values, the ILO has many possibilities to participate in this process. In this context, the Director-General has identified areas in which it is particularly concerned, such as human rights, social market economy and social partnership.

Given the many institutions and mechanisms concerned with the respect and application of human rights, which are familiar to the community of nations, the role of our Organisation is often overlooked. The ILO, however, has a broad-based network of standards which, although of social and political origin, often extend far into the general areas of civil and political rights. There is also efficient machinery to supervise the application of these standards.

In 1993, Austria will host the World Conference on Human Rights. We believe that the specific experience the ILO has in the area of standard-setting and the monitoring of these standards should be put to better use. The Preamble of the Constitution of our Organisation states that "lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice". We believe that social justice is inextricably linked to the democratic system. Democracy and social balance are not only prerequisites for peace within a country but also for peace among nations. If these cornestones are not present and excessive nationalism and chauvinism gain the upper hand, then a situation might arise such as the one that developed last year in Slovenia, that still exists in Croatia – and is now unfortunately occurring also in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Austria strongly condemns the violation of the independent and territorial integrity of these State due to Serbian aggression.

The war of terror is bringing death and poverty in its wake and creating countless innocent victims – paying no heed to nationality, religion or ethnic origin. The ensuing violence is not only resulting in the tragic loss of human lives but also destroying and undermining the social fabric in these countries. I would like to express the hope that the sanctions of the Security Council will have the desired effect and that strife may be ended and peace re-established.

In those countries in which the process of democratisation has been able to occur without violence, there is a transition or in some cases a return from a centrally planned economy to a market economy system. However, the measures have – in the short- or long-term – clearly led to a worsening of the economic situation. The ILO intends to provide support to these countries to help them overcome this difficult transitional period, laying special emphasis on the social dimension.

As a direct neighbour of those countries which are now undergoing transition, Austria especially appreciates the endeavours of the ILO. We intend to increase our support for the Organisation. We also want to place the experience we have gained in labour market monitoring and social security at the disposal of the Organisation.

Due to its geographical situation Austria is directly and greatly affected by the changes in the former Eastern bloc countries. In other words the Austrian labour market has been faced with a growing number of workers who have sought work in our own market after the opening of the borders.

In January 1991, Austria took the initiative of holding the Council of Europe Conference on Migration, in Vienna. Two major problems were highlighted during the discussions: first, the Austrian labour market is faced with clandestine labour which undermines competition; second, the imbalance in the labour market of countries undergoing transition is threatening the economy of these countries. Both developments are potential causes of social tension. A political solution is necessary to resolve these problems.

As Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, I have adopted effective measures to counter these trends. Strongs steps have been taken to curb clandestine labour, which harms our own workers. The Ministry has also established a programme to help Eastern European countries which covers such areas as: the training and re-training of workers; support and advice in establishing labour market structures; employment projects for unemployed young people; training of workers' representatives; seminars on the establishment of employment offices and accompanying measures to prevent and limit unemployment.

We have, for example, started programmes with Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Romania, Poland and the former USSR and also implemented training programmes that go beyond national borders.

In tourism, particularly, the existing structure may be used to provide training possibilities. This also applies to industrial manufacturing process, in which skilled workers may obtain the necessary know-how through training to be able to work with new technologies. It is essential that alongside such specific measures for individual branches of activity, assistance should be given to help certain structures. These should include an effective labour market administration as well as information on ways to introduce democratic workers' representatives in the countries undergoing reform.

We all know that labour and capital determined the recovery of Western Europe in 1945. In Austria, since the end of the Second World War, there has been a specific system of economic and social dialogue involving the social partners. This is based on the principle of an economic and social partnership, which tries to seek a peaceful alternative to disputes through negotiation. The positive experiences of the system might be of use to young democracies.

It is also understandable that in a tripartite organisation such as the ILO, the social partnership element plays a major role in attempts to achieve democratic ideals. Austria, which, as described above, has a system of cooperation between government, workers' and employers' organisations in virtually all areas of politics, naturally supports these efforts.

The Director-General emphasises in his Report that there is no clearly marked or obvious path for social partnership. Moreover, the basic positions of individual countries differ greatly. In many cases their political resentments cannot be dispelled overnight. In addition, there are structural problems such as the lack of skilled managers. We should also not overlook the difficulties the trade unions are encountering in coming to grips with new problems. They often do not have the necessary know-how, experience and strength to take up the task of collective bargaining.

I hope therefore that the methods of assistance that Austria has introduced, as well as the steps that the ILO has taken, will lead to rapid and smooth economic recovery in the countries undergoing reforms and that this will be accompanied by social peace and balance.

Original – German: Mr. THIEL (representative of the International Social Security Association) – It is a very great honour and privilege for me to address the pleanary of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the International Social Security Association.

The ISSA, since its inception, has become a worldwide organisation with over 300 members from almost 130 different countries. These facts confirm once again the rightness and the need for this association through its ten standing technical committees and specific research activities which constantly tackles the problems of social security in an attempt to find solutions or proposals for solutions.

Moreover, the ISSA has developed regional action programmes to provide specific and direct assistance to its members in the various countries.

All these activities can, however, be brought to fruition only because the close cooperation and work of all members in the form of comparative studies, specific analyses and research projects which provide constantly updated information on all aspects of questions concerning social security.

As the Chairman of the Standing Technical Committee on the Prevention of Accidents and Occupational Diseases I know from a number of meetings, seminars, round-table discussions and working groups that the role of the ISSA as a source of information is recognised and valued throughout the world. But the high quality and density of expert knowledge also bring home quite clearly the problems which we will have to give the greatest attention to in the years.

I should like to highlight, in particular, two problems. More and more frequently the principle of social security is the subject of discussion. Observations on such basic areas as financing, minimum benefits, private insurance, privatisation at the national level or the necessary and positive efforts towards harmonisation at the international level, suggest, among other things, that the upheavals we have been experiencing in recent years and are still experiencing are more likely to undermine – than change – present social systems which are the essence of every State.

What will be decisive in the coming years will be how this challenge on the threshold of the century will be met throughout the globe. It must be the aim of all of us to offer all people in all countries and on all the continents of the globe adequate social security. In the creation of a new economic space, which will depend on market criteria, social and humanitarian principles must be taken into account as equal partners.

I hope you will understand that these problems which I have just mentioned cannot be examined in detail because of the lack of time. However, the fact remains that these problems can be solved and must be solved, because if not, then we shall be confronted with enormous and far-reaching problems which will reduce to nothing the leeway which we still have today. To work together towards joint solutions means to be ready to accept compromises and changes for the sake and benefit of the community and mankind as a whole.

The social networks of States throughout the world must be sufficiently elastic to allow them to be interwoven at the edges with other contiguous networks. This means that they must have a similar width of mesh, and be made of similar materials.

These comparisons with the technical meshing of nets lead me now to a second subject concerning the consequences of deficiences at the technical level: namely industrial disasters.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General and his colleagues on the detailed report they have prepared on the prevention of industrial disasters. It clearly shows the path that we must follow if we are to live a safe and healthy life.

A whole series of horrendous disasters over the past few years has shown that we must still be prepared to invest time and money into safety. There are many reasons for these disasters, ranging from lack of investment in maintenance and technical developments to low-level technology and human error. Alongside the observance of technical provisions and priority considerations for the environment, the driving force behind our action must be the protection of human life. Thousands of people have been killed or seriously injured for life on account of technical errors; thousands of human lives have been shattered. The last in a tragic series of disasters – which include Seveso, Mexico, Bhopal, Chernobyl and Basle – was the explosion in Guadalajara in Mexico, resulting in 2,000 dead, about 2,000 seriously injured, 5,000 homeless and a total cost of about US$7 billion in damage.

We, inhabitants of this planet, must therefore realise that accidents transcend all frontiers; that we must provide technological and financial assistance in the area of prevention. But this is not enough. All institutions, organisations and countries, involved in scientific and technical activities, must coordinate their work and develop further systems to prevent or totally do away with this threat to mankind; in this way, we can also minimise potential dangers or disaster spreading from other countries.

In this context I would like to refer to the refer to the 13th World Congress for Occupational Safety and Health, which will be held in New Delhi from 4 to 8 April 1993. It will be jointly organised by the ISSA and the ILO. Two thousand participants are expected to attend this Congress which will concentrate on matters such as safety at work, occupational medicine and subjects dealing with technical safety structures – in other words practical safety measures. I am persuaded that this Congress, last held in 1989 in Hamburg, will constitute a major event. On behalf of the National Safety Council of India and the Indian Ministry of Labour I should like to invite you all to come to New Delhi.

I should now like to return to my initial remarks. During the past decade, the world has been growing smaller. Given the vast number and complexity of problems, we are unable to cope with them in isolation. We must try and overcome them by exchanging information and working closely together; indeed, this is vital. At this point I should like to refer to the rapid development of chemical substances and point out that the combined effects of many of these are still unknown.

Technological and social systems are becoming increasingly unstable and only joint action will allow us to survive. It has always been a goal – and must still be a goal, to strive for maximum well-being. If this goal were to be undermined, we should all have to face the fearful consequences.

We must bear in mind the words of Mr. Boutros Ghali at the opening of the Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro. He said that our understanding of progress and development should change. In the future, development would only imply satisfying needs of the present; and an attempt not to erode prospects for the future. In his opening speech he stressed that: "Never will so much depend on what you do or do not do here – for your selves, for others, for your children and grand-children, for the planet – for life in all its interdependent form."

Original – English: Mr. FALBR (Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia) – First of all, my sincere congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the significant and responsible position of the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, and best wishes for success.

We have studied thoroughly the reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body submitted to this session and consider them to be very good. We consider the subject of the Director-General's Report very important and topical; democratisation is of great interest to our unions. The issues of tripartite relations, protection of human and trade union rights, the social aspects of economic reforms in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, as well as the defence of newly gained democracy in our societies – these are the basic pillars of activity of the Czech and Slovak Confederation of Trade Unions (CS KOS).

One of our main aims, which we set two years ago, was a full restoration of the genuine role of trade unions, discredited during the past forty years. By this we mean a real and active role in all questions involving workers in their jobs and lives. Our task is complicated by the fact that the present period of transition brings about so many problems having impact on the life of every citizen of our country.

I do not want to exaggerate, but it is a fact that, in spite of the situation, the CS KOS has recently boosted its authority and secured not a small measure of prestige within the Czechoslovak society as a whole. In spite of a number of difficulties, we have been able to influence the adoption of new legislation on freedom of association, collective bargaining and wages, as well as amendments to the Labour Code, which undoubtedly means that we are successfully defending the interests of our members. We initiated the establishment of the Economic and Social Pact Councils, tripartite bodies at the level of the federation and in both republics; for the time being, these bodies are an important platform for negotiation, discussion and the search of common positions in the formulation of fundamental social and legal documents and measures. In the framework of this tripartite mechanism, we succeeded in concluding the general agreements for 1991 and 1992, creating a basic framework for collective bargaining on various levels. In this connection we have to say, however, that in spite of the results achieved, the principle of tripartite negotiations has been sometimes questioned by some of the members of the present and previous Governments. As a matter of fact, we have had even greater problems with our Parliament. Without wishing to offend the representatives of our employers here present, I must emphasise that one of our big problem in these negotiations is still the absence of genuine employers' organisations. We hope the process of privatisation will help to create them.

In spite of our general agreement with the economic reform, the CS KOS has many critical objections in respect of its social impacts. We have never hesitated to express our deep disagreement with measures proposed by the Government and the Parliament which were motivated by other than economic reason. Our representation concerning the Screening Act is a testimony of our will to respect all the Conventions our State has ratified. According to our data, the real income of the population dropped during the first year of the reform by 25 per cent, and the average real wage was lower by 24.3 per cent when compared with the year 1991. The rate of unemployment has reached 6 per cent in Czechoslovakia as a whole, and in Slovakia it is 12 per cent. There is a real threat that these problems will grow worse this year. It is expected that unemployment in Czechoslovakia as a whole will reach the figure of one million unemployed, which represents 15 per cent of the working population.

It is evident that in spite of our warnings the Government has prepared sufficiently neither programmes for the restructuring of individual industries and regions nor programmes of retraining and job creation for those who lost their jobs or were never able one to find one after leaving school. Here we see one of our most important tasks for the future, a broad participation in creating retraining and vocational training programmes and in improving the occupational skill of all the workers who will not be involved in the programmes of early retirement. Of course, we also hope to be active in creating new systems of social security in our country.

Another important issue that the CS KOS is now facing is privatisation. According to the scenario of our economic reform, privatisation should be the main remedy for all the existing difficulties. We fully support privatisation when the newly privatised enterprises and plants promise to be much more effective and more sensitive to the needs of consumers. We did not object to the privatisation of small shops and services which had always been private in other countries. The privatisation of large enterprises, however, is another question. We simply do not agree with the idea that the only remedy for making enterprises effective is their privatisation. We feel that our main problem is poor management. We are of the opinion that the State has an important role to play in the transition period. The market can solve many problems and existing discrepancies, but so far it has failed to solve absolutely everything. We want a greater participation in decisions on privatisation. We want public control of privatisation. Step by step we strive to increase our weight in negotiations with foreign investors; our aim is to ensure that our workers will enjoy also the security of stable employement and acceptable working conditions.

In this connection we face another very significant problem in the public sector. This sector, as many of you certainly know, was, unlike the public sector of other countries of Central and Eastern Europe, fully in the hands of the State. Thus, in the framework of privatisation, there is also another important task for our trade unions: to participate in drawing a clear line between private and public and in creating a new and operative infrastructure which will efficiently serve the private sector. We fully support the conclusions of the Prague Congress of the European Public Services Committee and the European Charter of Public Services it approved.

We think that the social responsibility of the trade unions is irreplaceable. At the same time we realise that any direct actions of confrontation are double-edged. We are of the opinion that an basic approach must be the systematic enforcement of social dialogue and an insistence on the social dimension as a main precondition for the success of our economic reform. At present, after general elections held barely a week ago, our situation has been complicated by the fact that we do not know whether the new Government in our country will be inclined to listen to the voice of trade unions, at least to the extent that the former Government did. In any case we need social peace and the strengthening of deep democratic principles in our country, so neither social demagogy nor real poverty will lead to the blocking of current reforms.

Permit me to say a few words about a topic of extreme interest regarding the situation in Czechoslovakia after the elections.

First, the CS KOS had welcomed the extensive participation of our citizens in the elections. No one can have any doubts about the fact that all of the three Parliaments were elected democratically. While in the Czech Republic the majority of the citizens backed the policy of the Government, in the Slovak Republic the winning parties support the reforms but have certain fundamental objections.

At the same time it is necessary to emphasise that in Slovakia parties which do not favour a federal State in the existing form drew much of the vote. If there is no agreement on a looser organisation of our State, we cannot exclude the possibility that it will break up. CS KOS recognises and respects the right of the Slovaks to formulate and realise their own wishes, and refuses to qualify such wishes as undemocratic and catastrophic. We express the hope that the negotiations will be successful. But if an agreement is not reached, we see as our main task the dignified and friendly division of our nations, opposition to any manifestation of chauvinism, intolerance and xenophobia, and the protection of democracy and human rights. Our common path, common links and existing friendly relations are a commitment for all of us.

Original – French: Mr. ALLINI (Workers' delegate, Gabon) – Allow me, on behalf of the workers of Gabon, to congratulate the President most sincerely on his brilliant election to chair the 79th Session of the Conference. I should also like to congratulate the other Officers.

I am convinced that with their experience the work of this session will take place in good conditions and will lead to fruitful conclusions which will further enrich the work of the Conference.

I would also like to express my appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO for having chosen as a topic for discussion this year Democratisation and the ILO, and for the acute sense of social progress he has shown in the Reports dealing with structural adjustment, human resources, the protection of workers' claims and minimum wages.

For many years now, the workers' delegates of Gabon have hoped political democracy could be complemented by genuine tripartism in our States, since the people cannot make themselves heard through political channels alone in a democracy plagued with aggression of all sorts and destruction.

We strongly reaffirm our desire to see the participation of social partners become a reality, or even one of the conditions for granting aid and maintaining trade and economic relations with the countries of the Third World. Such was the case for the return to the multipartite democracy.

For us, the difference between one-party governments and those resulting from pluralist elections is just a matter of form. It is another dilemma altogether to see our peoples becoming resigned to a growing debt, unemployment, poverty and the loss or late payment of salaries which are becoming common practice in many countries. The loss of social gains and of fledgling industrial bases means not just stagnation, but also decline.

What framework do we have which permits us to recover what we are now losing, until we are able to make up for the time lost and boost growth?

While democracy is a new way of living, a new way of acting – in a nutshell, a novelty for us – the various candidates are not new faces. The people know them all. For us, only new institutions safeguarding democracy can rekindle trust and provide the best opportunity for economic recovery.

We believe that only a well though-out economy, functioning in peaceful conditions and well managed with everyone's participation, can create jobs and guarantee the well-being of the people.

In terms of employment, production, exports and social protection, what do the statistics of the UNDP, OECD, UNIDO and the ILO tell us about the period since nearly three years ago when the African countries embarked on the democratisation of their regimes? The cost is making things worse where they were already exceedingly bad. There is no good news. And we have reason to believe that nothing will be better than before, and that the entire debate will always be held between "insiders". We should like to recall that the development of the mind must come first because education and training through tripartite symposia and seminars are the beginning of the solution which will take us out of this mire.

We believe that it is essential to educate and to introduce morals into public life. These activities are quite rightly becoming the ILO's contribution to establishing democracy on a more firm basis. It will be all the more beneficial when all citizens acquire a sense of civil responsibility and when the pursued ideal is the well-being of the people rather than a race for jobs, which worsens the situation. It is only at this price that security can prevail, that the social climate can be stabilised, and guaranteed employment for all can become a watchword.

The protection of workers' claims in the event of their employers' insolvency is a pressing and urgent issue. The reasons for stopping activities are today manifold – from bad management to the effects of the economic crisis, and including the consequences of recommendations of the IMF and the World Bank.

Obviously, many abuses can be committed based on these reasons. The only sure protection which remains is the adoption of a Convention in this regard, and then the establishment in each country of mechanisms for its ratification and its effective application.

We are especially interested in structural adjustment and the enhancement of human resources.

The IMF and the World Bank models call for cutbacks, or lay-offs, instead of advocating a new driving force to boost employment. They recommend the closure or privatisation of undertakings instead of encouraging healthy competition. As far as we know, institutions such as the IMF and the World Bank were created to support any country in difficulty. But what we do not understand is how they can foresee an economic recovery while laying off workers and reducing consumption and, with it, production.

We request the Governing Body and the Director-General to listen carefully to the voice of the Third World, as it was expressed at the high-level meeting in November 1987, and in the symposia of October 1989 in Nairobi and August 1991 in Caracas.

On each of these occasions, a request was made to associate the partners and to introduce some discipline, even minimally, into the informal sector. The meetings mentioned above always insisted on the need to take specific measures in favour of the weakest and most vulnerable social groups so as to avoid an ever worse collapse of their standard of living.

Apart from protecting such groups, we see that it is essential to involve them whenever decisions are made which concern them. This will enable them to acquire responsibility and stature, and thus avoid a feeling of alienation from the conduct of the affairs of society.

The voice of the workers of Gabon will conclude with the hope that democracy, which is the only path leading to salvation, as it bears freedom and respect for human dignity and the opinions of others, will continue to profit from the assistance of the ILO and countries devoted to peace and social justice, for the benefit of all mankind.

Mr. SKOGMO (Government delegate, Norway) – I am honoured to have this opportunity to address the International Labour Conference. We would like congratulate the President upon his election to this important position. We feel certain that he will guide us safety through our proceedings and our agenda.

The main theme for this session of the ILC International Labour Conference, Democratisation and the ILO could hardly have been more relevant and important. The Director-General deserves great credit for having produced an outstanding Report to inspire and guide our work.

We are living in an age of dynamic international change. We have seen an almost universal movement towards democracy, starting in southern Europe, spreading to Latin America, before returning to Europe to inspire the fall of communism in Central and Eastern Europe. Important developments have also taken place in Asia and in Africa. Even in South Africa, the system of apartheid and minority rule is in the process of being replaced by dialogue between the parties. We trust that this process will soon lead to a new, fully democratic Constitution in that country.

Democracy itself is a dynamic concept. The relationship between the government and the governed, between rights and responsibilities, between the State and the market, is in the process of constant evolution. Very often, this process is determined by economic and social factors, by the transition to a market economy, by the distribution or lack of distribution of economic growth, or by poverty and dissatisfaction among voters and peoples.

Democracy is a prerequisite for solving the problems of modern society, but democracy cannot do the job alone. We must continue to stress the fundamental importance of development, of establishing economic processes which can offer hope and progress to the 1 billion people presently living in absolute poverty.

Norway believes that all industrialised countries should meet the long-established ODA target of 0.7 per cent by the year 2000. A new commitment to this target is necessary to meet the demands of our global agenda for the twenty-first century. In this effort, the fight against poverty is crucial both for the environment and for development.

More just North/South cooperation is essential to combat world poverty, but governments must also undertake efforts to bring about social and economic justice at home. We must never lose sight of the need for good governance.

Sustainable development must be an integral part of the strategy to manage global change. This is one area that we found somewhat absent in the Director-General's Report, because it also affects our main theme. Sustainable development is not only about environment and development, it is also a vital part of our democracies. It is about the rights of the poor to a better, more healthy and sound environment; it is about the participation of all layers of our society in decisions affecting our common future; and it about the conservation of natural resources for future generations. We trust that the Earth Summit in Rio will make the decisions needed for a new approach to the environment and development in the years to come.

In this period of transition, the aims, the working methods and the structures of international cooperation must also adapt to the new global tasks. We would like to commend the Director-General for underlining the dynamic character of this challenge – the activities of the ILO should be part of a process of continuous adjustment.

Norway supports the priority areas suggested by the Director-General for the future work of the Organisation. The promotion and implementation of human rights should remain central to the work of the ILO. We believe that the ILO should centre its work in this field on its core objectives – the fight for social justice, for worker and employer participation in free discussions with governments, and for democratic decision-making, based on the fullest possible participation.

The ILO continues to have a special role in the field of employment, to ensure ratification and application of the standards developed by the ILO to safeguard human rights and participation in economic decision-making. It should promote the strengthening of tripartism and collective bargaining through support for the constituencies of the ILO and for labour institutions.

Let me add comments on two areas in the field of human rights – both concerning particularly vulnerable groups – where Norway feels that the ILO has a special role to play.

We would like to commend the ILO for its work for indigenous peoples, to which Norway attaches great importance. The ILO is the leading United Nations agency in this field, and the main supporter and partner for the United Nations Centre for Human Rights. We urge the Organisation to keep up its good work and to participate actively in preparations for the International Year of Indigenous Peoples in 1993.

Let me also point to the special role of the ILO in the protection of the rights of the child. The recent report on child labour contains more than enough evidence to demonstrate that the fight against child exploitation must remain one of the ILO's main priorities.

The ILO should assist in the transition to a market economy with a social dimension. We support the work done by the ILO to devise mechanisms that can soften the negative social effects of some of the structural adjustment measures applied in the transition process.

Some countries, including my own, have been practising tripartite consultations for decades. The economies in transition, which have not had an independent private sector, are now struggling to establish similar structures in their world of work.

We must be prepared to help them to cope with the new situation. In the fledgling democracies of Central and Eastern Europe, as in the developing countries, it is important that the ILO intensifies its traditional assistance to employers' and workers' organisations that are struggling to consolidate their structures. We must support efforts to establish a framework of laws and regulations guaranteeing respect for fundamental rights.

The ILO has paid particular attention to standard-setting and technical cooperation. Perhaps the time has come to fully acknowledge a third dimension, in which the old ones come together – that of policy advice.

Member States, workers and employers not only need standards and technical cooperation from the ILO. Many of them also need policy advice, inter alia, to learn from the experience of others. The ILO has such experience. We welcome efforts within the ILO to develop a strategy for dealing with such needs, and we eagerly look forward to its implementation.

Norway also supports the proposals for an expanded programme of activities related to the environment within the clear competence of the ILO.

Employment, education and training are closely linked. International cooperation will be necessary, both with regard to organisation and content. We would like to compliment the ILO for the initiatives taken within this field.

In a time of rising demands for qualifications and competence, all countries must keep their workforce as well-educated and trained as possible to maintain competitiveness. A good State primary and secondary education system, open to all layers of society, remains essential. But education in our modern societies is a continuous, lifelong task, important also for those already in the workforce. The growing necessity for occupational mobility further enhances the need to create conditions for continuous education and training of the workforce, through a good and flexible educational system that is able to interpret the signals from the market.

Women remain an underprivileged and often underpaid part of the workforce. They are vastly underrepresented in management positions and are often the first to lose their jobs. Norway supports the programmes initiated by the ILO to improve the situation of women in the working envirionment. Such programmes should be further developed.

The Report on adjustment and human resources development indicates that reduced government revenues often lead to severe cuts in education and training budgets. This is very regrettable. Education, training and investments in human resources is a necessary and cost-effective method of promoting economic development.

In Norway, we have faced growing unemployment in recent years. We have increased our capacity in higher education, both at high-school and university levels. Our Government has proposed to Parliament a new Act that will guarantee all young people the right to three years' further education following the compulsory primary and secondary school. In the years to come, a great share of new employment will have to come from the creation of new small businesses. This has to be based upon initiatives from private persons or groups of persons. The ILO's programme for entrepreneurship and management development to encourage and support entrepeneurship, is most valuable in this context.

We agree with the Director-General that the entrepreneurial spirit is a very good way of promoting democratisation.

In this age of global interdependence, there is a growing gap between opportunities for international cooperation on the one hand, and the financial resources available for such cooperation, on the other. All global institutions – including the ILO – must therefore adjust their priorities and activities to ensure optimal results.

Norway believes that the ILO could do more to concentrate its activities on its core areas, where the competence of the Organisation is unique, where it could and where it should consolidate its position as a global centre of excellence in the world of work. If operational activities are spread too wide, the Organisation and its member States inevitably receive diminishing returns.

We are convinced that the complexity of the problems with which the ILO is dealing requires a multidisciplinary approach that cuts across the departmental structure of the Office. The ILO needs flexibility in its programme planning and in the way it organises its work. We are confident that the Organisation will live up to this challenge.

Original – French: Mr. YAMALE (Minister of the Public Service, Labour, Social Security and Vocational Training, Central African Republic) – On behalf of my country, the Central African Republic, on behalf of the delegation accompanying me, and myself, I join with the eminent speakers who preceded me at this rostrum and congratulated the President on his brilliant election to chair this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I also congratulate the two Vice-Presidents called upon to assist the President in the accomplishment of his difficult and noble task.

I congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office, on the relevant choice he made for his Report: Democratisation and the ILO.

This extremely topical subject has particularly attracted our attention as democracy was at the very heart of the creation of the ILO in 1919, after the First World War.

Today, more than a half century later, the process of democratisation, which calls into question the political structures and regimes of many countries, is at the centre of the major concerns of all people who aspire to greater freedom and lasting peace.

Subjected, for more than 25 years, to a dictatorship in a one-party system, the Central African Republic has opted for full democracy since the historic declaration in 1990 of His Excellency, General André Kolingba, President of the Republic and Head of State.

Today, political and trade union pluralism has become a national reality in the Central African Republic.

This reality has been consolidated by setting up democratic institutions.

Thus, as part of this dynamic process of democratisation, 19 new political parties have been created and the law has re-established freedom of association and the protection of the right to organise. More than 60 rank and file occupational trade unions have been freely formed and have created unions and federations. Thus trade unions stretch across national territory. The trade union organisations are henceforth thus a vital part of our economic and social life.

A transparent and free social dialogue exists outside and within enterprises, and with the political and administrative authorities. Measures have been taken further to integrate trade unions into the life of enterprises.

In the same dynamic process, the Government is encouraging and supporting the organisation of seminars by trade unions in order to promote and develop trade union training and workers' education.

The Government has encouraged and supported free collective bargaining between employers and trade unions for the revision of wage scales which were frozen for more than ten years, despite some upheavals within trade unions and the reticence of the employers due to the worldwide economic crisis from which my country has not been spared.

All of these measures are in line with the provisions of the Constitution of the Central African Republic, whose principle of government is "development through labour in a democracy".

It is in these areas that we are expecting much of the ILO in the framework of its technical cooperation activities aimed at bringing about social justice in the world.

We have the firm conviction that the recovery of freedom will allow for the creation of conditions for a market economy. Freedom of association and the efficient protection of all fundamental human rights are a measure of the democratic, dynamic process which will help us to make economic and social advances.

As a young democratic country with a fragile economy, we are seeking to promote economic growth by the efficient use of our own resources and by the creation of open policy encouraging foreign investment which along side national investment will help us to optimise economic growth and maximise the possibilities for job creation on our territory.

The major reforms of our investment code, the liberalisation of trade and competition, are additional measures which are to underlie this policy.

Moreover, the Government has set up and is continuing to develop instruments and measures to promote private investment.

Thus we feel that, with international solidarity, we will be able to promote conditions in which to lay the foundations of and consolidate our institutions and create an economic and social area guaranteeing to each and all an environment which is conducive to individual growth and development.

These then are the few comments I have in connection with the excellent Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office.

I am convinced that given the competence of the President, the work of this session of the Conference shall achieve the success my delegation hopes for and which will allow the Director-General to pursue the noble tasks that we have conferred upon him.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ESPAÑA-SMITH (Employers' delegate, Bolivia) – On behalf of the Bolivian employers, I extend the warmest congratulations to the President of the Conference and to the Employer, Worker and Government Vice-Presidents, adding our wishes that under their able conduct the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference will benefit the world of work and the interests of humanity in general.

The subject which the Director-General has proposed – democracy – not only is of great and constant importance but also is highly topical in today's world.

The Bolivian Private Employers' Confederation has adopted with deep conviction a firm position of wholehearted support to democracy, and consequently advocates, as a matter of principle and in its activities, the full expression of democracy in the political, economic and social spheres. When my country languished under the yoke of one military government after another, the Bolivian Private Employers' Confederation was in 1981 the first national organisation which publicly, directly and unequivocally requested the immediate return to democracy through an appeal contained in a document which is today historical, Democracy now. Furthermore, through this appeal, it indicated the quickest and most accessible way to achieve the return to democracy, namely, to reconvene the Congress, elected by popular vote in 1980, which was unable to fulfil its mandate because of a coup d'état. This proposal, which initially was received with much scepticism, was gradually supported by almost all the political and civil sectors and represented finally the channel through which the democratic and constitutional government was reinstated in Bolivia ten years ago. The main organisation of Bolivian employers has actively endorsed the continuity and reaffirmation of the Bolivian democratic process during its uninterrupted decade of existence.

As the Report of the Director-General aptly states, "democratisation is nearly always accompanied by a change of economic system". This also occurred in Bolivia. Once the democratic regime was re-established, inertia initially sent the country into a catastrophic process of hyperinflation, caused, inter alia, by following the path of a worn-out model of inorganic protectionism and excessive state capitalism. However, the legitimacy and the alternability which democracy grants in the act of governing enabled it to re-establish the process and apply in 1985 a severe and successful programme of structural adjustment and to set up an open, market economy. Without the presence of a democratic government it would have been impossible to apply a programme of deep economic reforms without much violence.

The great concern regarding the social costs of structural adjustment is fully justified. Fairness dictates that these policies be designed and implemented with due account taken of both the human dimension and the economic requirements. We should not forget that the social consequences on employment and wages are not only an effect of the adjustment, but are also a result of the critical situations that the adjustment aims to correct. Moreover, we must remember that the social cost would be all the greater and rage out of control if we failed to apply the adjustment.

There is no doubt that, as the Director-General has pointed out, democracy is the guiding principle in the ILO's structure, and the method that it advocates. In fact, tripartism, when it is freely and genuinely practised, is the supreme expression of democracy in labour relations, just as pluralism is in political relations.

Tripartism is, in some countries, an ideal not yet achieved, despite the fact that almost all States are members of the ILO, and that membership implies the acceptance of the basic procedural norms enshrined in its Constitution. However, tripartism in many countries of the world is not an ongoing practice, is not a custom which is genuinely applied with sufficient openness and good faith. My country, Bolivia, is still far from reaching this ideal. The tripartite formula is frequently replaced by unilateral government orders. Sometimes governments act jointly with one of the social partners, to the detriment of the other. This occurred recently when the Government of Bolivia and the Bolivian Workers' Confederation signed an agreement that claimed to involve the employers without the participation of the employers or any consultation.

In our view, the standards and procedures which govern labour relations will be more democratic to the extent that, before prescribing coercive measures, the Government gives the social partners every opportunity to engage in dialogue and to resolve their differences. In this scenario it is not desirable for the authorities to interfere. Their intervention is legitimate and welcome only when they have to ensure compliance with the law or sanction its infraction. In this connection I would like to highlight the social utility and the effectiveness of collective bagaining, provided that, in accordance with international labour standards and their proper interpretation, such bargaining is carried out freely, voluntarily, and subject to the principle of legality, leaving the social partners to determine the agenda and the level at which it is carried out, either in individual undertakings or in a joint or sectoral manner. We believe that the ILO could intensify its work to assist in this area to achieve a full understanding and exercise of this institution in countries where it is not yet much practised.

The Report of the Director-General emphasises – inevitably – the generalised trend in our days towards a market economy. One of the characteristics of a market economy, as we all know, is to achieve the greatest deregulation possible. This trend should also apply to the field of labour relations. I mean that the ILO should remain in step with the times and avoid a proliferation of standards. I repeat here the suggestion that, instead of devoting all our efforts to a continuous increase in the number of standards, we should focus on consolidating what we have already achieved, which implies reviewing, perfecting, modernising and truly universalising existing standards, depending on their value and current utility, and taking also into special account the number of ratifications and their foreseeable potential, all this with a clear objective of social protection which is realistic and effective.

The ILO, in its worthy support of democracy and democratisation will act more wisely if its actions promote these values through training, information and creating awareness. We agree that "a system of laws is ineffrectual if not coupled with a system of education", and that it is necessary to make "a realstic assessment of the economic situation", as noted in the Report. A greater activity of the ILO based on these principles will facilitate true and reasoned adherence to democratic principles and will help to prevent attitudes which are incompatible with the spirit of democracy, such, as the unfortunate attitude exhibited at the last congress of the Bolivian trade union confederation, which a few days ago adopted an openly subversive platform and, for good measure, approved a boycott of the national population and housing census. These attitudes are not good for the philosophy and the instruments of democracy.

In closing, I would like to say that the objectives of information, training and awareness, will require ongoing dialogue between the ILO and its tripartite constituents, as the Director-General himself has noted. Let us hope that this will be for the benefit of all, and that this dialogue at national level will be more fluent, not only between the ILO and the governments, but also between the ILO and the workers' and employers' organisations concerned.

Original – Turkish: Mr. YILMAZ (Workers' delegate, Turkey) – At the outset of my speech, on behalf of myself and the Confederation of Turkish Workers' Unions, TURK-IS, please allow me to congratulate the President most sincerely on his election.

May I also take this opportunity to extend my congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, for the excellent report he has submitted to this Session of the Conference for discussion.

The Report of the Director-General rightfully indicates that due to the recent dramatic changes in the political climate of the world, totalitarian and authoritarian regimes have disappeared. But on the other hand, he further points out that, in this process of democratisation, economic and social problems are also intensified. This correct diagnosis is a global invitation to be more sensitive on these problems.

We are living in an unbalanced world. While on one hand the technological revolution is offering unprecedented prosperity to citizens of developed countries, on the other hand, millions of people are starving to death in other parts of the world. It is a regretful fact that in some countries with a lesser degree of economic development, social peace is shattered and the foundations of democracy deplorably destroyed.

Therefore, it is our duty to fight vigorously any possibility which might endanger democracy anywhere. In this rapidly changing world, we urgently need a new socio-economic order, which respects and is dedicated to human rights, protection and improvement of the environment, and to the ideals of democracy. It must be emphasised that every single person has a responsibility to create an atmosphere where all peoples of the world will be able to live freely and fraternally in lasting peace and prosperity.

The pace of technological change is very rapid. How will the relations between such innovations and humanity affect life and change social balances? These questions are still awaiting answers.

My country, Turkey, has often been on the ILO agenda over the last ten years regarding various violations of human rights and freedoms, in particular the freedom of association.

You all know that during those ten years, we, the Turkish workers, have been fighting vigorously for our democratic rights on this rostrum and on the other ILO platforms, hand-in-hand with the ICFTU and the ITSs.

Previous governments have done very little except make some cosmetic changes and have beguiled all of us, wasting precious time. You will remember that, consequently, here we have criticised these governments very strongly.

The new coalition Government has initiated a process of democratisation, as defined by the Director-General in his Report. In this process, the main sources of our complaints, such as the restrictions on trade union rights and freedoms in the 1982 Constitution, and the suffocating legislation on trade unions, collective agreements and strikes are expected to be dealt with as priority subjects.

In this context, ILO Conventions Nos. 87, 135, 151 and 158 have been forwarded to Parliament for ratification. We welcome this initiative as a hopeful step forward.

I am pleased and proud to note that we reached this point through the valiant struggle of Turkish workers and their trade unions in cooperation with the ICFTU and the ITSs.

However, I should like to point out that, in spite of this optimistic picture, we have not yet reached any substantial and concrete results.

TURK-IS still insists that all the suppressive provisions in Turkish legislation should be removed immediately, such as those which restrict the right of free collective bargaining, limit the freedom of association, restrict or prohibit the right to strike or curtail the use of trade union rights.

I am convinced that this is imperative for the democratisation process in Turkey and therefore I invite the Government to take concrete steps to this end. I must also indicate that we support the Government's positive initiatives to start a tripartite consultation process, in line with ILO principles on two most fundamental issues – the protection of workers against unfair dismissal, and the establishment of unemployment insurance.

As you can see, this year I am referring to positive developments in my country and making and optimistic speech, and I am especially happy to note that we have reached this point through the long democratic struggle of Turkish workers, in particular, and the Turkish people in general.

However, as the ILO knows, previous governments also painted such promising pictures but then betrayed all hopes and led us into lamentable disappointments. Keeping these bitter experiences in mind, we are now expecting the present Government to implement the political goodwill that has so far been declared. I should especially like to indicate that the ILO could make notable contributions in this direction. The ILO has a dual role in helping governments to turn their political goodwill into action through enlightening them and supervising implementation of appropriate measures.

The ILO has always fulfilled its duty of enlightening and inspiring Turkish governments. I now hope that the present Government will take the necessary inspiration from this function of the ILO. Naturally, I further insist that the ILO should also effectively supervise the Government's implementation of the measures needed. This is what we expect above all from the ILO at this stage.

I continue to hope that next year I shall be able to address the session of the Conference as the Workers' delegate of a country where democracy is fully operational. In order to fulfil this hope, please allow me to repeat that we are looking forward to the continued support and solidarity of the ILO and the international trade union movement represented by the ICFTU which have been invaluable to our struggle so far.

Mr. OWUOR (representative of the Pan-African Employers' Confederation) – May I, on behalf of the Pan-African Employers' Confederation congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his unanimous election as the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. It is my delegation's hope that the Conference will come to a successful conclusion under his wise guidance.

The Director-General should be congratulated on the choice of the theme of democratisation and the ILO. As he notes on page 11 of his Report, "the transition from authoritarianism to democracy is fraught with dangers", both at the political and economic levels.

The 1990 African Charter for Popular Participation in Developent and Transformation referred to in the Director-General's Report which urged all governments to vigorously implement the ILO's Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), opened the way for closer cooperation among the social partners in Africa in the social field. We share the Director-General's concern but the mere existence of employers' and workers' organisations does not constitute genuine participation in social affairs unless they are actually involved in the social and political life of a nation.

In many developing countries, the vital social role of organised emplloyers has not been given due attention by governments. This is despite the fact that the enterprise, as noted on page 51 of the Report, is the creator of wealth and the provider of jobs. We, therefore, laud the Director-General for acknowledging in the Report that employers' organisations are the driving force of a country's economy as they play a promenent role not only in the rational allocation of resources and the accumulation of national wealth, but also in stimulating individual initiative, in proving management competence and promoting vocational training. In order to break the chain of economic stagnation and political instability in Africa, we need a missing link. One of the missing links in African social development has been the lack of strong, independent, representative and politically relevant institutional structures of employers that are capable of engaging their governments in effective social and economic dialogue.

In this respect, my Confederation is committed to the creation and development of strong and independent national and sub-regional employers' organisations. Already, 31 national African employers' organisations have joined the Confederation and its programme of action includes strengthening national employers' bodies as well as creating subregional employers' blocks where they do not exist. The Confederation also expects to act as a clearing-house of information on economic and social development in Africa. Its future participation in the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) labour commission meetings as well as its association with both the ILO and the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) will enable the Confederation to fulfil its principal objectives of assisting employers' associations.

Turning to the activities of the ILO in 1991, my delegation would like to urge the ILO to increase its budgetary allocation to the Bureau for Employers' Activities in order to enable this division to strengthen the role of employers at both national and regional levels in the social development of society. Of particular interest to employers from Africa, would be technical assistance that would enable them to strengthen their institutional capacity with a view to ensuring the long-term self-sustainability of their activities, management training, environmental education, vocational training and entrepreneurship development. In this regard, the ILO should be congratulated for providing fellowships to executives of employers' organisations in Africa to study the activities of their more advanced sister organisations as a way of promoting South-South cooperation, organising regional and national seminars for the exchange of ideas on labour matters and promoting entrepreneurship development and management training in the African region.

The ILO also cooperated with the Pan-African Employers' Confederation, the Federation of Egyptian Industries and the International Organisation of Employers in organising a very successful seminar in Cairo in May 1991 on the privatisation of the African economy. One of the main conclusions of this meeting was that, to ensure that the process of privatisation is properly executed, it is essential that national schemes be carefully planned and well-studied with shared responsibilities between the social partners, especially in matters of management training, development of financial markets, elimination of bureaucratic red tape and formation of appropriate macroeconomic policies, all of which are essential for the functioning of a market economy.

The ILO should also be congratulated on organising, together with the International Organisation of Employers and the Pan-African Employers' Confederation, a meeting in Harare in January 1992 of the South African representative employers' organisations with a view to encouraging them to form a non-racial umbrella employers' body in line with the conclusions of the 78th Session of the International Labour Conference. At the Harare meeting, the three South African employers' organisations, namely the Foundation of African Business and Consumer Organisations (FABCOS), the National African Federated Chambers of Commerce (NAFCOC) and the South African Employers' Consultative Committee on Labour Affairs (SACCOLA), expressed their agreement in principle with the creation of such an organisation.

The ILO has also extended its diplomatic support to the efforts made by both the Pan-African Employers' Confederation and the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) to transform the OAU Labour Commission into a tripartite body.

These efforts have borne fruit. At the 15th Ordinary Session of the OAU Labour Commission held in Addis Ababa in May 1992, the Commission transformed itself into a tripartite organ composed of delegations of governments and the most representative employers' and workers' organisations. For the first time, employers and workers will be allowed to vote independently of their governments in all future commission sessions. This historic decision is a reflection of the democratisation process sweeping across the continent.

Africa is undergoing its most difficult period within the last 30 years. Apart from economic difficulties caused by the grinding external debt crisis, deteriorating terms of trade, social upheavals brought about by the hurried pace of structural reforms, many African countries are suffering from the most severe drought in living memory. It is estimated that in the Horn of Africa alone some 23 million people are faced with starvation. Their plight has been exacerbated by the massive refugee problem caused by civil disorder.

May I therefore conclude by appealing to the world community, including the ILO, to give urgent assistance to the refugees who have been displaced by both drought and civil disorder, not only in the Horn of Africa but also elsewhere in Africa.

Original – French: Mr. MARCELIN (Workers' delegate, Haiti) – On behalf of the workers of Haiti, I should like to express here my heartfelt congratulations upon his election to the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, organised under the auspices of the International Labour Organisation of which my country is a Member.

In 1986 the dictator Jean-Claude Duvalier, son of the despot François Duvalier, had, due to popular pressure, to give up power in my country. Since it was just a mere uprising, he had the time to have himself replaced by his own disciples and those of his father.

The political and economic instability lasted four long years – five presidents from 1986 to 1990. Thus, the ILO has continually had to interrupt its programme in the country and begin again sometimes from the beginning. It was almost impossible for trade unions to tackle seriously on a legal or practical basis the major problems facing the workers.

Thus, the organisation of free and democratic elections, theoretically obligatory for economic and political stability, became one of the major objectives of the sectors connected with the Haitian working class.

It is for this reason that two years ago at this rostrum, on behalf of the workers and people of Haiti, I asked the member States of the ILO, as well as the members of the specialised United Nations bodies not only to assist us in organising elections, which were set then for the end of 1990, but also to take up and strengthen ILO programmes in Haiti.

Unfortunately, the ILO has not had the time to take up these programmes again since on 30 September 1991 the news, incredible but true, broke that there had been a coup d'état in Haiti against the first President to be freely, democratically and overwhelmingly elected in Haiti, the Reverend Jean Bertrand Aristide. The result: 3,000 deaths and more than 100,000 injured, a total of more than 103,000 direct victims, that is nearly 2 per cent of the total population of the country. An estimate which continues to grow daily. Some of the injured were killed in their hospital beds by the military. This tragedy was confirmed by physicians' associations which were prohibited from tending the victims who came mainly from the highly-populated districts. Trade unionists, socio-professional and popular organisations are still underground.

The main objective of this coup d'état is and remains the direct control of States machinery by the traditional and obsolete political class of Haiti, openly supported by some members of the international community in order to re-establish the political and economic order of the status quo.

The military and local oligarchy continue, apparently through the de facto Executive, to consolidate their power, scorning the aspirations of the Haitian nation and trampling on the most fundamental human rights.

The peasantry is one of the sectors most seriously affected by this state terrorism. In defiance of the Haitian Constitution, the illegal, illegitimate and unconstitutional Executive is re-establishing the system of rural section chiefs, with the right to decide on the life or death of the inhabitants of the district, with a small militia at hand or even sometimes a private prison, free to steal the livestock and pillage the rural workers' harvests.

The press, Parliament, schools and university faculties function whilst threatened by persons wielding guns. Trade union organisations and even non-affiliated workers are each day direct of indirect victims of the repressive policy enforced since the coup d'état. The few cases I will mention speak volumes: 20 October 1991, the arrest of Manuci Pierre, leader of CATH (Centrale Autonome des Travailleurs Haitiens); 14 December 1991, arrest of Evens Sainturné and Abel Point-du-Jour, leader of FESTRED'H (Fédération des Syndicats de Travailleurs et d'Employés de l'Electricité d'Haiti); 2 January 1991, arrest and torture of Jean Charles, known as Claudy, member of CNEH (Confédération Nationale des Enseignants d'Haiti). He died on 6 January as a result of the torture to which he had been subjected; 30 May 1992, the brother and mother of Suzette Morisseau, leader of the women's section of OGITH (Organisation Générale Indépendante des Travailleurs(euses) d'Haiti), were struck down in cold blood by the military. People close to the CGT (Central des Travailleurs Haitiens), have been arrested.

As far as the social and political situation is concerned, for eight months now administrative chaos, the shelving of all development projects initiated since February 1991, the effects of the slow and awkward application of the embargo against the putschists, have all helped to drain the poor economic resources of the country.

Many enterprises have gone bankrupt because of the institutionalisation of contraband, thus leaving thousands of workers, both men and women, unemployed. Let us not even mention the increased cost of living, the lack of variety of basic foodstuffs, the disturbing rapid environmental degradation, mass dismissals without legal representation, the militarisation of the working environment, as well as the serious decline in the Population's state of health, exposed to all types of illnesses due to a breakdown in refuse and public health services, and the use of poisonous oil products, etc.

In order to flee this repression, which no speech could describe, each week thousands of Haitians – men, women and children – go to the Dominican Republican, the neighbouring Republic, where they embark upon small sailboats heading for the United States.

Some do not reach their destination, and do not return. Others are kept in the American military camp, Guantanamo, to prevent them from reaching the coast of Florida.

A few days ago, as a solution to this tragedy, the President of the United States, Mr. George Bush, found nothing better nor more suitable to do than decide simply to send back, immediately, Haitian refugees stranded on the high seas, without giving them any possibility to present to the American immigation authorities the reasons why they had embarked upon such a dangerous voyage.

The Conference is dealing with three themes that I consider to be of special importance this year for our countries. At the end of the Conference, conclusions will be drawn from the discussion of these subjects. These conclusions, which will probably take the form of Recommendation or Conventions, will benefit our peoples because they will be aimed at improving their living and working conditions.

However, despite the noble character of our work, I cannot prevent myself from expressing my deep concern for the workers and the people of Haiti, since they may never be able to benefit in concrete terms from the advantages of this work. The political and military authorities of my country are now systematically denying the impoverished masses of Haiti the right to life.

That is why, while encouraging you to continue your work, I invite you, the friends of the people of Haiti, to make an additional gesture – that of supporting the struggle for democracy of the Haitian workers and people.

In my capacity as Secretary-General of the Organisation Générale Indépendante des Travailleurs(euses) d'Haiti (OGITH), and especially as the delegate representing all Haitian workers, allow me to make some proposals.

We ask the international trade union organisations, such as the ICFTU, the WCL and the WFTU, which have condemned this brutal breach of democracy and the violations of trade union and human rights which accompanied the coup d'état, to strengthen their positions so that they have an immediate effect on this state of affairs, which cannot last any longer.

As spokesman for the workers and trade unions of Haiti and the Haitian trade unionists in exile, I am asking you to make every effort in order to stand by them at this very painful time.

We encourage the delegates and workers present to convince their respective governments, members of the United Nations, to persuade the Government of the United States and its Ambassador in Haiti to change their policy vis-à-vis the courageous people of Haiti, who have committed no other sin than that of wishing to recover their national dignity.

The embargo applied against the members of the coup, and not against the people, must be strengthened. International humanitarian assistance would be welcome, provided it seeks to strengthen the embargo until the return to constitutional order, with the reinstatement of His Excellency President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in the exercise of his functions as stipulated by the Constitution.

The workers, the trade unions and the people of Haiti are committed to stand by President Jean-Bertrand Aristide and the Government of his Prime Minister in the difficult task of starting again a democratic process, aimed at establishing a state based on the rule of law and a just society in Haiti.

The impoverished peoples of the world expect much from the ILO. The workers, the trade unions and the people of Haiti, all the more so, expect a great deal from this Conference. I sincerely hope that this Conference may promote the cause of democracy and social justice in Haiti and in every place inhabited by man.

Original – French: Mr. VITTORI (representative of Pax Christi International) – I would like to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of the Conference. Pax Christi International has just held its international biannual congress in his country. I am particularly happy to contratulate him on his election as President of the Conference.

The contribution of Portugal to peace agreements in Angola, which opened the path towards democracy, and the obstinate action of the Portuguese Government so that the people of Timor may choose their fate democratically, are welcomed by my organisation.

In the same spirit we have read the Director-General's report. Democracy, which is its theme, is in fact the basis on which one can build the peace, justice and the respect of political, economic, social and cultural rights of man.

But universal suffrage has experienced in certain cases a regrettable percentage of abstentions, and power winds up in the hands of the majority of a minority. We must not forget, moreover, the advantage of those who can, through money or contacts, gain access to media. It is when those in power consult the people that democracy is genuine.

No sooner has "political freedom been established than the people feel more destitute than ever before." This is what the Director-General points out regarding certain countries in transition towards democracy. But how is it possible to apply on a national level a right which has never been applied on a smaller scale? democracy begins in groups which are close to those who are called upon to exercise it.

Trade unions, when they are politically and religiously independent, are schools for democracy. The same applies to the NGOs which, mandated by the grass-roots level, defend whole categories – tenants, consumers, parents or students – or advocate the promotion of specific rights, safeguarding of the environment, popular culture, etc.

It is what the President has called "the democracy of participation". The Director-General suggests along the same line to "welcome the principle of subsidiarity, which means that decisions are taken at the lowest possible level of authority". He even quotes the Managing Director of the IMF who recognises that the viability of an economic system depends on the existence of structues for dialogue and for participation, which allow for a discussion of fundamental choices.

Political democracy, which confers power on the voting majority, does not automatically guarantee justice and respect for law, when civic rights are not recognised for the majority; and that is the case in South Africa, or where sometimes important minorities are excluded, such as populations in occupied territories or foreign workers regularly established. The Director-General refers, and justly so, to the fight against discrimination. Convention No. 111 of 1958 is of a crucial importance in this respect. Its application should not provide for any exception, even for those who follow movements which are democratically opposed to democracy. Generally, these movements only have followers because they denounce real problems to which they give false, simplistic and demagogical solutions. It is these problems that we should tackle and that good answers should be found in the standards of the ILO which today amount to 172 Conventions and 179 Recommendations.

The ILO does not have any means of coercion to make these standards apply even in States which have ratified them. Without underestimating the mechanisms for application, we should consider that a certain number of developing countries encounter difficulties in complying with them. The ILO, through its programmes of technical assistance, "in which the standards and principles of the ILO would be sources of inspiration" can help them. The extent of this action, however, depends on the solidarity of rich countries, which have to make real sacrifices. This is the price of peace, which requires that we devote at least as many means to it as to war, the risk of which at the world level has fortunately become remote with the end of the East-West antagonism.

But the arsenal of laws and standards would not be sufficient to make the world a more just, more convivial and, in short, a more brotherly place. The spiritual dsimension must also "irrigate" the activities of the ILO. Albert Thomas, in his report to the International Labour Conference in 1928, had already invited the ILO "to follow... the modern religious movements which are taking so much interest in labour questions and which can exert a greater influence than is ofter supposed. These movements can undoubtedly give the International Labour Organisation valuable assistance in various ways."

Pax Christi International has read with great interest the two recent publications of the ILO. One gathers together summaries of the major documents of the Catholic Church in relation with the world of labour, and the other highlights – regarding Rerum Novarum and the publication of the encyclical Centesimus Annus, in 1991 – the convergence of the perspectives of the social teachings of the Catholic Church and those of the ILO.

My organisation welcomes the fact that the ILO is envisaging the publication of other documents which will highlight the wealth of the reflection of other religions and ways of thinking about labour. This can only contribute to reinforcing the ILO as the social conscience of the world.

This year is the 500th anniversary of the arrival of the Europeans in the Amercan continent, at a time when the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development is being held in Rio, and a committee of our Conference is examining the question of the prevention of industrial disasters. How can we not recall the values of Indian spirituality, which we also find in other cultures, enoneously thought of as primitive, as regards respect for the earth and its nature?

Such values could prevent modern man, in his mythical race for progress, from becoming the most dangerous of predators.

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) – Before we hear the right of reply which was requested, I would like to remind you, according to practice, that the answer should only bear on the point in question.

It should be brief. It should not exceed more than two or three minutes and, in any case, it should never be the opportunity for a new speech. I call on Mr. Xerri, Government delegate from Malta.

Mr. XERRI (Government delegate, Malta) – The Workers' delegate of Malta yesterday addressed this Conference and laid a number of charges against the Government. Most of those charges had already been made in this same hall last year and the Government had rebutted them in a letter addressed to the Director-General. The Workers' delegate alleged that workers in state employment are discriminated against by the Government in promotions because of their union affiliation or political beliefs.

My Government denies that it has ever made it its policy overly or covertly to deny any promotion to any person in its employment, either in the public service or in state corporations, purely on the grounds of that person's union affiliation or political beliefs.

In fact, the first law enacted by the present Government after assuming power in the 1987 elections was Act No. 15 of 1987, cited as the Investigation of Injustices Act, which provides for the setting up of a Commission for Investigation of Injustices with the power, inter alia, to investigate any written complaint made by any person who claims to have sustained injustice in consequence of any undue distinction, exclusion or preference which has been made or given to his prejudice, or of any disability or restriction to which he has been subjected, by any action taken by any person to whom this Act applies. In particular, but without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing, the Commission may investigate such a complaint in respect of any of the following: appointment of public officers; appointment of members, officers or employees of any such body; recruitment of employees. This tribunal is an independent body with full and unfettered power to examine cases brought before it and with powers to provide adequate measures of redress.

The intention of the Government in enacting this legislation was to ensure that no one in the administration abused his power in relation to his subordinates. It is unfortunate that the Workers' delegate has given the impression of being unaware of such an important and effective anti-discriminatory legislative measure taken by the Government in the interest of its employees.

I reiterate that in the light of the law which I have quoted, the Workers' delegate did not have sufficient grounds to complain to this distinguished body since he had the appropriate measures of redress, if any were required, in Malta itself.

(The Conference adjourned at 6 p.m.)

Credentials

Second Report of the Credentials Committee

Composition of the Conference

1. Since 4 June, when the Committee adopted its first report, the following changes in the composition of the Conference have taken place. Credentials have been received from a further six member States: Benin, Central African Republic, Dominica, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia, Moldova (which joined the Organisation on 8 June 1992), bringing the total number of member States at present represented at the Conference to 151. The delegations of three of these countries are exclusively governmental: Dominica, Liberia and Moldova. In addition, Cameroon has now sent a complete tripartite delegation while Chad, which was indicated in the First Report as having nominated an exclusively governmental delegation, has now in the meantime nominated a Workers' delegate. Antigua and Barbuda, which was in arrears in the payment of its financial contributions, has now regained the right to vote.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' Delegation of El Salvador

2. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of El Salvador submitted by the trade union organisations grouped together under the "Intergremial de Trabajadores".

3. The objecting organisations maintained that the Government of El Salvador nominated persons without trade union support to represent the workers of El Salvador at the Conference without taking into account the most representative organisations. Annexed to the objection were copies of two communications sent to the President of the Republic and to the Minister of Labour proposing the names of four persons so that the Government could select two of them to represent the labour movement in El Salvador.

4. The Committee noted that the objection which is of a succinct nature was limited to pointing out that organisations which are part of the "Intergremial" had proposed the name of four trade unionists to form part of the delegation and that the Government had chosen persons who were lacking in trade union support. The objecting organisations, however, had not submitted any information concerning the persons proposed or the objecting organisations or the workers' organisations of El Salvador represented at the Conference which would permit the Committee to examine the representative character of interested organisations and to come to any conclusions.

5. The Committee therefore considered that this objection did not require any action on its part. In this connection, it recalled that, since objections place the presence in the Conference of delegates or advisers at stake, the objecting organisations should clearly state the grounds of their objections and furnish all the supporting information that is necessary to enable the Committee to accomplish its work.

Objection concerning the nomination of one of the Workers' advisers of Malaysia

6. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Malaysia, Mr. Mohamed Abas, President of the Congress of Unions of Employees in the Public and Civil Services (CUEPACS) and his adviser, Mr. Kerisnan Sanmugam, Secretary General of the Malaysian Labour Organisation (MLO), submitted by the Malaysian Trade Union Congress (MTUC). By a letter dated 6 June sent to the Chairman of the Credentials Committee, the President of the MTUC withdrew the objection concerning the Workers' delegate, Mr. Mohamed Abas.

7. The objecting organisation maintained that the nomination of the Adviser, Mr. Sanmugam, contravened Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution since his nomination has been made without the agreement of the MTUC which was the most representative organisation of Workers in Malaysia as had been recognised by the Credentials Committee in 1981. According to the objecting organisation, the MTUC represented 55 per cent of organised labour with 141 affiliated unions and a total membership of 356,526 while the MLO only represented 21 per cent of organised labour with 19 affiliated unions and a total membership of 138,793.

8. In a written communication to the Committee, Mr. Dato' Lim Ah Lek, Minister of Human Resources and Head of the delegation of Malaysia to the Conference, submitted information to the Committee on the representative character of the organisation which, as far as the MTUC and the MLO were concerned, did not differ substantially from the information submitted by the objecting organisation. He added that consultations had taken place with all the interested organisations and that the inclusion of a representative from the MLO in the Workers' delegation of Malaysia ensured that the Workers of Malaysia had a better representation both sectorally and numerically.

9. The Committee noted that according to the statistics available, there being no important discrepancies between the objecting organisation and the Government, there was no reason to doubt the greater representative character of the MTUC. The Committee also noted that whereas there was only one Workers' adviser from the MLO, two such advisers had come from the MTUC, one of whom was a substitute delegate thus indicating that the Government had recognised the greater representative character of the MTUC.

10. The Committee considered that the fact that the most representative organisation had not given its agreement to the nomination of the adviser was not sufficient reason for suggesting that the nomination of the adviser was not in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. At the same time, the Committee recalled that governments should always try in so far as is possible to obtain the agreement of the most representative Workers' organisations to the nomination of the Workers' delegate and his advisers to the International Labour Conference.

11. In the light of the above considerations, the Committee considered that the objection should not be upheld.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Nicaragua

12. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua, Mr. Antonio Jarquin, of the "Central de Trabajadores de Nicaragua autónoma" (CTNa), submitted by the "Asociación de Trabajadores del Campo" (ATC) and the "Central Sandinista de Trabajadores" (CST)

13. The objecting organisations maintained that the nomination of the Workers' delegate contravened the provisions of Article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. The consultation procedure was defective, since the organisations were not consulted as such but rather through their coordinating bodies and because their views were not taken into account in making the nominations. On the basis of the information published by the Ministry of Labour, the representativity of the CST and the ATC was far greater than that of the organisations comprising the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua. In addition to the statistics of the central organisations which have agreed to be represented by the CST and the ATC, these organisations represent 65 per cent of the unionised labour force in Nicaragua, while the CNTa and the "Central de Unificación Sindical"(CUS) (present at the Conference) only represent 7 per cent and 16 per cent respectively. This explained why the first national agreements had been subscribed to by the CST and the ATC and by the organisations represented by them and not by the other minority trade union central organisations.

14. The exclusion of the CST and the ATC, which the Government had qualified as being Sandinista in orientation, had been due in fact to political motives and not to representativity. The Government had taken an attitude of "reprisal" for the campaign by the CST and the ATC against the social consequences of the Structural Adjustment Plan imposed on Nicaragua by the international financial organisations.

15. The objecting organisations also referred to the previous reports of this Committee which had confirmed the more representative character of the CST and the ATC and added that, in its report of 1991, the Committee had clearly indicated to the Government that, in its report of 1991, the Committee had clearly indicated to the Government that the appointment of the Workers' delegation should have been made in agreement with the most representative organisations of the country, which meant in agreement with the CST and the ACT.

16. The objecting organisations also maintained that they had no objection to minority trade union organisations being represented in the delegation as advisers.

17. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. F. Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour and Head of the delegation of Nicaragua to the Conference, stated that both the ACT and the CST, through letters sent to their Secretaries-General, had been invited to a consultation meeting which had taken place on 29 April of this year which the following central organisations attended: "Central de Trabajadores de Nicaragua Autónoma" (CTNa), "Confederación de Unificación Sindical" (CUS), "Confederación de Acción de Unificación Sindical" (CAUS), "Confederación General de Trabajadores Independientes" (CGTI), "Central de Trabajadores de Nicaragua" (CTN).

18. In the said meeting, after waiting for 45 minutes for the delegates of the CST and the ATC, who did not appear, it had been agreed to nominate the Secretary General of the CTNa as Workers' delegate and the Secretary General of the CUS as adviser to the said delegate.

19. With respect to representativity, the reply pointed out that only national law can define who is or is not representative. However, since the installation of the new democratic Government, all trade union central organisations had been allowed to operate, recognising the CST like the ATC as representative trade union central organisations. As a result, these organisations appeared in many national commissions precisely because they had been recognised as representative central organisations. It had to be recalled that last year, when both central organisations attended the consultation meeting, they had been represented in the Conference by advisers. Their absence at the present Conference did not mean that the Government denied their representative character, but was due to the fact that they not attended the consultation.

20. The Committee noted that the CST and the ATC had declined to follow the consultation procedure provided for by the Government and had expressed their position outside of that consultation procedure. It resulted from this state of affairs that like in previous years, the nomination made had not taken sufficiently into account the real representativity of each of the organisations invited since, according to the statistical information provided by the objecting organisations, which had not been disputed by the Government, it did not appear that the CST and the ATC had ceased to be the most representative Workers' organisations in Nicaragua.

21. In the light of the above considerations and taking into account that consultations had taken place, the Committee decided not to propose invalidation. The Committee considered, however, that the Government should re-examine its consultation procedure with a view to achieving its essential objective, namely to ensure that the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua would be made in agreement with all the most representative Workers' organisations in Nicaragua.

Communications concerning the delegation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

22. The Committee received copies of two communications addressed to the Director-General of the International Labour Office concerning a declaration, dated 27 April 1992, by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia claiming to continue automatically the membership of the former Federal Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia.

23. By letter of 7 May 1992, the Permanent Representative of Canada to the United Nations in Geneva stated that the Government of Canada wished to place on record its view that the current participation of representatives of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in all United Nations bodies was without prejudice to the eventual determination of the status of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

24. By letter of 14 May 1992, the Permanent Representative of Hungary to the United Nations Office and Other International Organisations in Geneva stated that, in the opinion of his Government, the settlement of the question of continuity should be based on the agreement of all successor states of the former Federal Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia and only such an agreement could form the basis for any decisions to be taken on the question of representation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in international forums, including the International Labour Organisation. Accordingly, Hungary believed that any procedural arrangements that the International Labour Organisation might follow in that regard in the interim should in no way prejudge Hungary's position set out above.

25. The Committee noted that these communications were similar to those that had been made on the same subject to various organisations in the United Nations system, and in particular the communications to the President of the International Labour Conference at the present session from Australia, Slovenia, Turkey, the United States and the Member States of the European Community.

26. The Committee concluded that, apart from recording the reservations made in them, the communications did not call for any action on its part.

Communications concerning the Government delegation of Haiti

27. The Credentials Committee had before it various communications received by the International Labour Office between March and June 1992. The letterhead of those communications referred to the Permanent Mission of Haiti, United Nations, Geneva, or to the Republic of Haiti, Ministry of Social Affairs.

28. The communications concern the composition of the Delegation of Haiti to the International Labour Conference. In the last of them, dated 3 June 1992, signed by Ms Claudette Gourdet as "Minister for Social Affairs" of Haiti, the "Ministry for Social Affairs, in the name of the Government, makes the strongest possible protest to the International Labour Office, after having taken note of the list of government delegates representing Haiti [at the Conference] whereas those delegates are unknown to the Ministry of Social Affairs".

29. The Committee wished to point out that the composition of the Delegation of Haiti appearing in the provisional list of delegations published as a supplement to the provisional records of the Conference was based on the credentials presented by the Permanent Representative to the United Nations Office and other International Organisations in Geneva, who is the duly accredited representative of the Government of Haiti to the organisations referred to.

30. In this regard, the Committee referred to Resolution 46/7 of 11 October 1991 of the United Nations General Assembly, which "Affirms as unacceptable" any entity resulting from "the attempted illegal replacement of the constitutional President of Haiti". The Committee considers it appropriate to recall in this repect:

(a) the terms of the resolution adopted on 14 December 1950 by the United Nations General Assembly recommending that, whenever more than one authority claims to be the government entitled to represent a State, the attitude adopted by the General Assembly on the matter should be taken into account in other organs of the United Nations and in the specialised agencies; and

(b) the decision of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office of 10 March 1951 to draw the attention of the International Labour Conference to that resolution in order that the Conference take into account the position adopted by the United Nations.

31. Accordingly, having noted that the credentials of the Delegation of Haiti had been drawn up in due form, the Committee concluded that no further action need be taken with respect to such communications.

Communication from the "Conseil National du Patronat Tchadien (CNPT)

32. The Committee received a communication from Mr. I. Djedeh, President of the "Conseil National du Patronat Tchadien" (CNPT) in which it indicated that the Government of Chad had required the Employers' and Workers' organisations to bear the travel and subsistence expenses of their delegations to the International Labour Conference. The CNPT was not for that reason able to participate in the Conference.

33. In this connection, the Committee referred to paragraph 17 of its first report (Provisional Record, No. 10, page 10/42), in which it recalled the obligation of Members under Article 13, paragraph 2(a) of the Constitution to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers and trusted that this obligation would be respected for the whole duration of the Conference.

34. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

President: Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues

Communication to the Conference

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We have just been informed that there has been an explosion of methane gas in a mine in Krasnodon in the region of Lougansk in Ukraine. This explosion has caused the death of 57 miners.

On behalf of the Officers of the Conference and, I am sure, on behalf of all delegations, we would like to extend to the people and the Government of Ukraine our condolences on the occasion of this tragic event and to express our solidarity to them.

Seventh Report of the Selection Committee: Submission and Adoption

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the first item on today's agenda, the seventh report of the Selection Committee; it simply involves some changes in the composition of committees. I submit it for your approval. If there are no objections, I will take it that the report is adopted.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Let us now move on to the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. TINY (Government delegate, Sao Tome and Principe) – Allow me, on behalf of the Government of Sao Tome and Principe, of my delegation and on my own behalf, to extend to the President a sincere and warm welcome and to express our delight at his election to the Chair of this august assembly. We know, that with his characteristic ability and his wealth of experience, that he will bring to a successful and efficient conclusion the proceedings of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

My congratulations and words of encouragement also extend to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and to his assistants for their judicious management of this Organisation, for the pertinence and excellence of the Report before us and, more particularly, the choice of the central theme for our discussions, namely the democratic process underway in the world.

This is illustrative of the interest, awareness and determination shown, as has indeed been emphasised in the Report, in finding ways and means to achieve the essential adjustment of the structures, methods and procedures of the Organisation to the new conditions, principles and requirements which have arisen from these changes.

Now that we have left behind the age of the cold war and the bipolarisation of relations between the nations of the world, it is incumbent on us all, as representatives of the nations, of organisations and international agencies and citizens of the world, to have the wisdom and foresight to ensure that this new world which is emerging with all its idiosyncracies can give rise to a universe of healthier and fraternal relations where the ideas of democracy, tolerance and flexibility can flourish – in short, a universe founded on the unequivocal respect of fundamental rights of man, wherever he is, whoever he is and whatever his social condition, race or religious beliefs.

Our generation is privileged indeed to build, with the means which we have created, what we could proudly call "the era of universal democracy". It is all within our reach, it all depends on us, on our determination, our devotion to the task to make progress – that is to achieve democracy in our respective countries and to assist others in achieving the democratic ideal.

For our part, in Sao Tome and Principe, we have shouldered for more than a year our part of the responsibilities in this task. As you know, a year ago, from this very forum, I was honoured and pleased to announce the political changes to which the people of Sao Tome were committed and which had for the first time in the country, led to the holding of general and presidential elections by direct universal secret suffrage. These elections, coming as they did after 15 years of a centralised and authoritarian system of a single party, set the seal to a resounding victory for democracy and the opposition forces which are today working towards the rationalisation of the economy and the finances of the country, more particularly through the application of the structural adjustment programme to create the conditions for the socioeconomic development of the country.

I must emphasise that all this is taking place against a background of the legal establishment of a State of democratic law through the adoption of a new political Constitution which enshrines the protection and guarantee of the fundamental rights of man.

Since it is not our intention to speak at length here on democracy and its advantages, I would simply like to emphasise that, while multi-party democracy may not be a panacea for all our ills, it is none the less a fundamental principle, an essential starting point on the path towards development since, politically speaking, it is the only system which has sufficient potential to guarantee freedom as the ideal for all mankind, one which gives the principle of tripartite consultation between government, employers and unions its essential logic and consistency.

Since man is at the heart of our concerns, we believe it is of the utmost importance to look again at this direct relationship established between democracy and the full development of human resources mentioned in the Report. In truth, the less the ability to intervene and manage human and material resources available, the less will be the chances of democratic consolidation in our countries. We have to invest decisively in the training of our people in Sao Tome in all spheres. We are firmly convinced that the experience of Sao Tome and Principe today can be in many respects of great interest to the international community.

It is a small, fertile country of around a thousand square kilometres, an island State, poor (an LDC), with a population of 120,000 inhabitants who are essentially young at heart, and an unemployment rate of around 25 per cent of the working population, although many have been through the school system. But it is a democratic country, open to private initiative, peace-loving by nature – we have never been at war in our country – although now in the midst of a very serious socio-economic recession caused by a reactionary regime which lasted 15 years. It is currently applying a programme of necessary structural adjustment, although this has had deeply negative social consequences in the short term.

In this context of political freedom, the Government has chosen as a priority this year, in addition to the economic programme the establishment of standards, and we have introduced legislation, among others matters, on a new legal system, an Act respecting individual conditions of employment, legislation on strikes, the press and the holding of demonstrations. At the external level we have called on the ILO's technical support for our ratification of various international labour Conventions in the field of labour law, and in particular the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

In the hope of a rapid response to our requests to the Organisation, the Government is continuing to deploy all possible efforts for the full and efficient consolidation of laws, freedoms and fundamental guarantees of our citizens. We believe that we can do much for our people although we are aware none the less of our great limitations. We know by our own experience that the formal and political transition to democracy and the conquest of freedom, although extremely difficult, often leave indelible marks on the social fabric; even so, it is only a first stage, a sine qua non for what comes after. However, the following stage in a country such as ours, where everything remains to be done at the level of structures and attitudes, is the hardest and the most delicate phase, and we certainly need to count on the support of the international community.

From this point of view and following on the reflections of the Director-General, we would like to call on the ILO to search with us for ways and means which will enable our countries to mobilise a more consistent form of assistance, cooperation programmes which are more tailored to our situation, actions and projects which can be speedily and efficiently implemented. It is essential, after the necessary analyses in our offices, that we should be able to take action – specific, simple and not very ambitious action, perhaps, but which will be to the benefit of our people.

We know what we want and where we want to go. We do not always know exactly how we will get to our destination since very often the means of transport come from different and external sources which are not always easy to identify. It is particularly as regards the how and the means, that the solidarity of the ILO and other partners is very welcome.

It is no new thing for anyone to affirm that democracy has financial costs, costs which have to be borne by resources which our own countries, and more particularly the LDCs, have in insufficient quantities. Job-creation schemes and social projects will have to be rigorously implemented in order to minimise the direct effects of macroeconomic stabilisation programmes. I would like to give you two examples which are noteworthy in this respect.

The first has to do with the agreement signed between the Portuguese Government and the ILO on a project of technical cooperation in the sphere of computerisation and the employment markets in the Portuguese-speaking African countries. This will contribute significantly towards the solution of an important problem for our countries and we would therefore like to congratulate its promoters. We wish the project every success, aware as we are that all countries concerned will have their own word to say. The second example has to do with a project which my Government is negotiating with the ILO; and which is due to be implemented in the near future, concerning the creation and support of small and medium-size businesses in Sao Tome and Principe. This project will be particularly important in the creation of economic alternative for a large part of the population now working in the informal sector.

As I draw to my conclusion I would like to extend a few words of encouragement to all those Governments who are fighting for democracy and for peace in their countries. In particular, I would like to mention the process of peace in both Angola and Mozambique, where despite all the difficulties it is courageously being pursued.

Finally, I would like to repeat, in line with other speakers from the Portuguese speaking countries who have preceded me, how important it is to us, at this 79th Session of the Conference, that we can speak freely and directly in Portuguese. It is as well to remember that Portuguese is the principal means of communication between more than 200 million people from seven countries scattered throughout the world. These are sufficient reasons for Porguguese to be considered an official language of the ILO, notwithstanding the financial reasons which have traditionally been invoked against this.

Original – Spanish: Mr. GARCÍA ASTABURUAGA (Employers' delegate, Chile) – On behalf of the Chilean Employers' delegation, I would like to extend to the President and the other Officers our congratulations for their election and I would like to wish them the best success.

It is a great honour for me to represent the Chilean employers, both because of the importance of this Conference and because of the opportunity it provides for outlining the work we have been doing to consolidate and further our achievements of the past few years and to safeguard the atmosphere of political and economic freedom that we have reached, for it constitutes the fundamental basis of authentic democracy.

As regards the trend towards democracy which is highlighted in the Director-General's Report, the employers have a very important part to play.

Starting with the profound changes that took place in Chile in the 1970s, which allowed us to leave behind decades of paralysing state control, the employers have gradually become conscious of the pressing need to change the physionomy of labour relations by strengthening the direct contacts between employers and workers.

This revitalised concept doesn't imply that we are closing our eyes to the proper role of the authorities, which essentially concerns the establishment of an institutional framework in which the social partners are to act.

We believe that the contacts between employers and workers in our country, which are obviously of concern to this international forum, deserve some comments.

In the last few years the Confederation of Production and Trade, which I represent, and the single Central Organisation of Chilean Workers, the most representative organisations of Chilean employers and workers, respectively, have signed a number of framework agreements on subjects of common interest, such as minimum wages, the importance of private enterprises as the engine of growth, the role of markets in the efficient allocation of resources, competitiveness, labour mobility, productivity, vocational training, etc.

With this social dialogue that we have undertaken, we have given a strong and renewed impetus to the ties between employers and workers, and to their relationships with the Government.

In keeping with the point of view expressed by the Director-General in his Report, and in the light of the profound changes that the world is going through, it may be interesting in this meeting to discuss the main reasons and objectives behind our drive to modernise our labour relations.

Firstly, we believe that it is vital to preserve a climate of stability and certainty in the rules of the game, thus providing the social partners with the ideal conditions for carrying out their productive activities.

It is also important to eliminate confrontation in labour relations, and to replace it with partnership.

Furthermore, a market economy requires that employers and workers be recognised as protagonists in their inter-relationships, without any outside interference, particularly from political factors.

We should note that this kind of participation machinery makes it possible to achieve a high degree of commitment among the social partners, thanks to the agreements they reach and their joint initiatives.

In any process of social dialogue it is most important to define the rules and the subjects it will cover.

It is also important for employers to recognise their social responsibility: labour relations do not affect only workers and employers; their impact is felt also by consumers, the unemployed, unorganised sectors, the poor, and, in general, the whole community.

Furthermore, we think that labour legislation must be functional and contribute to the country's economic strategy; otherwise it will compromise the performance of the economy.

In this context, preserving and boosting economic growth and maximising the creation of productive jobs are the priority issues.

Labour productivity and the competitiveness of enterprises, the quality of products, the control of inflation, training, occupational safety and health, savings and investment, the opening up of the economy and international competition, privatisation of enterprises and the secondary role of the State, are topics which Chilean employers wish to and must discuss with the workers.

Reasonable levels of consensus on these subjects will make an indispensable contribution to stability and enable us to continue along the path towards economic and social progress.

The results obtained so far in our country allows me to say that the experience has been successful.

Nevertheless, we know that it is no easy job. We have to overcome many prejudices and many fears left over from the past.

We should note that it is particularly dangerous to view dialogue as a magical means for resolving all labour problems totally and immediately.

In this respect the Chilean employers have a pragmatic vision and a clear understanding that our achievements will not put an end to disputes; after all, disputes are the result of the natural motivation of the social partners.

Such difficulties, nevertheless, should not discourage us.

We believe that now, perhaps more than ever before, different factors, both domestic and external, are combining to ensure a positive outcome for the concertation process in which we are engaged.

Of course, the crisis which so called "real socialism" has experienced around the world, has led to considerable convergence between socio-economic schools of thought in our country. This has generated greater convergence between the social partners and at the same time has made it possible to agree on diagnoses of problems and their possible solutions.

The economic progress and social development that the country has experienced in the last few years under our market economy model are recognised and appreciated by labour.

Furthermore, the memory of the trauma and the painful experiences of the past and the full awareness of the damage which confrontation wrought on labour relations, have certainly contributed to the successful results of our concertation.

All this explains the reasonable optimism with which Chilean employers have undertaken the process of social dialogue without inpinging the prerogatives of individual enterprises as regards their own labour relations.

We believe that in the context of the structural reforms that the world is going through and which are particularly strong in the developing countries like our own, social dialogue is an inescapable duty which cannot be postponed, because our future prospects in this new international order will depend to a considerable degree on our capacity to define a to emphasise that, while multi-party democracy may not be a panacea for all our ills, it is none the less a fundamental principle, an essential starting point on the path towards development since, politically speaking, it is the only system which has sufficient potential to guarantee freedom as the ideal for all mankind, one which gives the principle of tripartite consultation between government, employers and unions its essential logic and consistency.

We believe that now, perhaps more than ever before, different factors, both domestic and external, are combining to ensure a positive outcome for the concertation process in which we are engaged.

Of course, the crisis which so called "real socialism" has experienced around the world, has led to considerable convergence between socio-economic schools of thought in our country. This has generated greater convergence between the social partners and at the same time has made it possible to agree on diagnoses of problems and their possible solutions.

The economic progress and social development that the country has experienced in the last few years under our market economy model are recognised and appreciated by labour.

Furthermore, the memory of the trauma and the painful experiences of the past and the full awareness of the damage which confrontation wrought on labour relations, have certainly contributed to the successful results of our concertation.

All this explains the reasonable optimism with which Chilean employers have undertaken the process of social dialogue without inpinging the prerogatives of individual enterprises as regards their own labour relations.

We believe that in the context of the structural reforms that the world is going through and which are particularly strong in the developing countries like our own, social dialogue is an inescapable duty which cannot be postponed, because our future prospects in this new international order will depend to a considerable degree on our capacity to define a national effort entailing the contributions of the national community.

Finally, I should like to say that the strengthening of links between employers and workers and the possible consensus that we may reach on the subject I referred to earlier, will certainly facilitate the efforts that both the Government of Chile and all factions in our country are making in order to achieve higher levels of economic growth and social development.

Mrs. PAPANDREOU (Member of the Commission of the European Communities responsible for Employment, Industrial Relations and Social Affairs) – We only have to look around to see that we are living in a very troubled world. Less than a two-hour flight from here men, women and children are dying in the place where World War I originated – the "last war", as we used to say. In Eastern and Central Europe, now that the certainties of dictatorship have disappeared, nationalism remains – as well, in too many cases, as xenophobia.

Far away in Rio, Heads of State and Government are debating how to protect our environment, a debate that highlights the antagonisms between industrialised and developing countries. Closer to home, in Western Europe, the extreme right is starting to march on the streets again and racism, especially against Third World country immigrants is gaining ground. Let us also remember that in many parts of the world people are dying of hunger, that children survive only by scavenging in dustbins and that forced labour still exists. There are still too many places in the world and in Europe where basic rights are ignored: the right to education; the right to have a decent place to live; the right to work, not to mention the right to belong to a union and to strike; the right to social protection in the event of illness; the right to a fair trial; the right not to be discriminated against because of gender, skin colour, or ethnic origin. Let us not hide ourselves under the cover of the so-called affluent society.

On the eve of the third millennium, we still have a long way to go towards fairness and equity.

At the Community level a further step in this direction has been decided through the commitment in the Maastricht treaty, the Heads of State or Government have committed themselves to contributing to the community development policy to the respect of human rights and fundamental freedoms in developing countries. Each and every one of us has a major responsibility in contributing to the development of a democratic, efficient and equitable society. Governments, to start with, have to recognise that the development of a segmented society, with haves and have nots, puts democracy itself at risk. They have to provide at least a minimum of public services such as education, health, justice, etc. for without them all the discussions about equity and solidarity will remain purely theoretical. Governments too, have to remain vigilant about the rights of minorities so as to avoid the development of inter-ethnic conflicts.

Employers also have to accept that they have a social responsibility. Profits, as legitimate as they are, do not constitute an end in themselves. Increased flexibility and reinforced competitiveness must go hand in hand with improvements to working conditions.

Lastly, trade unions, while legitimately defending the interests of their members and of workers in general, should also recognise that they have to contribute to the economic and social well-being of the society and thus bear some responsibility in this process.

It is in this context that I fully endorse the ideas set out by the Director-General in his Report. Our constant task must indeed be to reaffirm and ensure the development and the implementation of the fundamental principles of respect for human rights and workers' rights and to fight against xenophobia. This approach was asserted in the Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers in which it was stated that "it is important to combat every form of discrimination, including discrimination on grounds of sex, colour, race, opinions and beliefs, and, (...) in a spirit of solidarity, it is important to combat social exclusion."

At this point I would like to draw the attention of the Conference to the importance we attach to social dialogue at community level. This is a fundamental issue. Successes and mistakes in the area of industrial relations abound throughout the EC. We have to recognise that there is no one single model. Each member State has its traditions, its culture; each member State has its history, and the model of each member State is the product of a long history of conflicts and of compromises. We do believe, however, that the necessary development of such a dialogue at any level should be based on a series of principles that all parties, including the public authorities, should adhere to. First, the fact that the social partners do exist, in other words, and this might sound banal, their representatives cannot be called into question. It is not only a matter of membership percentages, it is also a qualitative and structural issue. Employers' and workers' organisations are the proper channel through which both parties can express their claims, voice their concerns and find consensus. Second, the social partners are autonomous and their autonomy should be respected by a third party which is the public authorities. Employers' and workers' organisations are not conveyor belts for the State. It is for them to develop together their own sphere of competence and to find ways of combining economic efficiency with better working and living conditions. Third, the State should encourage joint discussions and common approaches between the social partners. In areas where public order is concerned, the State must assume its responsibities, for example in relation to discrimination at the workplace or in health and safety matters.

These three rules of the game are not attached to any specific economic or political system. They do not run counter to the need for flexibility, for increased competitiveness and for market relevance. In fact, the market is very good at doing some things, many things even, provided it operates within a framework of reasonable regulations so as to prevent any deterioration of working conditions or of the environment. There are, nevertheless, some other things the market is not good at. Deregulation, competition, open access, privatisation, and so on, are not magical solutions, any more than public ownership or state intervention.

This is where social dialogue has a major role to play in the shaping of new industrial relations. This is the basic thrust underlying the community social dialogue, as exemplified by the joint agreement signed by the European Trade Union Confederation (ETUC), the Union of Industries of the EC (UNICE) and the European Centre of Public Enterprises (CEEP) last October. However, asserting principles and laying down deadlines is one thing, but democratisation also has to be put into practice.

As the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, points out in his Report, we have to improve labour law and equal opportunities and treatment in access to the labour market. We have also to promote workers' well-being and safety, increase social protection and combat economic and social exclusion.

I would like to close by offering my warmest wishes for fruitful cooperation between the EC and the ILO.

Mrs. MEO (Employers' delegate, New Zealand) – I take great pleasure in congratulating the President on his election to the Chair of this Session of the International Labour Conference and I wish him every success.

Part I of the Director-General's Report deals with the very important subject of democratisation and the ILO, and I note with approval the firm conclusion that the advance of democracy, together with social justice, is the only guarantee of world peace. The Report refers to the spectacular change in the world's political climate which has occurred in such a remarkably short space of time and asks Conference delegates to state what actions they believe the ILO and its Members should take in order to assist the democratisation process.

Over the years, the ILO has played an invaluable role in the development of international labour standards, in smoothing the path of industrialisation and in fostering genuine consultation between governments, workers and employers.

However, with the rapid political changes taking place has come a need for the ILO to reassess the centralist approach it has hitherto taken. It has now been clearly shown that government intervention cannot create a climate favourable for sustainable economic growth and thus for employment growth. Only the market has the capacity to respond and to change with changing circumstances.

As the Director-General's Report indicates, most developing States have now come to appreciate the flexibility of the market and are in the process of becoming market economies. It is important, therefore, as the Director-General suggests, that the ILO should recognise this change in relation to its own activities. While it is appreciated that the social and economic issues are inextricably mixed, too much of the Organisation's time is currently involved in interventionism, in developing labour standards inappropriate to individual Member circumstances, and as a consequence too many Conventions remain unratified.

Conventions and standard-setting generally must be reviewed in the light of the need of so many countries to deregulate and decentralise their labour markets. It is questionable whether an organisation, which is itself centralist in character, is in the best position to determine specific conditions for specific industry sectors in widely varying national circumstances.

What the ILO can do, and as the Director-General's Report recognises, is to respond wholeheartedly to request for assistance, understanding that it is through the supply of local and regional support services that will accrue the greatest benefits, both for the ILO itself and for its member countries.

The Director-General's Report notes that for a long time growth was thought of as simply synonymous with an increase in per capita income and adds that, fortunately, today development is measured in terms of the satisfaction of basic needs.

New Zealand acknowledges the obligation to meet the basic needs of its citizens.

Delegates to earlier Sessions of the Conference have reported on the radical economic restructuring in New Zealand which was aimed at producing a flexible, competitive economy. A key element of this economic restructuring was our Employment Contracts Act, the labour market reform essential to ensure that New Zealand could function in the world economy as a competitive producer of quality products and services.

At the time of the 1991 Session of the Conference, when the Act had been in place for only a few weeks, there were already indications of a positive response to change. Today, the Act's benefits are widely apparent.

There is no question that the increased flexibility effected by the Act, particularly by way of the removal of traditional job demarcation barriers, has had a positive market impact on productivity.

Employers and their employees are now talking to each other about matters of importance and there is evidence that the "them and us" attitude, fostered by New Zealand's previous, confrontational-style system of industrial relations, is disappearing. The lesson that cooperation improves enterprise health is fast being learned.

Recent, independently-based research shows the benefits of the flexibility of the Act. Collective bargaining is now predominantly enterprise-based, although a number of multi-employer contracts have been negotiated. While some employees have recently received a wage cut or a new wage increase, reflecting their organisation's ability to pay, in many other cases wages have continued to rise.

There is a growing tendency to include general terms and conditions of employment in a collective document, whilst establishing wage and salary levels by means of individual employment contracts. A number of productivity-related pay systems have now been introduced.

Today, employers are no longer bound by national documents over which they have no control and which take no account of individual enterprise needs. As a result, planning for the future is now possible in a way unhoped for under the former centralist approach.

For employees, there is the freedom to join the union of their choice but no-one may be pressured to become, or not to become, a union member. Unions no longer have the automatic right to bargain on behalf of employees covered by their membership rule but must be appointed to representative status by individual employee decision. Whilst many employees continue to be represented in negotiations by a union, many others are now representing themselves or have made use of some other bargaining agent. For unions now, the important thing is to establish themselves as properly representative organisations, not with a captive membership but deserving of the membership they have.

Certain fundamental principles underlie the Employment Contracts Act and these same principles underlie many of the changes to which the Director-General's Report refers.

Firstly, the empowerment of individuals, not institutions, giving individuals direct involvement in the contractual relationships which affect them.

Secondly, freedom of choice, with a corresponding requirement to accept responsibility for decisions taken.

Thirdly, reduced regulation and government intervention (although with statutory minimum standards retained).

And lastly, industrial relations placed in the context of other enterprise disciplines.

In the new climate which the Employment Contracts Act has created, a new enterprise culture is emerging. Training, retraining, skills development, equal employment opportunities, occupational safety and health and individual and family needs (such as superannuation and health insurance) are all now being considered, along with market conditions and quality requirements. The idea that government will provide and can do better than responsible individuals is becoming a thing of the past.

It is for just this kind of reason that the centrally appointed and administered Trade Union Education Authority is to be disestablished and that the centralised pay equity legislation introduced by the previous government was repealed. The emphasis is now on enterprise responsibility, on employers and employees recognising where their own best interest lie.

And as for the wider economy, inflation for the year ended March 1992 dropped to less than 1 per cent, the lowest in the OECD. Interest rates have dropped markedly and business confidence is increasing rapidly as companies take advantage of New Zealand's new competitive position. Exports are growing dramatically and for the year to December 1991 the country recorded a notable trade surplus. Recently, the Reserve Bank has revised the estimate of expected unemployment growth downwards and its estimate of GDP growth upwards. The news is increasingly good.

Of course, there is still a long way to go and unemployment continues to be a key issue. However, an export-led recovery is now becoming a reality and the Employment Contracts Act makes possible the policy stability which is the key to business confidence, and business confidence is critical to growth.

Without growth no country can guarantee that basic needs will be met.

Mrs. ROLDAN-CONFESOR (Acting Secretary of Labour and Employment, Philippines) – On behalf of the Philippines delegation and myself, I convey our highest compliments on the election of the President at the 79th Session of this Conference. I am confident that under his competent leadership, this session will proceed towards a successful conclusion.

Today, we are all participants in and witnesses to the shaping of a new world order strong and united in its commitment to the ideals, principles and institutions of democracy as the solid rock upon which individual freedoms, social justice and economic progress must be founded.

As aptly pointed out in the Report of the Director-General and as our own experience will show, democratisation is a long and tedious process. It cannot be done overnight, nor can it be achieved by merely changing labels.

Under the leadership of our first woman President, Mrs. Corazon C. Aquino, who accepted the duty to lead my country back to democracy after the 1986 People Power Revolution, the democratisation process has restored individual political and civil rights under a democratically framed Constitution. Institutions of democracy are now in place: a legislature in full operation and an independent judiciary that guarantees to everyone equal protection of the law. We have just finished the first national and local elections and a new government will be inaugurated by the end of this month.

Like other countries that are currently undergoing democratisation, we face all kinds of threats. Dangers of dissension continue to come from those who insist on the status quo and will not hesitate to use force to achieve their ends. The more serious threat is the disillusionment after the euphoria of political liberation starts to die down and the impatience of the people who continue to be taxed by poverty and serious unemployment take over. For my country, in particular, the task has been made most difficult by the destruction brought about by a long drought, a volcanic eruption, a series of strong typhoons and, sadly enough, seven coup attempts.

In our efforts to cope with recession and the economic crisis, our stabilisation policies now being implemented have severely constrained our ability to provide growth and, more importantly, to protect our poorest and most vulnerable groups against lower standards of living and social protection.

Four years ago, addressing the 75th Session of this Conference, President Aquino already sounded an urgent call for the ILO to consider these threats to democracy. She said: "This must be done by expanding democracy ... by removing the present restraints on human freedom imposed by poverty and underdevelopment, and by granting wider rights and liberties. The next liberation must be economic. This includes a fair resolution of the debt problem, for the tightening grip of its austerities threatens to strangle the life out of the new democracies of the Third World, even as it threatens to upset the stability of the international economic order. The linkage of debt, development and democracy is undeniable and is the most pressing issue this body must address."

I will be pleased to report to her that this session of the Conference is devoting its attention to these serious threats to democracy which she saw herself in 1986.

The Philippines Development Plan embodies the policies and strategies that seek to bring about economic liberation for my country. A companion Medium-Term Employment Plan that focuses on human resource development and world competitiveness has been proposed.

A basic strategy for our Plan to succeed is the creation of a healthy political and social climate for both domestic and foreign investments. Political and institutional reforms have ushered in a period of relative peace, security and growth. We expect the increasing volume of local and foreign investments to provide the necessary expansion of our industries as well as the gainful and productive employment that would follow. The recently enacted Foreign Investments Act, which liberalises our investment laws, is expected to catapult the Philippines into a major venue for foreign investment.

Under the Plan, a sound industrial policy provides the necessary incentive framework to establish and foster the right output mix, to enhance exports, to create linkages and reap comparative advantage as a precondition for our goal of achieving world competitiveness. The devolution of planning and resource mobilisation and utilisation to local government units as well as the on-going privatisation programme should yield medium-term pay-offs in terms of rural regeneration, employment creation and income enhancement.

For the past six years, stabilisation and adjustment policies have kept our unemployment and underemployment rates uncomfortably high. While these rates have decreased slightly, a marked shift in employment towards less productive, poorly-paid and inferior jobs has been noted. The Government, employers and workers of my country, of course, have heroically attempted to cushion the effects of such policies by a deliberate attempt to maintain a continuous flow of resources for infrastructure, both physical and social, because of its recognised importance in strengthening long-term foundations of growth and development.

An Education Commission has already mapped out the challenge for this incoming administration. This is the basic need to equip, or re-equip, our less-educated people with strong basic education and skills that are needed to earn a living in an industrialising society.

Our national manpower development plan has purposely adopted an enterprise-based training strategy in order to keep supply in line with market demand as it operates on a self-regulating basis. Tripartite industry training boards have already been set up to formulate more effective training programmes and ensure better delivery. Our training institutions have likewise adopted specific programmes to meet the skill needs of informal sector enterprises and accelerate the growth of the entrepreneurial pool in my country.

Investing in our people is the most effective course of action now being severely affected by resource constraints. We would like to call on the ILO to assist countries in utilising official development assistance to ensure the development of effective training programmes and their implementation.

Our successes in political, social and economic transformation, are made possible by broader and wider peoples' involvement in policy and decision-making process. In the area of labour and employment, the policy of tripartism is conscientiously pursued.

Relative industrial peace reigns today in my country. Our industrial relations system after all is founded on due respect and recognition of the rights of workers to form unions and bargain collectively, including the right to strike. The spirit of shared responsibility between workers and employers in ensuring business expansion and growth and in the equitable sharing in the fruits of such growth continues to be pursued and strengthened.

For the past six years the number of trade unions, both in the public and private sectors, has increased, matched by a similar increase in the number of collective bargaining agreements. A sharp decline is seen in the incidence of actual work stoppages from a peak record of 581 in 1986 to only 181 in 1991. The contrast demonstrates the maturing attitude of labour and management in my country and the level of mutual trust and respect developed through dialogues and direct negotiations, and the resolution of labour disputes through voluntary modes.

Just recently, during the 1992 Labour Day celebration, the major workers' and employers' organisations, at their own initiative, signed a Joint Covenant on Development based on Justice and Peace. The Covenant, signed in the presence of President Aquino, gives the highest testimony to the commitment of workers and employers to forge and maintain sound and enduring labour-management relations as a basic and essential component of development and social justice in my country.

Following our ratification of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention 1976 (No. 144) last year, the Tripartite Industrial Peace Council, an advisory body to the President on labour and social issues composed of 12 representatives each, from the three sectors, has been strengthened with the establishment of Regional Councils.

I am pleased to report that the Council has agreed to recommend to the incoming President and the Senate the ratification of four ILO social security Conventions for migrant workers.

On the item relative to the prevention of industrial disasters, the Philippines welcomes the discussion of the proposed instruments as they will be valuable inputs to new legislation of the new Congress.

On the item related to the protection of workers' claims in the events of the insolvency of their employer, our Labour Code, as amended by the Republic Act 6715, already contains a similar provision. However, new legislation will be needed.

Let me conclude by touching on the priority being given by the ILO in its forthcoming programme of action. These programmes will definitely help concerned member States speed up the democratisation process, continue their fight against poverty and pursue vigorously the promotion of workers' protection, particularly for the most vulnerable groups. These ILO programmes of action deserve our support and commendation.

We are ready to help the ILO in the best way we can in the many tasks it has set out for itself to provide a better life for our workers throughout the world.

Ms. MARTIN (Secretary of Labour, United States) – We live today in a world that is far different than the world of just a decade ago. In the short space of just a few years we have witnessed two remarkable and extraordinary events – events few of us ever dreamed would occur in the course of our lives: first, the end of the cold war; and second, the emergence of democracy on a scale unmatched throughout history.

These two events, taken together, today provide all the nations of the world with an unprecedented and indeed unique opportunity to devote their full energies to goals that have long guided this Organisation: securing fundamental rights for workers; promoting productive and freely chosen employment; and creating safer, healthier and more equitable workplaces throughout the world.

The current global movement toward democracy is, without question, the most significant event of our time, and I think that the Director-General could not have selected a more fitting topic or a more timely theme than this for this Session of the Conference. His selection is appropriate not only in light of the new global movement to democracy but also because of the ILO's own commitment to that democracy, both in its efforts to promote employment as well as well as in the nature of this Organisation itself.

The tripartite structure of the ILO well anticipated the democratic world that is now emerging, a world where government power is limited and labour and business are free and independent. It is a structure that embodies the balance that lies at the very heart of democracy. It is necessary for us to continue to strengthen and ensure the integrity and separation of each of these components, both in the ILO and in our home countries.

Democracy is thriving today for many reasons: first, democracy means freedom; second, democracy means fairness; and third, along with with its economic sibling, the free market, democracy provides the most effective route known for peoples of all nations, of all cultures, and of all backgrounds to achieve individual empowerment.

In considering how we can achieve greater democracy, it is well to recall that democracy by its very nature rests on the political and economic empowerment of individuals. Nations and governments exist in order to further the opportunities for and aspirations of each individual person - not the other way around. For democracy to flourish, for individuals to enjoy the freedom and social justice afforded by democracy, we must empower those individuals, by providing them with the skills and flexibility that will allow them to adapt to these changes of the fast-paced and ever evolving environment of the 1990s.

In today's world, where companies, industries and skill requirements change with unprecedented speed, worker flexibility is an absolute necessity. A competitive workforce must be able to react quickly to market changes, new patterns of trade and competition, technological breakthroughs and a wide variety of other rapidly changing economic conditions.

In the past, job security, at least in the United States, has meant working at the same company and often at the same job for an entire lifetime. But the economic world of the nineties is a much different place. Technological and economic changes mean that many of the old arrangements simply do not work. The needs of the marketplace change day to day, week to week, and jobs are changing along with them. Workers have to be more mobile and more adaptable and they require higher and higher levels of skills. Job opportunities are greatest where the economy is the most robust. And job security is ever more dependent on those individual skills and on the willingness and opportunity to learn, to change and to grow.

That is why, in recent years, we have begun to develop in the United States a full-scale plan to empower our individual workers, by improving our education and job training systems. This in turn, will lead to greater job security.

If a quality workforce is the foundation of a strong economy, then education is the foundation of a first-rate workforce. Simply put, learning is earning. Our Bureau of Labor Statistics recently conducted a series of studies designed to project trends in the labour force for the next 15 years, and the results were unequivocal: no matter which economic scenario we focus on, the types of jobs expected to experience the fastest growth are those requiring the most skills. The more skilled the worker, the more likely she or he is able to find a better job, to earn greater pay, and to enjoy greater economic stability. The more skilled the workforce, the more likely that nation and all of the people of that nation will prosper.

Last year, President Bush took a historic step toward ensuring the future vitality of America's labour force, when he proposed a major overhaul of our nation's school system. His AMERICA 2000 Program has set as a goal that "Every adult American will be literate and will possess the knowledge and skills necessary to compete in a global economy and exercise the rights and responsibilities of citizenship."

We followed up on the President's effort when the Department of Labor published for the first time a report of its Commission on Achieving Necessary Skills which, for us, provided the first concrete guidelines on what skills every young man and woman must have in order to succeed when they enter the workforce.

I should add these are not just exercises in rhetoric. Over the past year we have developed a number of new dynamic approaches based on the recommendations of these studies. They will let workers thrive in a world where there now is constant change.

Our Job Training 2000 proposal is one such effort. It will make federal training programmes more accessible, more efficient, and more responsive to local and individual needs. They are designed for all Americans, from young people who will not attend college, to adults with low incomes and minimal skills, to unemployed and displaced workers, and to highly skilled men and women who want to expand their skills. This programme is aimed at establishing a one-stop shopping network in communities across the country where people can gain information and access to a broad array of training programmes.

We are also focusing on another field, in which others may feel they have been at the forefront, and that is the development of a better school-to-work system for the 50 per cent of our young people who do not attend college, but desperately need school-to-work training. Student apprentices, after signing a formal agreement with their parents, their schools and an employer, will receive a combination of academic instruction, classroom vocational training, on-the-job training and mentoring. Upon completion of the course, students will receive a diploma, a skill competency certificate and, for them and for us most importantly, a job.

Along with equipping our men and women with the skills of tomorrow, we are working hard to ensure that all of our citizens have a fair chance to use their skills. We have continued our efforts to remove those obstacles that prevent qualified women and members of minorities from achieving the opportunities and benefits they desperately need and obviously deserve. Fully two-thirds of the new employees entering the workforce of the United States are women and members of minorities, and we have estimated that 47 per cent of all American workers will be women by the year 2000. The high level of global competition in today's world requires that the United States, and indeed every nation, make full use of the talents of all of its people, of every woman and every man. If we value and make full use of the diversity of this world, all of us, as nations and individuals alike, will have a better and more democratic future.

In the United States we have always held that our democracy is indivisible, that our democracy will not be complete until basic rights and opportunities are extended to all of our people.

Today, as we look out at a world that is increasingly interdependent and integrated, we see a movement towards democracy that has taken on global proportions, a movement that transcends geography and culture, language and economic development. As a result, democracy today is becoming indivisible on a world-wide scale, not only within each nation, but also among nations.

Shortly after President Bush took office he suggested before the United Nations that "If, for those who write the history of our times, the twentieth century is remembered as the century of the state, the twenty-first century must be an era of emancipation – the age of the individual". I believe that age is within our reach, and if we use the tools of democracy, the tools of a free market, tools that are finally available to more and more of us today, the age of the individual, and freedom for that individual can be part of us all.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. SILVA PENEDA (Minister of Employment and Social Security, Portugal) – First and foremost allow me on behalf of my Government, the Portuguese delegation and in my own capacity, to welcome the President warmly and congratulate him on his election by the representatives here present in recognition of his personal and political qualities which we believe constitute a guarantee that he will direct the work of the Session of the Conference with competence, efficiency and the constant aim of achieving consensus. I would also like to extend congratulations to all the Vice-Presidents.

The Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO formally states that improvement of working conditions and due protection for the worker in given situations, particularly in employment, constitute fundamental prerequisites for peace, harmony and progress.

In keeping with these principles the Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944 reasserted that employment and vocational training were essential objectives of the ILO to be sought in tandem with objectives relating to individual and collective freedoms. It is within this framework that the challenge should be understood which the Director-General has presented to us this year in introducing, as a theme for common reflection, Democratisation and the ILO. Similarly, it is in conformity with these lines of defence and safeguard of the fundamental rights of workers, including the right to a wage and the recognition of the right to employment and vocational training, that we must understand the topics to be discussed at this Session of the Conference in relation to challenges facing modern society, that is the need for structural adjustment of the economy. Whatever its cause, the transition from planned economy to market economy, from informal or subsistence economy to modern economy, or reconversion and industrial modernisation.

As stated in the excellent Report, for which we would like to express our admiration to the Director-General, democratisation of present-day societies and economies is not only political but to a large extent economic and social.

Democratisation will be successful in so far as those whom it is intended to reach participate not only as beneficiaries or recipients but also as actors and agents for free, partipatory and desired change.

The Director-General reminds us in this respect of the need to ensure effective independence, autonomy and freedom of social agents for change, if their participation in the tripartite debate is to be successful and if social cooperation is to lead to the desired shared and effective genuine social progress.

The processes of structural adjustment, whatever their causes, that we are witnessing, are complex, protracted and socially difficult. They will be more effective if their design, implementation and follow-up have been the subject of dialogue and cooperation. In other words, if they are based on the principles of tripartism and social democracy which are the stamp and hallmark of the ILO.

If cooperation and tripartism are proving apt for the process of modernisation, reconversion and technological substitution, these forms of social and industrial democracy have also proved themselves to be suitable instruments in many situations of structural adjustment currently under way across the world where the establishment of modern market economies is being determinedly pursued, filling the economic and social space previously occupied by informal and mere subsistence economies. An essential requirement for this good result has been the recognition of the independence, freedom and autonomy of the three social partners concerned – governments, employers and trade unions.

With respect to the transition of the Central and Eastern European countries from centralised and planned economic systems to market economy systems, the recent seminar held under the auspices of the ILO in Brussels on 7 and 8 April 1992 has shown us, with the rich humanity of the contributions made by the tripartite representatives, that in fact the road ahead lies along the way of tripartism and social cooperation.

We are in a phase where the challenge of development implies the promotion of human dignity.

Tripartism and social cooperation are, we believe, key factors, not only for economic change, but also because they are the essence of a political stance full of potential.

Portugal is well placed to emphasise this approach. In recent years, in my country, we have modernised the economic and social fabric by gradually reducing the weight of agricultural labour, the technological reconversion of industrial sectors, and the relative strengthening of the position of various factors and elements of the services sector.

Of course this process has necessarily raised social problems. It has been tackled, and indeed solutions have been found, in a spirit of cooperation involving the Government, the unions and the employers associations. Today dialogue, information, consultation, indeed the need for tripartite consensus, come naturally to us.

I can affirm that the spirit and policy of social cooperation in Portugal has now moved beyond the stage of consultation and information in terms of labour law policy, moving on to cover the definition of wage policies, vocational training, occupational health and safety, tax relief and more specific measures which are be taken at the level of individual enterprises, in innumerable aspects of collective relationships, among which I would like to mention particularly those which concerning the matching of human resources in the enterprise to its true needs and prospects of development.

Examples of this are the various social cooperation agreements reached in recent years, which have been implemented on the basis of a sharing of responsibility between Government and the social partners.

The policy of the Portuguese Government is clear on this: it is a policy of dialogue and social cooperation which constitutes one of the basic pillars of general Government policy.

Indeed I can say that the recent entry of Portugal into the European Monetary System, which took place a few months ago, was only possible because of the recent agreement reached on income policy.

Many of the positive results which have taken place in recent years in economic and social fields are due undoubtedly to this climate of dialogue and social cooperation.

For these reasons my country is now able to endorse strongly the approaches and solutions outlined by the Director-General in his excellent Report.

For us, in these uncertain times, the way ahead, while it may not always be the easiest, is increasingly clear. It is the way of the future and of modernisation.

The activities of one of the committees of the Conference are likely to produce one or possibly two texts on the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, since this matter is now in its second discussion. This subject is closely related to the potential consequences of structural adjustment, including the unprofitability or phasing out of economic activities and uncompetitiveness.

I would also like to refer to the important issue of adjustment and development of human resources, which is currently being discussed in another committee analysing another dimension of economic structural adjustment.

Since it is not possible to provide all workers with all the training required, I think we have to consider not just the short-term requirements of training, but the long-term direction of it, which takes into consideration mid- and long-term needs. In any event, I think that so far as training is concerned, great efforts must be made to find out what the qualitative mid- and long-term needs of the workforce will be. This is unquestionably a realistic attitude which facilitates development. The ILO cannot help but pay particularly close attention to this.

Before concluding, I would like to make two further comments. The first has to do with the need to support strongly technical cooperation for many countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America, which are now undergoing a radical transformation to a market economy and thus will surely require a great deal of advice.

In this regard Portugal has a wealth of experience thanks to its relations with the five Portugese-speaking African countries. I sincerely hope that our friends from Angola, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique and Sao Tome and Principe, represented here today, will be able to develop technical cooperation projects with us in the future.

I would clearly like to state here that, for us, we see this as a starting point, and once again I would like to express my availability and willingness, and that of my Government, to enhance this sort of relationship, which we feel is invaluable. We share the same language and five centuries of common and shared experience, and we feel that therefore we should be all the more demanding.

The second point I would like to make is to note my satisfaction, at a time when Portugal holds the function of the presidency of the European Community, that I have been able for the first time at this Conference to speak Portuguese, as have indeed been the Government, Worker and Employer members of seven countries scattered across the globe, who represent a vast community of more than 200 million persons in total.

We do hope that this is a step towards the acceptance of the Portuguese language as an official language of this Conference.

Mr. OKABE (Administrative Vice-Minister of Labour, Japan) – On behalf of the Government of Japan, I would like to extend my sincere congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would also like to express my warm welcome to the Republic of Korea and the Socialist Republic of Viet Nam, and other States which have newly joined the International Labour Organisation.

I would, first of all, like to make a few remarks about recent developments which have a close bearing upon democratisation.

The recent wave of reforms that started in Eastern Europe have been such that they have had an impact not only upon the European situation but also upon the basic structure on the international order after the Second World War. This is bound, as a matter of course, to have a substantial influence on the stability of the Asian and Pacific region. Since these reforms are all aimed at introducing a system based on freedom of democracy as well as a market economy, the concern of our country over such reforms assumes a special significance.

Moreover, the groundswell of this political and economic democratisation has now spread beyond Eastern European to reach Asia, Latin America and Africa; and we see today a deep and powerful current of democratic wind and renewal sweeping the entire world.

Today, our country, as one of the major advanced democratic nations, is expected to play not only an economic role but also a political one; and I believe that our country should carry on an active diplomacy for world peace and prosperity.

As mentioned in the Director-General's Report, the ILO has so far continuously striven for the cause of social justice and democratic decision-making.

The far-reaching reforms that are taking place in the world today encourage such ILO activities. In my opinion, the ILO's role at the moment should be to extend cooperation and assistance to the countries which are faced with difficulties as they undergo reform. ILO assistance covers a wide area. However, the most important task at present is to provide assistance to help job creation. In so doing, the ILO should draw upon the knowledge and experience it has so far acquired, while the governments, employers and workers should come together to cooperate in a spirit of dialogue and collaboration.

Let me now refer to the approaches taken by our country. It has been providing official development aid, taking into due account the efforts made by the recipient countries towards democratisation and the introduction of an economy on market economy lines. The total amount earmarked for this programme in 1990 exceeded US$9 billion. Under this programme, our country has been making an active effort to assist developing countries in Asia and the Pacific region, which have been promoting their democratisation programmes including those for a switchover to a market economy – through the ILO's multi-bi programmes and through the activities of the Asian and Pacific Skills Development Programme (APSDEP).

In addition, our country has provided assistance to Eastern Europe in recent years. In particular, our assistance provided under the ILO's multi-bi programmes includes surveys to identify the actual status of employment and other labour problems and case-studies on labour problems arising from the privatisation of public enterprises in advanced countries. At the same time, our country is also promoting personnel exchange programmes which consist of inviting personnel managers from industries in these countries to Japan for training in Japanese enterprises, and dispatching our labour experts to these countries.

We are also aware of the need to extend cooperation to assist in the democratisation of the Indo-China region and to try and find a solution of the Cambodian refugee problem.

I believe, as I mentioned earlier, that the ILO has a major role to play in solving the problem of democratisation. I also consider, as the Director-General pointed out, that it is vitally important to effect reforms within the ILO. I understand that discussions geared to reformation are taking place, including the establishment of a working party. In these circumstances, I would like to express my firm hopes that the ILO will accomplish this task through dialogue among governments, employers and workers – on the basis of the principle of tripartism.

I would now like to touch upon the standard-setting activities of the ILO. The ILO has, through its standard-setting activities, succeeded in producing remarkable instruments to protect human rights and improve working conditions – to which I pay a high tribute. This year is the final year of the United Nations Decade of Disabled Persons, and our country ratified, in May this year, with the approval of the Diet, the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159)

It is indeed a great pleasure for me to be able to report our country's ratification of the said Convention to this session of the Conference.

Before I conclude my remarks, I would like to express my sincere hopes that fruitful discussions will take place at this session, on the basis of the Report of the Director-General. I also pledge the commitment of our country to render renewed efforts towards the fulfilment of the important tasks of the ILO.

Finally, I express my hope and belief that the International Labour Organisation will achieve sound development in the years to come.

Mr. HASSENKAM (Permanent Secretary, Ministry of Labour, Denmark) – On behalf of the Danish delegation, I wish to congratulate the President on his election at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, and I wish him the best of success in the performance of his important functions.

Let me also express my compliments on the Report from the Director-General, which forms the basis of this debate in the plenary sitting of the Conference.

The theme of the main Report this year is Democratisation and the ILO. This topic is certainly a very timely and relevant one.

We have in recent years witnessed a development in many parts of the world, especially in Central and Eastern Europe, with the breakdown of old totalitarian regimes and their replacement by governments and institutions which subscribe to democratic values. We have all followed these developments with joy. But, as we have also seen, the process has not been – and still is not – an easy one.

The setting up of new democratic institutions and practices is not a matter than can be done overnight. The setting up of well-functioning organisations of employers and workers and a tripartite structure is a process which takes time and, more importantly, it must come from the roots, from the people themselves. You cannot just give other countries your own recipe.

But, of course, the ILO could and should help those countries in several ways. The ILO is in a better position than any other organisation when it comes to assisting them in the establisment of employers' and workers' organisations and in their efforts to achieve the twofold objective of adjustment to change, and social protection. This is clearly within the mandate of the ILO. As the Director-General states in his Report, "the ILO is no longer the scene of ideological clashes and is able to offer its to all constituents the opportunity for close cooperation". This is a very positive development which we should fully utilise.

Right now there is a trend in Denmark – a European country, which firmly intends to remain so – and within the ILO to concentrate on the new democracies in Central and Eastern Europe. This may be understandable, but we should remember that there are also other parts of the world where a democratisation process is going on and where it is important to promote and assist this process.

Democratisation and the renewed respect for fundamental human rights play an increasingly important role in many parts of the world. The ILO can contribute to strengthening this positive development.

Also the various technical cooperation projects in the developing part of the world must take these issues into account. We support the Director-General's deliberations concerning a strengthening of the relations between standards, fundamental, human rights and technical cooperation. I am quite confident that the ILO can and will live up to these new challenges. It has the possibilities and the instruments to do so.

Again this year we find a number of very important technical items on the agenda of the Conference.

The first technical item on the agenda is the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. My Government will have no difficulty in supporting the adoption of this Convention later during the Conference.

The second item, which deals with the prevention of industrial disasters, is also important since such disasters have in recent years given rise to public concern and a call for effective measures, also at the international level. Let us hope that progress will be made in this work.

The last technical item is a general discussion on adjustment and human resources development. Vocational training programmes and activities are of importance to individuals in order to improve their employment opportunities; they are important to employers in order to improve production methods and the quality of their products; and, last but not least, they are important to the prosperity and development of society as a whole.

I will now return to the Director-General's Special Report on the Application of the Declaration Concerning Action against Apartheid. It reflects two important facts. On the one hand, it is clear that the recent changes in South Africa have continued – for instance the referendum in March this year. There is thus a certain ground for optimism. On the other hand, it is equally clear that all aspects of apartheid have not yet been abolished, that a new democratic constitution has not yet been agreed upon and that an interim government has not yet been put into place.

The ILO's role in this long process has been important, and may not be overestimated. But, in order to be able to continue to have a significant role to play, the ILO must take into account the changes and developments which are taking place and hopefully will take place in the future. It is the view of my Government that the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid needs to be updated and that the ILO already now must be able to prepare projects in South Africa which could then be implemented after the formation of an interim government.

Let me conclude by expressing my delegation's strong support to the various proposals for reforms of the functioning of the International Labour Conference. We have seen the first good results already this year and we will hopefully see further progress in the years to come.

We also support the Director-General's attempts to revitalise the working of the Organisation itself and would like to stress the need for doing so with respect of the unique tripartite structure of the ILO.

Mr. BALOPI (Minister of Labour and Home Affairs, Botswana) – On behalf of the Botswana delegation and myself, I take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his unanimous and deserved election at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents and I wish the team success in guiding the deliberations of this session.

My special tribute goes to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for his initiative in determining that the theme of his Report should be, Democratisation and the ILO. This theme could not have been more timely, considering the current global political developments.

A few years ago and, in particular, during the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, the debates in the plenary were guided by the Director-General's Report whose theme was the observance of human rights and this coincided with the marking of the 40th anniversary of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The Conference recognised then and endorsed that the denial of civil and political rights has adverse effects on the enjoyment of economic and social rights and that the neglect of social protection and well-being goes hand in hand with the inability of the poorer and more vulnerable populations to have a say in the decision-making process.

My delegation believes that our discussions then gave impetus to the positive changes that we are witnessing today and the ILO ought to be pleased about the positive role it has played. It is becoming increasingly evident that the principles and values upon which the ILO was founded and has gallantly upheld are gradually becoming a global reality. The focal point of these principles is the right of all human beings irrespective of race, creed or sex to pursue their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom, dignity, economic security and equal opportunity.

Indeed, we are currently witnessing whirlwinds sweeping across the world bringing with them spectacular changes in the world's political climate. The growing demands for political pluralism and the collapse of the communist regimes in Eastern Europe have led to the powerful resurgence of democracy. The democratic whirlwinds are a blessing to mankind as they are bringing with them a period of political accountability, respect for fundamental human rights and, hopefully, economic prosperity and universal lasting peace based on social justice.

As may already be known, Botswana has, since independence, established a non-racial multi-party democracy which guarantees freedom of speech, freedom of association, freedom of the press and other freedoms which are based on its strong traditional democratic norms akin to those found in the Western developed democracies.

The Government of Botswana has unfailingly upheld these freedoms and liberties over the last 20 years since self-government. All these are underpinned by the rule of law. Thus Botswana's adherence to time-honoured internationally-acclaimed democratic principles has underpinned our politico-socio-economic development efforts. Consultations in our national development planning process continue to be given prominence.

It is now a matter of public knowledge that our democratic tradition has ensured the active participation of our people in the development of our economy.

Our national development planning objectives, which are rapid economic growth, social justice, economic independence, and sustained development, have sought to improve the well-being of Botswana. These have been embodied in our national principles of democracy, development, self-reliance and unity. These development objectives and principles have been firmly and steadfastly adhered to. Our emphasis now is to achieve sustainable development and to improve the participation of Botswana in the process of development. This is hoped to ensure that the fruits of development accrue to the individual, for it is still not be acceptable to proclaim the theoretical predominance of social and economic rights while the primary needs of the individual and the community remain unfulfilled.

While there appears to be an emerging general consensus in Africa on the need to change to democracy and uphold the basic democratic principles and values, we strongly believe that the actual democratic institutions should evolve from within Africa itself if they are to be acceptable to our people. We are hopeful that, although there are obstacles and risks involved in the achievement of genuine democracy, those countries endeavouring to achieve the same will be successful.

It remains our ardent belief that the values of democracy are universal. With the growing call for the establishment of more participatory systems at the political, economic and social levels, it is only proper that workers, employers and their representatives organisations should play a more positive role in the development objectives of their societies. The rights of independent and free workers' organisations should be guaranteed, and trade unions should be assisted to be in a position to adopt a more independent stand in their negotiations with employers and government on economic and social policy issues. In this regard, the ILO's continued assistance in workers' education programmes is highly appreciated and should be continued.

With regard to past activities of the ILO, it is reassuring to note that during the biennium 1990-91 technical cooperation expenditure for the African region increased, as compared to the previous years.

The ILO has and continues to play a significant role in assisting member countries to tackle major problems of unemployment by paying particular attention to issues such as public sector retrenchment, wage freezes, galloping inflation and lack of employment opportunities for new entrants into the labour market. We note that particular attention has also been given to areas such as training, research, consultancy and advisory services through regional labour administration centres.

Botswana is a fully-fledged member of the international community whose aspirations, concerns and anxieties the country fully embraces. Of particular interest are the political changes taking place in southern Africa and in particular South Africa. These changes are bound to have a profound impact on Botswana and other economies of the subregion. In recognition of this, the Southern African Development Coordination Conference – SADCC for short – meeting in Arusha in August 1991 had as its theme "SADCC towards economic integration". The Conference concluded that the only available option for the southern African subregion to develop and become competitive is through economic integration. It is our fervent hope that such integration will involve post-apartheid South Africa, with a democratically elected government.

I know that as recently as last month the ILO convened a tripartite conference in southern Africa in Harare, Zimbabwe, whose focus was also economic integration in the southern African subregion and the final eradication of the last vestiges of apartheid. Botswana was fully represented by a tripartite delegation. This consultative conference was meant to set policy guidelines regarding the role of the ILO in post-apartheid South Africa and the entire subregion. We look to the Committee on Apartheid to consider favourably the recommendations of the tripartite conference.

While we all note the positive developments that have evolved in South Africa regarding the democratisation process, it is vital that the international community should remain vigilant and work relentlessly towards the total eradication of apartheid. We should avoid doing anything at this point that may reverse the process of democratisation.

We in Botswana continue to be distressed by the escalating violence and loss of life in South Africa, and we can but call on the internal parties in South Africa to work towards ending the violence.

We expect that the role the ILO should play in post-apartheid South Africa and the subregion should be of assisting in consolidating the already existing regional integration institutions such as the Southern African Development Coordination Conference, the Southern Africa Labour Commission and others. The ILO should also concentrate its effort on human resources development, especially in the field of technical and vocational training.

The ILO's role in promoting small-scale entrepreneurs, assisting countries to embark on income- and employment-generating activities, especially in the rural areas and with emphasis on the disadvantaged groups like women and the disabled, should be intensified.

At the regional level, regional institutions should be strengthened to facilitate them to play a meaningful role in areas of management training, infrastructure capacity building and the provision of technical expertise among local staff.

We will continue to call upon the ILO to help to strengthen the implementation of international labour standards and in particular those dealing with tripartite and bipartite machinery.

Finally, I note that the agenda for this Session of the Conference includes other issues like the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, the prevention of industrial disasters and adjustment and human resources development, which are all topical issues in our countries and my delegation looks forward to fruitful conclusion on such matters.

Original – Japanese: Mr. TANAKA (Workers' delegate, Japan) – It is my great honour to have this opportunity to participate in the discussion of the Report of the Director-General at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. At the outset I would like to congratulate the President of the Conference on his election. With his wisdom, I am sure that the Conference will be a great success. I would like also to congratulate Brother Mugalla, Worker Vice-President of the Conference.

Another important event that I must emphasise is the presence of my most respected friend, Mr. Chiluba, who came to Japan a few years ago at our invitation and whose visit has deepened our friendship. I am very happy that he was elected President of Zambia and he delivered an outstanding speech as a guest of honour to this session of the Conference. This important event symbolises democratisation in Africa. I wish him good health and full success in his work.

I would like to start my speech by saying that the Report of the Director-General on democratisation and the ILO is most timely. It has my full support.

As pointed out in the Report, it is evident that democracy is based on the freedom of individuals, freedom of association, freedom of expression and universal sufferage. A nation which lacks any one of these elements cannot be regarded as a democracy.

Also, it is equally important to remember that democracy as a political system is not more than a formality. Substance must be given to democracy. This means reducing inequality, guaranteeing decent food, shelter and clothing and allowing every citizen to participate actively in various aspects of the society.

The most serious problem today is that many peoples who chose democracy in Latin America, Africa and Asia, as well as in the former socialist countries, are suffering from economic difficulties and anxieties in their lives. If such a situation continues for a long period of time and if they are disappointed with democracy then disorder and poverty would prevail in society, dictatorships would reappear, and world peace may even be threatened.

I support the Director-General when he says that the role of the ILO is to provide the means of existence for these newly born democracies that are suffering from economic hardship. In this respect, I would like to express my opinion based on my experience of the post Second World War period, when the Japanese political and social systems were demolished, its economy was in turmoil, and democracy was introduced.

After the Second World War when food was scarce in Japan, the first measure taken to cope with this problem was the distribution of agricultural land. Farmers became the owners of the land on which they were working. The measure clearly enhanced the motivation of farmers and increased agricultural production, thus contributing to social stability. I am not saying that such a measure is or is not necessary in other countries, I am simply pointing out that motivation must be given to the produces of agricultural products.

There is one issue that I feel I am obliged to mention. In the 1950s automation was regarded as a new industrial revolution and it was promoted in industrialised countries. At that time, Japan's economy was still weak and still in the developing stages. A serious dispute took place, especially among trade unions, as to whether automation should be introduced in the name of the Productivity Promotion Movement.

On the one hand, there were trade unions which were strongly opposed to the introduction of automation from the standpoint that it might deprive the workers of their jobs, it might lead to redundancy of labour and would result in the dismissal of workers. On the other hand, there were trade unions that advocated that the introduction of automation should be promoted, insisting that automation would increase productivity and help enterprises enlarge the pie that they could then share with workers which would in turn increase employment and improve workers' lives. These two conflicting opinions created severe antagonism and fights among the trade unions.

The trade unions that supported the promotion of automation proposed eight policies including the following three principles. First, the fair distribution of the profits generated by high productivity, second, the establishment of a system of prior consultation on management policy, such as a joint management council, with employers and workers on an equal footing, and third, the creation of facilities for the training and education of workers to adapt themselves to automation.

Employers accepted these propositions, and in return workers fully cooperated with the automation process. I believe that this provided a strong impetus to the economic development of our country.

I would like to emphasise that our own experience has shown that cooperation between workers and employers with mutual respect of each others' proper role, is very important for the development of the economy. I believe that democratisation in the workplace in industry is the only way to achieve this form of cooperation.

Japan is said to be the country that benefited most from democratisation and the long period of peace after World War II because the Japanese economy developed and improved in this environment. Therefore, it is an important task for Japan to contribute to world peace and to the advancement of democracy as well as, of course, to economic development. The battle for democracy is taking place especially in China, Thailand, the Philippines, Cambodia and other countries. It is quite natural for Japan to do as much as possible for economic development, for the promotion of democracy and for the establishment of human rights and trade union rights in these Asian countries, thus contributing to peace in this region. I have heard from some quarters that limitations on human rights and trade union rights are necessary for economic development, but I strongly oppose this view.

Regrettably I must point out that human rights and trade union rights are being violated, not only in Asia but also in Africa, Latin America and the Middle East. Just as we have done in Asia, Japan must make every effort to assist in the democratisation process in these regions.

Allow me to touch upon the issue of apartheid. President De Klerk announced his intention to visit Japan recently. During his visit economic cooperation between South Africa and Japan was a major subject of discussion. I must point out that the African National Congress of South Africa and the African trade unions strongly called for the continuation of sanctions until an interim government is established to enact a democratic Constitution. Until our South African colleagues asks us to lift these sanctions, I strongly request, together with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) the Japanese Government and the employers to refrain from economic cooperation.

On behalf of the 8 million members of the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO), I assure you that we will support the expansion of ILO technical cooperation in those countries that promote and further democratisation and I would request my Government and employers to further strengthen cooperation with the ILO.

Let me conclude my speech by expressing my ardent hope that the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference will achieve full and resounding success.

Original – Spanish: Mr. LINARES CALVO (Minister, Chairman, State Committee for Labour and Social Security, Cuba) – The Report of the Director-General this year is devoted to a topic of general interest which has different approaches and results. It could not be otherwise because the democratic spirit which motivates us all would not achieve specific results if it were not marked by diversity and the full respect for the national sovereignty and right to self-determination of all peoples.

A true democracy is one that is capable of focusing development activities on the people, who in turn are its protagonists and final end. For those who live without the most basic of rights, for those who live in poverty and backwardness, illiteracy, unemployment, ignorance and disease, and who daily see an ever-greater gap between rich and poor, the concepts of democracy and equality are empty and abstract. The viability of political democracy is only possible on the basis of economic democracy.

Today's changing world is not only, as some point out, a world in which democracy replaces totalitarianism. The high democratic ideals which we are all seeking must begin with the necessary structural changes which enables us to do away with inequality, ensure a just and equitable distribution of wealth and make it possible for the population to have a full access to social benefits and political rights.

The international community has ratified time and time again the indivisibility of rights inherent in human beings, i.e. civil, political, economic, social and cultural.

The forms of government, the political system and the mechanisms which guarantee a genuine participation of the whole population in political life, pertain solely to the sovereign decisions of each State. They are determined by traditions, by experiences and the aspirations of each people.

The Director-General indicates that "democracy is anything but a static concept, and every step forward, every achievement, is just one more stage in its evolution".

We cannot try to impose a single mode of democracy based on a static concept, which does not recognise that the people truly shoulders its responsibility towards itself and all its parts, in the same way that the individual and his family take care of their own destiny, as the Director-General states, through forms and systems of government and economic regimes other than multipartism and a market economy.

There are many examples in every part of the world which demonstrate that real democracy does not depend on multipartism. Likewise, there are supposedly democratic countries in which the president is swept into office with a bit more than 20 per cent of the electorates' votes, and these same countries advise or claim to impose on weak underdeveloped countries a model of multipartism which maintains fragmented societies and makes them powerless to solve their problems and defend their national interests. In this way we are creating favourable conditions for the domination of interests foreign to the national interest.

Democracy in Cuba is a conquest based on national unity, on social property and the people's participation. It is exercised in the streets, in workplaces, in schools and universities and also in voting boxes, under our system of organisation and elections at various levels of government.

This participation of the people in decisions which govern their destinies is the essence of our democracy.

In 1975 our people, through a free and secret vote, in a plebiscite in which over 97 per cent of the voters participated, approved the Constitution of the Republic, and decided that a single party would guide the national policy. They did this, first and foremost, on the basis of an ideology which advocates a fight for true independence, under a single party.

In Cuba there is no multipartism but there is multiparticipation. The Party does not put forward candidates. These are put forward by the people. Currently, we are seeking ways to achieve even greater participation. We have agreed to carry out direct elections at all levels of our representatives. We are consolidating the autonomous nature of all our organisations and we are opening the ranks of the Party to the believers.

In order to handle the priorities of our society, and not to meet foreign requirements, the National Assembly of People's Power, the supreme body of state power in our country, will devote its session next July to a discussion of constitutional reforms; it is currently working on electoral legislation bills and its own legislative charter. In these texts, we are reforming the economic system in accordance with our current requirements, providing for the establishment of direct and secret vote in all state bodies. All this is the expression of the maturity achieved by the Cuban revolution's political process after three decades of efforts, achievements and external harassment.

Cuba for over 30 years has experienced a rigorous economic blockage imposed by the greatest imperialist power on earth, which today is redoubling its efforts to break the people's will and force it back to an already well-known past in which there is no freedom or independence, and where, as 32 years ago, social injustice, inequality, hunger and poverty are the lot of most of the people.

But despite the economic blocade and the hostility of the enemies of the revolution, Cuba can demonstrate achievements which many countries have not reached in spite their long experience with market economies and multipartism. I shall cite only a few examples: free medical and hospital care for the whole population; a child mortality rate last year of 10.7 per thousand born alive; one doctor per 274 inhabitants; life expectancy which is rising yearly. In the 1955-60 quinquennium it was 61.8 years; in 1990 it was 73.9; presently it exceeds 77 years. In employment, last year despite the economic difficulties which we were experiencing, the unemployement rate did not exceed 4 per cent; in other words, it is below that of the immense majority of countries. All the workers are protected by a decent and just social security scheme.

Once again we have to recall that socialism in Cuba was not imposed by a foreign military power, but was the outcome of a popular revolution which triumphed over abuse, crime and the plunderings of governments which had embraced a model of democracy and a market economy which some now wish to make universal and absolute. The fact is, however, that some of these advocates of democracy fail to apply this model in practice.

Based on the failure of socialism in a specific geopolitical context, the market economy is touted as being synonymous with the general well-being; but this view overlooks the historical responsibility of this economic system for backwardness, poverty and inequality in today's world, a world in which the rich become richer while the poor become poorer.

We have been talking about democracy, market economies, and multipartism for years. These concepts prevail throughout most of the world. However, the panorama we see today in the vast majority of Third World countries is one of poverty, backwardness, disease, malnutrition and illiteracy. The solution which some are advocating for our peoples, based on neo-liberal theories, perpetuates and aggravates these evils, increases inequalities in incomes, and turns into pariahs most of our population, in order to achieve a false equilibrium within which only certain minorities, which have always enjoyed privilege and well-being, will live confortably.

In order to handle the realities which our peoples are experiencing today and the lack of viable solutions to acute problems, the International Labour Organisation's programmes, within the area of its competence, should seek specific ways to re-establish a more just international economic order, with emphasis on a more equitable distribution of wealth in each country, and greater social justice, so that each man and woman may be truly free and live in dignity.

Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan) – Let me begin by extending to the President my warm congratulations from the employers of Pakistan on his election. We have on the agenda this year some very important issues of particular interest to the developing countries of my region. I am confident that with his able guidance the session will achieve some very positive results. I also extend my congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents on their well-deserved election which reflects the confidence their respective groups have placed in them.

I compliment the Director-General on presenting the Report on the ILO's role in the process of democratisation in member States. It is one of the most important themes of recent years. One can, at the very outset, fully agree that the cross-fertilisation of democracy and development can help in reaping dividends of peace for social purposes. We share the aspirations of the Director-General and the ideals of freedom and justice cherished by the ILO which only democratisation can achieve. The new format of the Report and the cordial invitation for suggestions in the last paragraph of the Report compels me to propose some thoughts emanating from the employers of Pakistan.

The idea of using technical cooperation to lay the foundation for the application of standards, and that standards be used as models for the content of technical programmes, has been under debate recently. By itself, the proposition may seem logical. But caution has to be exercised when this principle is to be applied to developing countries most of which may not find the state of their economic development quite conducive to the application of certain labour standards. Such an approach may deprive countries in the developing world of technical cooperation and assistance which may otherwise be necessary for stimulating the process of development.

The President of Zambia, in his address to the special sitting of the Conference, emphasised the need for employers and workers to create an atmosphere for coexistence. These words of wisdom could not have come at a more opportune time. His speech encourages me to propose that the ILO should now take upon itself the task of investigating the possibilities of placing on the International Labour Conference agenda items in the area of efficiency and productivity, industrial discipline as well as the restoration of the right of the employer to manage an enterprise.

The suggestions concerning the principle of voluntary negotiations and the fact that institutions of collective bargaining should facilitate negotiations between social partners instead of imposing restrictions is welcomed. During the past few years, I have seen bipartism gain some good ground in my country which has helped to maintain durable peace in many enterprises. However, for the idea of bipartism to flourish and be safeguarded within the context of collective bargaining it is necessary to check interference by governments in the name of welfare legislation.

The problems created in the process of democratisation by the existence of heterogeneous economic and political situations is well discussed in the Report. The developing countries will certainly be interested in the ILO's contribution in promoting policies and programmes that encourage the entrepreneurship in order to promote the establishment and development of enterprises with a view to creating jobs and introducing new methods to raise the level of productivity of the small and medium-sized enterprises. Assistance to improve the potential of the informal sector and its capacity to generate employment and incomes is also essential.

With regard to the programme and budget proposals we appreciate the priority themes spelled out in the Report. The involvement of the developing countries in combating the negative effects of structural adjustment has led to the restricted allocation of resources to the two main areas which need maximum attention for combating poverty. These two areas are education and health. The Minister from Brazil in his statement to the plenary the other day correctly emphasised the importance of education to develop any economy. I cannot add another word to what he has already said in his learned address except to state that even the basic fruits of education and the most rudimentary forms of health facilities are not available in most of the African and Asian countries. It will therefore be in keeping with the ILO theme of helping the advance of democracy if programmes to promote literacy were to be undertaken by the ILO as items of top priority.

Substantial changes in the methods and structure of the ILO and its regional offices has been suggested. These changes and programmes will receive our full support with the hope that the ILO will address itself to the peculiar problems of the developing countries in a more pragmatic manner. I venture to suggest that for the purpose of programme trends, the geographical regions be subgrouped into industrially developed, developing and underdeveloped regions. Separate strategy and planning may be proposed by the ILO in the subgroups so that all the developing and underdeveloped regions in Asia, Africa and the Pacific could receive uniform attention. The priorities of ILO activities could thus be redefined in these countries keeping in view the objective economic realities.

The Employers' Federation of Pakistan has been pursuing, in close coordination with the ILO and NGOs, an awareness programme for developing consensus among different social segments with a view to implementing various recommendations of the National Manpower Commission which, besides others, touch upon such vital issues as rural employment generation, reabsorption of returning migrants, improving the productivity and incomes of women workers and finally a comprehensive labour market information system regarding human resource development and the institutional framework. Apart from the efforts mentioned, my federation has, with the cooperation and assistance of the Bureau for Employers' Activities, the ARPLA, the Confederation of Norwegian Business and Industry, the NHO and the FES, held various seminars, symposia and workshops in human resource development, occupational safety and health as well as other areas of topical interest to member organisations. We hope that the cooperation by the Bureau for Employers' Activities, as well as the other organisations mentioned earlier, will continue during the coming year.

I fervently hope that the efforts of democratisation receive sufficient safeguards through this international forum so that the tides of the North and the South, the East and the West, the haves and the have-nots, the super powers and the zero powers, may not upset the already topsy-turvy equilibrium between the developed and developing countries. The ILO is the only organisation towards which we turn, hoping for a better future. I pray that this session of the Conference will come up with concrete measures and suggestions which may bring to the teeming millions of the developing world the message of a better life for tomorrow thus marking the success of democracy as a way of life.

Original – French: Mr. SAID (Government delegate, Comoros) – Following the example of previous speakers, permit me to address my sincerest congratulations to the President on his brilliant election. I am convinced that he, together with the team around him, will be able to lead, the work of the present session of the Conference to full success.

To all delegates present and participating in this session, I bring, on behalf of His Excellency Mr. Said Mohamed Djohar, President of the Islamic Federal Republic of the Comoros, and also on behalf of the Government of my country, my sincerest greetings.

The 79th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at a time when, as rightly emphasised in the Report of the Director-General, the political climate throughout the world has undergone a spectacular change. Besides the dismantling of the Berlin wall and the end of authoritarian regimes, there is the emergence, out of from the shambles of these moribund regimes, of democracy everywhere on our globe. The aspiration of the people for democracy and a State of law is now an inexorable movement. Freedom, law and democracy represent for mankind a fundamental and vital need for his existence and socio-economic development. Moreover, my Government would also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO on his choice of the theme of democracy for the principal subject discussion at this session. We believe that the questions raised in the Director-General's Report are very pertinent. By linking democracy, economic development and social well-being, the Report the great interest of democracy in the life of mankind in this period characterised by profound economic crisis, particularly in the developing countries burdened as they are, by the weight of debt.

My Government shares fully the point of view expressed by the Director-General that democratisation is "the action whereby a people assumes responsibility for itself and all its component parts, exactly as individuals, and their families shape their own destiny."

We understand very well that when seen from this dynamic point of view democracy, the international organisations, in a more and more marked break with the past, are establishing a direct link between human rights, democracy and development.

As for our organisation, the ILO, it has never ceased to deploy its efforts to democratise the economic and social life of member States. The Declaration of Philadephia and the various Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference on tripartite consultations are proof of the interest that the ILO has always shown for democracy.

I said earlier that people have committed themselves inexorably to democracy. This is a fact. But as is the case with any newborn creature, we have in our hands a fragile democracy because, firstly, in many of our countries democracy is still only embryonic and, secondly, persistent poverty and misery may pose a real threat to it.

With the programmes for structural adjustments which are inevitable in many of our countries, the risk of a failed democracy may be very grave because of the consequences of such programmes, in particular, on the most vulnerable populations.

Hence the necessity to reflect on what the role of the ILO should be today in establishing a state of law and what its contribution to the balance of powers inherent in any genuine democratic system should be. How can the ILO assist States to meet the aspirations of their citizens so that the latter can continue to have faith in democratic institutions?

My Government expects a lot from the present session of the Conference and from the experience of other States. This expectation is all the more justified because my country has been committed now for the last two years along the path of democracy and the path of structural adjustment.

So far as the democratic process is concerned, I should like to recall that after expelling the mercenaries from the Comoros and following the investiture of President Said Mohamed Djohar as Head of State, our people committed itself to a pluralistic path, an indispensable condition for the socio-economic development of my country. A democrat of the first rank, Said Mohamed Djohar, with the support of the people, has adopted a policy to promote the development and strengthening of multipartism. The workers and employers soon created their own occupational organisations. They are freely exercising their union rights without any interference. A law on general amnesty promulgated immediately after President Djohar assumed power has allowed all sentences based on political grounds to be cancelled and the rehabilitation of officials who were victims of unjustified sanctions. Such a measure has resulted in the establisment of a climate of political peace in our country. A national reconciliation pact signed between the President of the Republic and all political parties, a total of 24, including the opposition, has further strengthened this climate.

A national conference in which all political parties and mass organisations participated actively and with great enthusiasm was then to deal with the revision of our Constitution. The draft Constitution, resulting from the national conference and adopted by the electors on Sunday, 8 June, within the framework of a referendum, reflects the aspirations of the people of the Comoros to a State of law guaranteeing democracy and public freedom.

Turning to the economic situation, we are in my country faced on the one hand, by endemic unemployment which particularly affects our young people and, on the other, by a very high rate of population growth. The Government of my country is therefore facing a difficult challenge. The seriousness of the economic situation is such that the Government has no other choice than to negotiate with the IMF and the World Bank a programme of structural adjustment and everyone knows the painful consequences of such policies for our peoples. However, the authorities of my country are determined to overcome all obstacles to social and economic development and to make this final decade of this century the decade of hope for our people.

This is why a series of measures are absolutely indispensable. They cover the following: stabilisation of public finances; the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises; the development of self-employment; the end of monopolies; vocational training; the protection of wage-earners; the retraining of public services officials affected by adjustment programmes.

Moreover, commission of inquiry has been set up on the question of public funds following a request by the national Conference. It must establish the individual responsibility of all persons concerned and the charges to be brought. The commission's role is: to recuperate outstanding finances and pay debts of individuals or companies; nationalise the property of hirelings; request State intervention in order to end secret bank accounts, both of the levels of national and foreign banks.

At the same time, my Government is also continuing with reforms in the civil administration, to make an instrument in the service of development and not an institution of social assistance which is neither efficient or productive for the country.

The Government of Comoros has resolutely decided to look for the cause of democracy in my country. Hence, we have to fight against poverty in all its forms. And this is why we are appealing to the ILO, to all international organisations and to all friendly countries to help us overcome our poverty. More than ever before my country needs the help and assistance of the ILO in the various areas of its competence; since as the Director-General rightly points out in his Report: "No political regime, no economic system, can expect to endure unless it is capable of satisfying the basic needs of the population. Hopes for greater well-being and better security of existence provide as effective a spur to the citizens as aspirations towards greater liberty and justice."

The three questions on the agenda for this session are of paramount importance – the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, the prevention of industrial disasters and adjustment and human resources development. My delegation hopes to draw great benefit from the discussion on these topics and the conclusions made.

As far as the activities of the ILO are concerned in the course of 1991, my delegation would like to congratulate our Organisation on its constant efforts to improve the well-being of the population in my country. The implementation of such activities in various fields such as international standards and human rights, freedom of association, employment, vocational training, conditions of employment and the working environment, social security, and workers' education aims to promote development in our country and to increase the likelihood of success in the democratisation process.

I would hate to conclude my statement without welcoming the admission to the ILO of the following Republics: Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, the Republic of Korea, Kyrgyzstan, Azerbaijan and Slovenia. These admissions will reinforce the ranks of nations fighting against poverty throughout the world to further economic and social progress within a democracy.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-SAMAK (Workers' delegate, Bahrain) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like, on behalf of the General Committee of Bahrain Workers, and on my own behalf, to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. The confidence placed in you by the participants of this Conference and your vast experience will undoubtedly lead to the success of our work.

I should like to express our gratitude and appreciation to the Director-General for having selected as the main theme for the Conference, democratisation and the ILO. This choice is indeed in keeping with the developments occurring throughout the world. The Director-General and members of the Governing Body have succeeded in explaining the importance of democratisation and the need to link this process with human resources development.

Since its inception, the ILO has always sought to protect and defend democracy, the respect of basic human rights and social justice by virtue of its tripartite structure. Yet I agree with the Director-General when he insists on the need to consolidate democracy: indeed, we cannot dispense with it if we wish to establish a more prosperous and just society.

In this respect I should like to refer to some of the main objectives mentioned by the Director-General in his Report: promotion of the respect of human rights, particularly in the field of labour; promotion of the market economy, without overlooking its social dimension and human aspect; consolidation of tripartism and the principle of collective bargaining; and improvement of the protection of workers, their working conditions and living standards.

The agenda item on adjustment and human resources development could not be dealt with at a more appropriate time, when the whole world is witnessing rapid changes and developments in production techniques and labour organisation and at a time when the technological gap between developed and developing countries is continuing to widen. This situation is even more crucial given the fact that the developing countries have few material resources and the level of their education is low, while the industrialised countries are making great strides ahead in technological progress.

If the restructuration process is to succeed in developing countries, it is essential to consider the various aspects of resources development, particularly: modernisation of education techniques and their utility in modern training programmes; training of managerial staff, vital to development; and involvement of the three social partners in establishing the necessary development projects.

In this respect, I should like to refer to efforts made by trade union representatives in my country who set out to safeguard the workers' gains in Bahrain and to defend their interest in an atmosphere of democracy – in cooperation with other social partners on the basis of international labour standards.

I should like to commend the confidence placed in us by the other social partners, factors of production and the workers' themselves.

I believe it is essential that the ILO should lend its support to the cultural activities undertaken by the General Committee of Bahrain Workers and involve our supervisory staff in the educational and training programmes they organise in seminars held at the Office or in training centres. This is not only in the interest of workers but also to promote the process of democracy and development in the region – advocated by the ILO.

Finally, I would like to add that the efforts exerted by the ILO to achieve a higher level of democratisation, development and social justice, as well as world peace, will continue to be threatened as long as atrocious aggressions against southern Lebanon continue and as long as Israel persists upon violating the rights of Arab employers and workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Before we adjourn the meeting I would like to call upon the Clerk of the Conference to give us some information.

CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have two communications: the first concerns the Committee on the Application of Standards. Since the Committee is now considering the observations made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (Report III (Part 4A)), the Chairman of the Committee has asked me to request the representatives of the Governments which have not yet registered their names to take part in the discussion concerning their country to do so as soon as possible.

There will be a sitting this afternoon, a second one tomorrow morning, Saturday 13 June, and another one on Monday 15 June.

The countries in question are the following: Albania, Antigua and Barbuda, Bahamas, Barbados, Cambodia, Central African Republic, Dominica, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Jordan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Lebanon, Liberia, Madagascar, Pakistan, Panama, St. Lucia, Senegal, Seychelles, Somalia, Spain, Suriname, Venezuela, Yemen and Zaire.

Secondly, I would like to remind delegates that the closing date for the list of speakers at the special sitting to discuss the report on the occupied territories is this afternoon at 6 p.m. As previously announced, the special sitting will take place on Tuesday 16 June at 3.00 p.m.

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA) – Before starting our work this afternoon, I would ask the Clerk of the Conference to read a letter which I have received from the Government of the Republic of Hungary.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The letter is dated 10 June 1992, and it reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. President,
> I have the honour to inform you that in connection with the "Declaration of the representatives of the people of the Republic of Serbia and the Republic of Montenegro", dated 27 April 1992, I addressed a letter to Mr. Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, dated 14 May 1992, in which I communicated the position of my Government concerning the Declaration. In his reply, the Director-General let me know that the content of the letter was being forwarded to the competent body of the International Labour Conference.
> Reiterating the substance of that communication, I wish to inform you, Mr. President, that the Government of the Republic of Hungary is of the view that the unilateral statement of the Republic of Serbia and the Republic of Montenegro, dated 27 April 1992, does not represent a legal basis for a decision on the continuity of the membership of the defunct Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in international organisations.
>
> In the opinion of the Government of the Republic of Hungary, the settlement of the question of continuity should be based upon the agreement of all successor States of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and only such an agreement can form the basis for any decisions to be taken on the issue of representation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in international forums, including the ILO.
> Accordingly, Hungary believes that any procedural arrangement that the ILO may provisionally follow in this regard should is no way prejudice its position on the question of the status of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia at the ILO.
> I would appreciate if it you, Mr. President, could kindly bring the content of this letter to the knowledge of the Conference.
> Please accept, Mr. President, the assurances of my highest consideration.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA) – We shall continue the discussion on the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. TAN (Employers' delegate, Philippines) – First of all, I extend to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues and the Vice-Presidents my warmest congratulations on their well-deserved election to their positions. I am certain that with their experience and expertise they will guide this session of the Conference to a successful conclusion.

It is with a deep sense of admiration and satisfaction that I shall touch today on the Report of the Director-General, Democratisation and the ILO. Indeed, this document is a classic treatise on liberty and the human person as the enduring foundations of law and the progress of society.

I associate myself with the observation of the Director-General that democracy is the "repository of humanity's hopes for a better life". By its nature, democratisation unleashes the potentials of a people in the governance of a nation. It is the instrument through which they participate in shaping their own future.

In the last few years there has been (in the words of the Report) "a spectacular change in the world's political climate". Specifically, the Report cites the collapse of totalitarian regimes, as a result of their inability to satisfy the people's aspirations, and the awakening of populations rescued from poverty and deprivation who want to speak out and have a say in their country's affairs.

Nothing can be more correct than these conclusions in the light of the events that have occurred in Eastern Europe, Latin America and other parts of the world. To this political upheaval the Philippines has contributed its share in extending the frontiers of freedom. For in 1986, in what many called the "four days that shook the world", the Filipino people threw caution to the winds, overthrew a dictatorship and secured for themselves the blessings of democracy.

But the transition from dictatorship to democracy has not been easy. The legal structures that served as the life support system of the authoritarian regime had to be dismantled little by little, because they were locked into the life of the people. In time, backed by a popular mandate, the Philippine Government promulgated a "Freedom Constitution" and, in 1987, a permanent Constitution was overwhelmingly ratified by the Filipino people as the fundamental law of the land.

It is, therefore, with a sense of recognition and kinship that we subscribe to the points made in the Report. The parallelism is inescapable between the Report and our experience, especially in the challenges that face a nation that has just emerged from a long, dark tunnel into the light.

Shortly after the overthrow of the authoritarian regime, the political emancipation of the citizenry stood out as a priority that stared in the face of the national leadership. And so, in the flush of a great victory that was waged in the historic EDSA, political prisoners were released and human rights occupied a commanding place in the agenda of the nation. But it is a sad footnote to such a noble action that those who enjoyed the guarantees of liberty soon exploited those very same guarantees to undermine freedom itself.

This should not be taken, however, as a disincentive to democratisation. It is simply a historical fact that, while the path to liberation is paved certainly with courage and principles, it must still be won against betrayals from the left and from the right. It remains for the true believers of democracy to keep the faith and to harness its promise to the fullest. In the political field this path must be translated into the enfranchisement of the governed and the exercise of the right to choose the nation's leaders through free, honest and orderly elections, such as those held in the Philippines on 11 May 1992.

Yet, this political exercise is not all there is to democratisation, as the Report suggests, for its most forbidding challenge lies in the socio-economic amelioration of the people. As enshrined in the Philippine Constitution, the equitable distribution of wealth is a primordial concern of the State. For so long, a majority of our people lived below poverty levels. As of 30 April 1991, about 14.4 per cent of our workforce was unemployed, aggravated by 800,000 entrants into the labour force every year.

Against this background are these words of injunction of our fundamental Charter: "The State shall promote a just and dynamic social order that will ensure the prosperity and independence of the nation and free the people from poverty through policies that provide adequate social services, promote full employment, a rising standard of living and improved quality of life for all."

This is a State policy. It is the fruit of democratisation, where the people, as authors of their own liberation, enshrine their own aspirations in their Constitution. As the Report puts it, "democracy is not just for the rich, its values are universal".

Toward this end, a people longing to be free prepare themselves for the widest participation in a consultative government – no longer the recipients of marching orders from central authority. That is why in the Philippines a new Act, the Local Government Code, was passed giving more autonomy to local governments. It is likewise for this reason that to preserve the gains of the democratic struggle in 1986, people power has been elevated into a constitutional virtue. Thus, our Constitution provides that "the right of the people and their organisations to effective and reasonable participation on all levels of social, political and economic decision-making shall not be abridged. The State shall, by law, facilitate the establishment of adequate consultation mechanisms".

This principle is never more honoured than in the relations among Government, workers and employers. But I cannot help but concur with the perception of the Director-General that tripartism is not just a mechanism; it is also a state of mind, meaning that the parties should accept the principle of change. If this is admitted, then agreements on issues that divide workers and employers are not only desirable, but possible.

Just last April, the Employers' Confederation of the Philippines held its XIII National Conference of Employers, with the theme: "Jobs, Justice and Peace: Agenda for the 90's". The conference highlighted the painful reality that, even with democratisation, the country continues to wage the battle for jobs, justice and peace. In this connection, the Government took steps to revitalise the economy by, among others, lifting the import levy, freeing the exchange rate and promulgating the Foreign Investments Incentives Act, all calculated to create more jobs for our people.

Not to be left out, however, are the other two ideals, justice and peace, that make up the trilogy of values of any government worth its name. At present, the branch of peace is being held out to those who have sought to destabilise the State. On the part of workers and employers, we signed a Social Contract for Development Based on Justice and Peace, on 1 May 1992, where we committed ourselves to the economic well-being of workers and agreed to resolve labour disputes peacefully through conciliation, mediation and arbitration. If this covenant holds, the transition of labour-management relations from the political to the economic agenda of the parties could only augur the beginning of a just and honourable industrial peace.

Finally, it is likewise my wish and that of the sector I represent that the ILO continue to spread the gospel of democratisation. It cannot go wrong in enhancing the worth of the human person and his right to a better life. The ILO can only reap the rewards of a true and faithful steward from its grateful constituency who, from a world of acceptance and passivity, will finally emerge unafraid and free.

Original – German: Mr. VERZETNITSCH (Workers' delegate, Austria) – When electing the President and Vice-Presidents, we expressed our full confidence in them. I am sure that under their able presidency our joint work will attain the positive and desired results.

I spoke of confidence, and I am convinced that in the course of the last year, confidence in international organisations – and amongst them in the ILO – has been on the increase.

We must take up the challenge, being aware that in times of upheaval and change, the Organisation is often the only protection and upon which we can rely, the only foundation upon which we can build.

The Director-General has devoted his Report this year to the theme, democratisation and the ILO, and paid particular attention to countries undergoing reform; I think this was a very apposite choice.

I am from Austria, a country which over four decades had to live, right next to – even within sight of – the Iron Curtain. On two occasions this natural frontier has been overrun by massive waves of refugees. In 1956, Hungarians in their hundreds of thousands came on foot to Austria, or swam through icy rivers in late autumn, before the Hungarian revolution was quenched by much bloodletting; and tens of thousands of refugees came from Czechoslovakia before the so-called "Spring of Prague" was terminated by Soviet tanks.

Austria has a long and common history with its Eastern European neighbours; it also has a common tradition and many family and personal relationships. When borders were opened once again, this was greeted with much enthusiasm and new contacts were rapidly established.

All of us here in this hall were overjoyed when the Berlin Wall was dismantled. But we know equally well that this euphoria has dwindled in the meantime. This was due to many reasons – both in the East and the West, because Communism left a weighty heritage: ruined economies, food scarcity, vast environmental damage – and people who gradually had to get used to how to live in freedom.

The discrepancy between hopes and reality soon emerged: and discrepancies trigger unrest. People may wish to turn the clock back and live in the past; or they can leave their country to seek happiness in the so-called "Golden West" – a golden West which often turns out not to be as glamorous as it appears on television.

And unrest and impatience – and I should like especially to point this out – can also give rise to the formation of radical groupings. This danger exists and we have to face up to it.

This lead me to a second conclusion, which is particularly topical in the light of the civil war in Yugoslavia. Bloody confrontations between ethnic groups – also between religious groups – occur whenever there is poverty. Everywhere people look for scapegoats to make them responsible for the tragic situation; and war is waged against them.

I believe that there is only one way to avoid these conflicts; they must be dealt with at source.

Europe has a role to play here which I shall sum up as follows. Eastern Europe needs assistance for self-help. This is not only a task for politicians but more than ever a task for international trade unions.

It is also a task for the ILO, which should support the process of democratisation in countries undergoing transition with the political means at its disposal. For the ILO, in its Preamble, spells out a way to help the process of democratisation, when it states that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice.

Assistance based on this principle should have the following components when extended to the new countries undergoing transition: action against anyone trying to trample minimum standards pertaining to labour and social law underfoot (many government representatives feel that trade unions are a stumbling-block and many employers want to profit from the weak economic situation in Eastern European countries to be able to invest); action against entrepreneurs hiring clandestine labour, who exploit them and ruin competition; action to create relations between employers and workers based on mutual respect so that we might build a social Europe where social rights are guaranteed within its geographical borders.

We, as Austrian trade unionists, wish to bring about an orderly labour market. And by this, we mean that workers able to find a job should be given correct housing and not have to sleep on the streets and that their children should be able to go to school and not have to work for a pittance.

But this is only one side of the coin. We must help the Eastern countries make their own countries worth living in once again. This naturally requires money; but it is also an ethical issue.

At this point, I should like to make two comments which lead us away from Europe but which I believe are of paramount importance. I mentioned earlier in my statement that wars and civil wars break out when there is very great social tension. This applies throughout the world, whether in Yugoslavia, Sudan or Mozambique. And everywhere we must apply the same solution. We must remove the origins of these social crises as wars and civil wars are barbarous and innocent persons are always the first to pay the price.

We must therefore provide assistance; and this brings me to my second comment. It would be a disastrous mistake if, because of the economic problems in Europe, we reduced our aid to the Third World. This would be tantamount to putting a lid on a kettle of boiling water; there would inevitably be an explosion. I therefore maintain that humanity and solidarity are indivisible and must remain indivisible.

In concluding, I would like to say that Europe is undergoing profound changes; it has a flourishing inland market in the West and a hesitant democracy in the East, assailed on all sides. In spite of all the dangers, we see this as an opportunity and a challenge; we need to take up this challenge together with courage.

Mr. MOTSA (Minister for Labour and Public Service, Swaziland) – It is for me a great honour and indeed a privilege to be accorded this opportunity of addressing this august assembly, on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegates from the Kingdom of Swaziland.

I bring to the President, the Director-General and the distinguised delegates of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, greetings and good wishes from my Head of State, His Majesty King Mswati III, and the people of Swaziland.

May I take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of this session. I have no doubt that under his wise leadership, guidance and judgement, this august assembly will be assured of fruitful and constructive deliberations.

Not long ago His Majesty celebrated his 24th birthday. The King is devoted to the principles and philosophies laid down by his late father. He is committed to piloting his people under conditions of social, political and economic stability, while continuing to maintain and strengthen the cultural and traditional institutions that make the Swazi people a peaceful and homogeneous society.

Swaziland, like many other developing countries, has a mixed economy. Some of the major industries include, asbestos mines, coal mines, and diamonds. On the other hand, the manufacturing industries have a mixed bag of agriculture – based enterprises, that is sugar production from sugar cane, cotton production and ginning, the processing of wood pulp and a variety of others. It is basically from these mining and agricultural industries that Swaziland earns her foreign exchange.

The Government of the Kingdom of Swaziland has studied with great interest the Report of the Director-General on the activities and performance of the International Labour Organisation during the year 1991-92 and the all-pervasive subject of employment and development. Swaziland attaches considerable importance to the need for global recovery, the challenge of employment creation and the participation of the social partners in all the strategies and decision-making processes.

Permit me at this juncture in my address to state that Swaziland enjoys a comparatively good industrial relations system, based on respect of the principles of natural justice. Our labour laws provide adequate and comprehensive machinery and procedures for redress to the Industrial Court in the event of an industrial dispute.

As I said earlier, Swaziland is growing very fast industrially. We have more than 1,500 registered enterprises, ranging from small enterprises to enterprises employing up to 2,000 workers.

Apart from the agricultural sector, there are four other main industries in Swaziland: the mining industry: this includes the Bulembu asbestos mine, the Emaswati colliery and the Dvokolwako diamond mines and quarries. The processing industry: this is fairly advanced – the food canning and beverage industry and the textile manufacturing industry are at the international level. The construction and transport industry: this employs a substantial percentage of our population. The paper and pulp processing industry: this is quite advanced in Swaziland, and has huge man-made forests at its disposal.

It is clear that with all these industries we deal with a wide range of chemical substances. The disposal of chemical waste products predisposes our working population to many potential occupational health and safety hazards, not forgetting possible environmental pollution through water, soil and air.

We have mentioned the problem of chemicals in our industries. Swaziland, like many other developing nations, depends substantially on agriculture through subsistence and commercial farming. About 80 per cent of the population lives in the rural areas and their main occupation is farming. Farm implements, machinery and chemicals are widely used. In commercial farming, which is highly mechanised and sometimes automated, we have the following: the sugar-cane industry, the forestry industry, citrus fruit estates and cotton farms in the lowlands.

Considering the range of machinery, farm equipment and chemicals like fertilisers, pesticides, herbicides, insecticides and fungicides, used in this industry, it is clear that a big portion of our population is exposed to occupational health and safety hazards.

Each year more than 1,000 workers are injured and maimed to varying degrees as a result of work-related accidents or diseases. Up to 44 workers per year die as a result of occupational accidents and diseases. Occupational diseases such as noise-induced deafness, pneumoconiosis due to organic and inorganic dusts, skin diseases due to chemicals and oils have been identified in our country.

Our legislation was not amended in time to cope with the rapid growth of industrialisation. The enforcement of prevailing legislation is also not quite adequate. We have recently embarked on a project to strengthen the Factories Inspectorate with the assistance of the ILO. All companies and workplaces in Swaziland are now being re-registered. Our inspectors visit and inspect all our factories at least once a year. The boilers, pressure vessels and lifts are inspected as stipulated by law, to avoid potential dangers, and all this work done by the Factories Inspectorate is simplified by the use of computers. Many employers are relatively unaware of occupational health and safety problems. It is the duty of our inspectors during their inspection visits to preach to the employers the concepts of health and safety and we even show videos to the management teams concerning safe and healthy work practices.

We in Swaziland are very grateful to the ILO for the assistance it has given us in strengthening our Factories Inspectorate Division.

In conclusion, allow me once again to congratulate the Director-General for preparing and submitting to our governments in good time his comprehensive and thought-provoking Report that will inspire this august assembly in its search for practical and lasting solutions to the diverse social and economic problems confronting mankind. We live and thrive in a world of change and interdependence where all nations, be they large or small, need one another. It is therefore my delegation's wish and hope that this body, in its pursuit of the fundamental principles of human dignity, freedom of association and social justice, will continue to contribute to the creation of a better world for all.

Original – Russian: Mr. ANDONOV (Employers' delegate Bulgaria) – On behalf of the Bulgarian employers' organisations and myself, I would like to congratulate the President on his election and to say how honoured we are that the Bulgarian Industrial Association has been chosen to represent the employers of our country at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

In July 1991, speaking before ECOSOC, the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund said that a stable economic system could not exist without structures providing for joint dialogue and participation in decision-making processes, which show that decisions are being taken in the national interest, and not simply to preserve the position of an oligarchy. It is no accident that the Director-General referred to this in his Report to this session, as this is the most concise definition of tripartism available.

Unlike States with many years experience in this area, the countries of Central and Eastern Europe which have decided, once and for all, to break with totalitarianism and authoritarian government, and centrally planned economies, in favor of a market economy, the social partners have only just begun to emerge and have little experience in tripartite negotiations. Many employers' and workers' organisations have yet not fully grasped their role and, it seems to us, even the State itself has had difficulty in delegating to such sectors the powers traditionally theirs in a free society.

For the first time ever, tripartism has emerged in Bulgaria with the creation of the National Coordination Commission by virtue of a general agreement between Government, the Confederation of independent trade unions and the National Association of Employers, followed by an agreement establishing a Tripartite Commission. This Commission was conceived as and acts as a body encouraging consultation at the national level.

The discussions of the Commission have shown that social partnership between the Government, employers and trade unions is essential and has provided a useful way of settling social problems. It is also invaluable at a time of economic reform, and when striving for social peace throuhout the country.

A number of errors have come to the fore. I would like to mention three such errors: the enormity of the State sector and the slow pace of privatisation which has led to a situation whereby employers have been unable to make a clean break from the State; secondly trade unions have, on occasions, assumed functions traditionally theirs; and thirdly the new Government has been unable to work as and when necessary with its partners and opponents.

I believe that despite all these problems, all the partners in Bulgaria are profoundly convinced of the need for tripartism. This explains the rather abrupt lifting of the "freeze", or delay, imposed on tripartite consultations at the national level concerning the concept of a social partnership. This concept includes the creation of a national council, bringing together representatives of the Government, trade unions and employers. Nonetheless, I am at a loss to explain why this concept has been so slow to take hold. In the end, however, it was adopted.

We believe that in order to form a national concept of social partnership, the following is necessary:

1. We must accurately and unequivocally define the three partners in a manner capable of ensuring that they are able to fulfil their responsibilities, while guaranteeing balance among the parties, as follows: The Government, and especially the Ministries of Labour and Finance, should act as regulators, modulators and arbitrators and should reconcile the positions of the other two parties when necessary. The trade unions and employers should participate through constant and legitimate representation in the central administration, so that they have the opportunity to make use of information and other resources they need to fulfil their responsibilities in the new circumstances.

2. The specialised social partnership bodies (commissions) should differentiate the various problems in five areas – profits, prices, wages and social insurance; employment and qualifications; social and labour legislation; privatisation and structural policy, investment and job creation; and credit and fiscal policy. We believe that the Committee and the specialised commissions should work at three levels – national level, the branch and regional level and the enterprise level.

3. The decisions of the Council and of the Commission should be taken by consensus and be carried out in accordance with the legislation in effect.

Obviously, we in Bulgaria need time to learn how social partnership functions. Our lack of experience and tradition in this field and the complexity and polarisation of our times make it especially useful and imperative to exchange experience and know-how with countries that have a long-standing democratic tradition.

In concluding, I should like to express my deep gratitude to the ILO for the excellent organisation of this Conference and to the Government of the Netherlands for their financial assistance, and I would like personally to thank Mr. Gladstone for his participation in the project to create a new system of labour relations in Bulgaria. The participation of Bulgarian employers in this project helped them become acquainted with and make use of the experience of the developed industrial countries of Europe.

We are confident that we will work together in the future, for the betterment of all the peoples of the world.

Original – French: Mr. LETTIERI (Workers' delegate, Italy) – I should like to stress, on behalf of the three Italian trade union confederations – the CGIL, CISL and UIL – that the subject of this session of the Conference has been very well chosen.

Democratisation of political and social regimes has been and remains a fundamental objective of the ILO and, of trade union organisations as well. Political democratisation today is the main characteristic of our epoch. The end of military regimes throughout Latin America and Africa, the defeat of the forces of apartheit in South Africa, and the collapse of Communist totalitarianism in Central and Eastern Europe are the victorious signs of the advancement of democracy and political freedom. It is in this perspective that we must concern ourselves now with ensuring the success of the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations and hence the right of the Palestinian people to live in a free and independent State in a framework of security for all countries of the region, beginning with Israel.

And yet, this point in history is uncertain, ambiguous, full of unknowns and dangers. The ambiguity resides not only in the process of economic transition but also in the models on which this transition is based.

The official theory is that of a move towards market economies, but tend to forget that there are different types of market economies and different approaches.

I find it unacceptable that this transition should be virtually imposed by the rich and developed countries without taking account of the social costs, the sacrifices of workers and the weakest sectors of our population. The macroeconomic adjustment and the consequent shock therapies imposed by the IMF as a condition for international assistance on the Eastern countries and on Third World countries, would not be accepted, owing to their consequences, by any industrialised country. The consequences of these monetary and budgetary policies have nearly everywhere lowered production and brought about massive unemployment and impoverishment of the populations. The unfreezing of prices, at a time when the old monopolies still prevail, and recession and generalised poverty are the norm, has led to an unsustainable increase in prices, the collapse of purchasing power, the marginalisation of unemployed young people, women and retired persons. Even the sudden privatisation that is being attempted, at the cost of a generally obsolete but still existing industrial structure, in my view reveals and ideological and abstract concept of the transition to a market economy.

In the analyses of the ILO I find a source of serious preoccupation with the risks that all of this implies for the transition to genuine democracy. I believe that we must openly and forcefully denounce the threat that this represents for democracy. There is no one who can ignore the damage that has already been done as a result of this policy. Considerable frustration has followed the euphoria that initially resulted from overturning the former totalitarian regimes. This frustration more and more has resulted in political apathy, social fragmentation of the search for new ethnic and nationalist collective identities, often to the detriment of civil rights and individual freedoms. "Yugoslavisation" threatens to be not an extreme expression of the process of disintegration and contraposition, but rather the paradigm of a desperate and often illusory search for these new identities.

We need to discuss openly the responsibilities which involve us all, which involve all the representatives of the industrialised world who also benefit from a more long-standing democratic experience. We need to oppose the economic models and ideologies which threaten to lead certain countries towards a new Fascism.

I fully agree with the need to integrate the social dimension into the process of adjustment and the international integration of economic systems. For it is precisely here that we find the immense gap that needs to be filled. Even in the European Community, we have seen a country with a long-standing democratic tradition – the United Kingdom – fail to sign the agreement on social policy.

With this dominant neo-liberalism, the temptation is to replace the suffocating and ineffective rules of a centralised economy with unbridled capitalism. The return to an ideology of economic laissez-faire is reflected in a Darwinist social model, which would mean the end of solidarity, the protection of rights and the concept of social needs.

In this context, in which even the strongest of the trade unions run the risk of being weakened, trade unions which seek to grow in the transition regimes of Eastern Europe and the southern parts of the world, find immense difficulties in reaffirming their representative nature and their role as an effective counterweight.

We need to aid the trade unions of countries in transition to find a way out of this impasse. They have the right to be active participants in transformation through tripartism. This is necessary in order to ensure the success of the process of transition. But tripartism is not enough when the objective of governments is merely to seek consensus for policies that fail to make account of social needs.

A major effort of international solidarity is therefore required in order to promote the development in new democracies of free, autonomous and representative trade unionism, in the conviction that democracy can be consolidated and developed only where there is a strong and independent trade union movement.

The ILO has a major role to play in this process.

In conclusion I will simply mention three points.

First, the ILO should strengthen and extend its work of monitoring and supporting basic trade union rights – freedom of association; the right to collective bargaining; and the right to strike. Where these fundamental rights are lacking or systematically violated, we must debate the right of countries or enterprises that fail to respect the fundamental rights of workers.

Secondly, the ILO should systematically prepare a report on the trade union and social situation of the various regions of the world, which takes into account the process of building democracy, and attempts to clarify the context and the conditions of law and fact in which trade unions can or cannot develop their initiatives.

Thirdly, a major effort should be made by the ILO to strengthen and extend trade union training, and not just vocational training, together with the international, regional and national trade unions providing assistance and cooperation. The ILO can and should play a major role in this new stage of history.

In conclusion, individual and collective social rights go hand-in-hand with the principles of freedom and equality on which genuine democracy is based. All of us must be committed in order to bring about the success of these principles and to give about the success of these principles and to give a specific meaning to democracy and to the hopes that men and women throughout the world attach to democracy.

Mr. SALIMIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – I would like to join the earlier speakers and extend our warm and sincere congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and all his staff on the work which they have accomplished over the last year.

I welcome the new Members of the ILO who have joined since the 78th Session of the Conference.

Proud to represent the workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I wish to express my views, as well as the views of my colleagues and the workers' organisations of my country, concerning the Report of the Director-General to the 79th Session. I hope that this session of the Conference will be able to set objectives and concrete guidelines in steering the difficult problems which are being discussed towards an acceptable solution.

The theme of the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO, a vast subject and it would not be possible to cover each of its areas within this limited period of time. So I would restrict myself to only a few of them which are of particular interest to us.

One of the important and misleading aspects of the economic and social context is the existence of a phenomenon called verbal identity, in the sense that different basic peculiarities and conditions are expressed by a single word. For example, regarding the term democracy or democratisation, which is the subject-matter of the Director-General's Report, the question arises in the mind of any neutral critic as to what the word democracy and what the word democratisation mean. Because if the meaning of democracy is that mentioned in the Director-General's Report, and I quote: "Democracy... though initially a political concept,... has always been, and still is, the instrument of freedom", then the term democracy can be used in one place with one meaning and in another place with a totally different meaning. In such a case, is it possible that the satanic politicians of this era have a double standard for democracy, one at home and the other abroad?

Do you think that the arrogant of this world can, through democracy, succeed in quenching their own thirst by plundering the wealth and resources of the deprived nations of the world? Or that the advocates of democratisation can go to such an extent of military aggression against a democratic government, elected through democratic institutions by an absolute majority, and install a puppet government just to safeguard their own vested interest? In the light of these empirical contradictions, can it be expected that this term, democracy, is understood in all places to have the same meaning?

Although the subject of democracy is being discussed in the current session of the Conference, unfortunately some bitter and acrimonious facts like the veto rights of the so-called Superpowers are being ignored. At the least, the workers' organisations should raise their voices against this anti-democratic aspect which permits a country to tyrannise others and impose its own will because of its military strength and economic power.

The discovery of democratic values is, no doubt, not a recent phenomenon. Democracy is not just a theory it is the respect of fundamental human rights. The international labour Conventions that deal with fundamental human rights focus on freedom of association, the right to organise, the right to strike, collective bargaining, the abolition of forced and child labour, and equality of opportunity and treatment in employment. The main objective of such standards is to create an environment favouring development. I share the views of Mr. Hansenne, that "the technical cooperation project would be used to lay the foundation for the application of standards...".

We believe that fine theories, principles, and the ratification of international Conventions are not sufficient. There must also be application in practice by bringing Labour Codes into conformity with Conventions.

I spoke earlier about misleading aspects of economic and social contexts. I would like to mention here another aspect. The GNP of an advanced economy can measure improvements in its condition. However, in a dependent economy, the GNP not only measures improvements in its conditions but, due to the reproductive nature of dependence, which in fact replaces the earlier dependencies with the new ones, also measures the advance toward non-development.

One of the main points which can be raised in the present session is that, under the terminology of structural adjustement, the problems of economically advanced and backward countries, which are fundamentally different in nature, have been mentioned collectively there by confusing the issue.

The projection of the problem of structural adjustment in developed countries is basically human in nature, especially as regards the workforce of these countries.

But the same phenomenon, used in the developing countries, is imposed and is anti-human in nature.

This structural adjustment is firstly an imposed one because it is accompanied by different types of pressures and conditions of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Secondly, it is anti-human in nature because it becomes the basics for the extension of poverty, the deepening of economic dependence, the expansion of unproductive jobs, and a reduction in opportunities to attain minimum health, education housing and income levels.

The important mission of the ILO is, firstly, to divulge this problem by acquainting the Third World countries with the substantial difference of structural adjustement between the two groups, i.e. the developed and the backward countries. Secondly, the situations prevailing before and after the implementation of the structural adjustement programme imposed by the IMF and the World Bank, with due emphasis on its theory and empirical evidence, must be clearly spelled out so that governments become aware of its serious consequences, and so that workers' and employers' organisations will not swallow its false slogans, which say that the pressure of these programmes is felt only in the short term. According to John Maynard Keynes, in the long run, we will all be dead and there will be no one alive to test these promises.

Another basic point which is of great importance is the presentation of the problem of equality in educational training opportunities for different groups of society. We know that the logic of economic liberalisation is the logic of one dollar one vote, and has nothing to do with equality. It is for this reason that governments must be warned so that they are not fooled by empty and crisis-brandishing slogans. With their timely and conscious intervention and the participation of the social partners (workers' and employers' organisations), they can create opportunities for equal utilisation of social facilities by the poor.

Turning to Part II of the Director-General's Report on the activities of the ILO in the last fiscal year, I would like to draw the attention of the competent authorities to the fact that in the allocation of new ILO technical cooperation and training facilities, the Islamic Republic of Iran, and especially the Workers' House, has been deprived of its legitimate right of access to these projects and training facilities. Since the Islamic revolution in Iran, we have not received any noticeable assistance, except for a few scholarships relating to getting acquainted with the ILO and its functions.

The facts and figures also support our deliberations. Table B on expenditure on technical cooperation programmes in 1990-91, by geographical region, shows that 25.5 per cent of it is allocated to Asia and the Pacific region. The share of the Islamic Republic of Iran from this total expenditure of $43.4 million is only $125,000, or just 0.3 per cent. If we look at the contributions made by the countries in an region, our share is 2.1 million Swiss francs, or in other words 27 per cent of the local regional contribution. As we have stated on a number of occasions, there are sufficient opportunities in our country to absorb the ILO's technical cooperation and training facilities. Now, we once again request this esteemed body to give more attention to the workers' training needs in our country.

Anyhow, we are grateful to the ILO for arranging the first seminar in Teheran since the last decade. We hope that this will be a turning point and will open a new chapter in the bilateral cooperation between the ILO and the Workers' House. We are sure that such seminars will be held in the future, too. We are ready to hold such regional and international seminars with the cooperation of the ILO and its Workers' Education Department.

In conclusion, on the eve of the third anniversary of the death of Imam Khomeini, I have a message from our Iranian workers to the distinguished delegates present here today. There are no prospects for the accommodation of western mentality in our Islamic system. The Muslim people and workers of Iran have demonstrated their loyalty to the cause of the Islamic revolution and are determined to clear any hurdle without any compromise on policies, and to continue on Imam Khomeini's path. Furthermore, we are all the more determined and steadfast in following his path because we believe that it is the path of salvation and the only one to take to ensure the rights of the oppressed.

Original – French: Mr. MANANJARA (Minister of Labour, Madagascar) – The Malagasy delegation, which I have the honour of leading, would first all like to congratulate sincerely the President on his brilliant election to the Chair of this session. Our congratulations also go out to the other Officers who will assist them in carrying out his difficult but also lofty mission.

At the risk of wounding the President's sense of modesty, I would like to say how pleased we are to see him hold this office which he deserved in more ways than one.

As an outstanding university teacher and statesman who is fully conversant with the economic and social problems besetting today's world, he will, we are sure, be able to lead this session of the Conference to a successful conclusion.

I would also like to pay tribute to our Director-General and his staff for the excellent Report before us. This excellent working document is highly topical and an act of faith in democracy as the basis of all human development. Throughout his Report, the Director-General does not merely highlight the virtues of democracy, but also calls upon us to adopt a critical and constructive approach to the many aspects of this same democracy.

Since 1989, a landmark which will stand out in the annals of mankind, with the dismantling of the Berlin wall and the profound changes in the East, many other events, have occurred which have changed the face of the world.

We should be grateful to those who crafted these major changes. I would like to refer to the major political leaders and international and intercontinental organisations and their tireless struggle to ensure that democracy, this time a real democracy, can finally see the light of day. They have shown that there can no longer be any temptation to associate democracy with the greed for power, to confuse democracy with demagogy or any of the many perverted sophisms which are dangerous to mankind.

To this end, the ILO can lay claim to the title of pioneer of democratisation because of its tripartite structure which makes it so different from other international organisations. The forward-looking, almost prophetic vision of the founders of our Organisation made it possible for the three groups to engage in an ongoing learning process of institutionalised concertation within a well-defined framework.

More than 70 years after the creation of the ILO, history has finally recognised the place of concertation and consensus in the quest for and the definition of a common policiy, through the institution of administrative and supervisory machinery which inspires confidence to all. The example of the ILO is an example of patience and abnegation for all those who claim to be disciples of democracy.

The winds of change are now blowing throughout the world, especially in developing countries, hoisting the flag of democracy as a symbol of hope, of development and liberty. It is a challenge which can be taken up only if we all believe in equity, legitimacy and the unavoidable nature of the sacrifices and the efforts required. The temporary solidarity linking generations, ours with that of our children, makes it necessary for the international community to support this democracy by the establishment of all kinds of assistance, through multilateral and bilateral lenders, the rescheduling of debt or the reduction of private or public debts. This requires greater flexibility in financial arrangements for the countries which have embarked on structural change, but which are experencing serious difficulties due to external factors.

Madagascar, although its insular character should have spared it of upheavals, has not escaped the determinism of history. Our presence with a tripartite delegation at this session of the Conference, which would have been unthinkable yesterday, is a striking example of this.

Transitional institutions, established by national consensus and the main tasks of which is to prepare the advent of the Third Republic, are now managing the destiny of the country. These transitional structures hold in themselves the seeds of a true democracy when you consider the advent of an actual multiparty system, a pluralistic trade union structure, freedom of the press, tripartism, the holding of a national forum to discuss the transformation of political institutions, social and economic restructuring and the liberalisation of the market. These are a few examples of the changes which bode well for the future of democracy.

The negative impacts of various reforms underway and the harshness of structural adjustment measures give rise to economic, financial and social difficulties which lead to unemployment, inflation and poverty, etc. The severe situation caused by the drought in southern Madagascar is a striking example.

The transitional character of bodies which are directing the country, is causing some reticence on the part of international lenders, and this situation is only compounding the difficult situation and hence the future of democratic process. But we are convinced that – the international organisations and financial institutions which attach importance to democratic values will also help us in the future, as in the past, with their precious cooperation.

May I be allowed by way of conclusion to refer to two important sentence from the Report of the Director-General there can be no true democracy without effective development; there will be no viable democracy without social justice. I would like to add that there can be no social justice without development. Many countries, where democracy is still embryonic are confronted with major social and economic problems which result in poverty and pauperisation. And so let us make a passionate appeal for awareness by the international community so that the foundations of a genuine democracy can be established through the search of appropriate solutions to certain crucial problems. In the countries of the South, we must use the enthusiasm and motivations arising from the advent of democracy in the interests of development. In the countries of the North, more particularly the rich countries, we would like to recall that no development is conceivable as long as the international debt, resulting above all from the collapse of commodity prices, continues to weigh on our economies.

Finally, we would like to renew our confidence in the ILO to ensure that development goes hand in hand with social justice. This is the message which our delegation would like to convey to the cause of development.

Mr. GRAY (Workers' delegate, United States) – There is no more important theme for the International Labour Conference than the ILO's role in democratisation. As the Director-General writes in his Report, democracy truly is a precondition for social justice.

I would go beyond that and add that the ILO's central mission – the defence and the promotion of freedom of association – is a precondition for democracy. For without the guarantee of such freedom, without free institutions to represent the interests of workers and other sectors of society, the people find themselves at the mercy of the State's potential for brute power and of the employer's potential for brute exploitation.

In this regard, the ILO is the indispensable international body for the defence and promotion of freedom of association, workers' rights and fair labour standards – and thus of democracy.

In the last few years we have witnessed eloquent testimony to the importance of the freedom of association in the achievement of democratic rights. From Solidarity in Poland, to the Workers' Autonomous Federation in China, to the independent Black trade unions in South Africa, workers rose up and organised themselves to demand their rights, and demanded democratic freedom to exercise those rights. And the world has been transformed.

In this struggle, the ILO's position has been clear: a single standard applies to all countries, no matter its political or economic systems. The standards of freedom of association and other workers' rights were applied, in historic fashion, equally to Poland under communism and in South Africa under apartheid. In part owing to the ILO's consistent course in the 1980s, political and economic walls and barriers came down.

And that is the point of the ILO's single standard: for the advance of freedom of association means the advance of democracy, which means greater participation of ordinary people in determining their own lives. When established democratic countries impinge on the rights of freedom of association, the ILO rightly steps in, for we know they are impinging on democracy.

Yet, even with the democratic advances of the last few years, there is still much to be done. Workers' rights and fair labour standards are in no way safe from their attackers, nor is democracy itself.

Political dictators still abound. They remain the enemies of free workers' institutions and seek either their suppression or subordination. In the wake of democratic revolutions that have broken down the walls of opposition and oppression from Berlin to Vladivostok, from Addis Ababa to Kinshasa, and even to Johannesburg, the world's remaining dictators have responded in the only way they know: by tightening their grip on power, and workers have borne the brunt of intensified repression.

There is another disheartening and complementary undemocratic trend at work in the world; that is, the effort under way to promote the unfettered free market – unfettered even by free trade unions – as the indispensable lever of both democracy and prosperity. This trend threatens workers' rights and fair labour standards not only in the newly democratising countries but also in the developed democratic world.

Today the free market is a mantra; freedom of association is just irrelevant noise for the true believers. Trade unions, it is claimed, are a drag on the industrial and post-industrial economies and an impediment to growth in the developing and post-communist economies which require structural adjustment programmes instead.

The globalisation of the marketplace – and wholesale cheap-labour shopping by multinational companies intent on exploiting export-hungry developing countries – has placed hundreds of millions of workers at the mercy of unscrupulous employers and uncaring governments. Newly democratising and developing countries are being sold a bill of laissez-faire goods that romanticise the free market's virtues while minimising its faults. As a result, these countries are willing to establish economic free trade zones and legal conditions that bring back the days of swashbuckling robber barons. In the end, this means establishing the conditions where free trade unions are not free to function and where workers are exploited.

This threat to freedom of association is a threat to democracy, and not just in newly democratising countries. The effects of the global marketplace strike at workers' rights and labour standards in the industrialised world, where democratic government and democratic institutions have had long traditions.

The return of this laissez-faire doctrine is today being justified by the utter failure of communism's central planning and its totalitarian control over the economy. But communism's economic failure cannot justify a return to the exploitation of the early days of the Industrial Revolution. It cannot justify the brutal exploitation of women and children in sweatshops. The backward state of the economies in Central and Eastern Europe simply cannot justify the violation of human and workers' rights elsewhere whether it be in Malaysia, in Indonesia, in Thailand or anywhere else in the world.

The ILO was created expressly to combat the pernicious idea that either democracy or prosperity required the exploitation of labour and the denial of rights to workers. The ILO was created with the idea that workers and employers, through their chosen representatives, could work together with government to establish minimum standards that protected workers from extreme exploitation in the marketplace. Indeed, the ILO was created to help put an end to the degradation of workers under the "hidden hand" of the market. It has worked well towards that end, to the benefit of untold millions. Let us not now allow the proponents of this hidden hand to hide behind the failures of communism.

World events and economic facts have shown that greater prosperity comes when freedom of association is guaranteed and workers gain full exercise of their democratic rights. More importantly, they have shown that workers' rights need not be trampled for there to be economic growth. Today poverty is most profound in places where democracy and its free institutions are most absent, or in countries where such institutions are just emerging. In short, the deprivation of human and workers' rights brings about economic injustice.

In the face of attacks on workers' rights in the name of the free market, we must all, labour, business and government, recommit the ILO to the urgent purpose of promoting workers' rights and fair labour standards. We must do this in order to foster democracy, prosperity and social justice.

The ILO, in its activities, programmes and deliberations must redouble its efforts to make the respect for the most crucial workers' rights, as embodied in the international labour Conventions on freedom of association, on the right to organise and collective bargaining and on forced labour, the basic yardstick for its consideration of technical assistance programmes. The ILO should not allow these programmes to be conducted in countries where fundamental workers' rights are violated and where legitimate workers' organisations are shunted to the sidelines and their representatives shoved into prison.

The ILO must redouble its efforts to rid the world market place of the most pernicious violations of labour standards concerning child labour, workers' safety, health and minimum conditions of employment.

Finally, the ILO must redouble its commitment to the principle on which it is based, the tripartite cooperation between workers' representatives, employers' representatives and governments to establish and enforce basic workers' rights. For on these efforts to a great degree the movement for democratisation rests.

Original – Arabic: Mr. GHARIB (Workers' delegate, Iraq) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like to take this opportunity of the feast of El-Adha to extend to you, in the name of the Muslim world, our prayers to the Almighty to bring peace and well-being to all mankind.

I have the pleasure of bringing to you the greetings of the workers of Iraq for the success of this session of the Conference. Their eyes are turned towards all the forces of good in the world to support them in their misfortune, at a time when they are confronted with an iniquitous blockade which has caused the death of hundreds of thousands of their children.

I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President for the confidence and esteem which the Conference has shown him in electing him to guide the work of this session towards success.

The workers of Iraq have entrusted me with the responsibility of telling you about the tragic situation being experienced by their children and their sick, and of the terrible catastrophes which are threatening the lives of millions of citizens in this noble country whose land saw the emergence of the earliest human civilisations and which has contributed throughout its long history to the enrichening and development of these civilisations. This was the country which promulgated the earliest legislation known in history, which established human rights, proclaimed the justice and equality between men and gave workers essential rights. Iraq, which the international community has known as an apostle of justice and equality between peoples has been and still is the victim of the most atrocious catastrophes resulting from the military aggression and economic blockade which have no equals in the annals of hatred and barbarianism. All this has been confirmed by many international missions, and in particular by the report of the representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the mission report of the University of Harvard, the UNICEF report as well as many other documents.

The UNICEF report states that 340,000 Iraqi children are threatened with death, that a million children suffer from malnutrition and that 400 children die every day. At the same time, the reports have confirmed that the water purification plants and electricity generating stations have been destroyed, interrupting the distribution of drinking water and causing sewage water to flood of streets and homes.

We should like to confirm to you that our hospitals have become the scenario of the worst tragedies which mankind has ever known. Surgical operations are carried out without any anaesthetic, medicines are not to be found anywhere, food is scarce, more and more people are dying every day, diseases previously unknown in Iraq are spreading radidy, hundreds of children receive injections with the same syringe in a primitive manner which Iraq had abandoned decades ago. Furthermore, more than 80 per cent of our workers are unemployed following the destruction of factories, the shortage of raw materials and spare parts and the impossibility of our employers to operate their plants. Unemployment has risen, non-organised forms of employment have spread, the price of foodstuffs has rocketed and yet the entire world simply looks on at these human tragedies. A policy of humiliation is being practised against the people of Iraq, who reject this policy as well as the policy of subjection which is an attempt to destroy the national sovereignty of our country for which it has paid a very high price. We are convinced that all this is not the fault of international law as such, but the fault of the mentality of hegemony and abuse which is used to pursue despicable interests compounded by hate to create a spectacle of odious destruction and barbarianism in Iraq. It is unjustifiable and unreasonable that the process of genocide against Iraqis should be pursued when none of the reasons which were used as a pretext to impose this destructive policy of starvation against Iraq no longer exists.

Yes, this is what is happening in Iraq and what is being prepared for the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya which after the air blockade will see itself the victim of resolutions which have already been prepared and are ready for adoption and which will be followed by other resolutions which will affect the Arab countries and States in the region.

As regards the violation of human rights in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories, the confiscation of land, the rape of women, the oppression of trade unions, the arrest of trade union officials, the taking away from Palestinians of their right to work, the racial discrimination practised against them... all this occurs within the framework of international law which applies two different yardsticks.

The Director-General was wise to choose Democratisation and the ILO as the subject of his Report, in which he objectively outlines the path towards a future based on the close relationship between democracy and social justice. Although we present to him our most sincere congratulations for the ideas which he sets forth, we hope that practical measures will be taken to implement these ideas through support for trade union organisations which have a genuine interest in seeing the establishment of democracy on the principles of social justice. Allow me to say in all sincerity that the slogans of democracy, international legality and human rights are no longer meaningful to the Arab workers who are living a tragedy every day of their lives and who see international legality used as a cover for aggression and injustice, as is the case in Iraq, in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories as well as in the southern Lebanon.

The Arab workers would like to warn the workers of the South of the planet against the use of democracy for the purposes of imposing the will of global monopolies and multinational enterprises in their attempts to steal the wealth of people and deepen the gap between a world which is rich and a world which is assassinated by ignorance, poverty and disease. One of the tragi-comic paradox of our epoch is that the countries which benefit from the goodwill of the United States administration are those which prohibit trade union and political activity and in which democratic institutions do not exist, even in their most elementary forms, while crocodile tears are shed over human rights in Iraq, which was the first Arab country to joint the ILO and contribute to its development. Iraq has an exceptional tradition in the sphere of labour legislation and democratic practice. Although we have not yet acheived our ambitions, in comparison with the friends and allies of the United States administration in the region, our situation is one which requires support and protection.

From this rostrum we should like to reaffirm that the workers of Iraq will continue their march towards greater democracy and social progress. They are determined to pursue their struggle to develop their labour code, pensions code and social security code and to ratify the international labour Conventions which Iraq has not yet ratified and to adapt these codes to these Conventions. All this means that the ILO must give every possible assistance in this sphere, particularly since the items on the agenda concerning worker' claims in the event of the insolvency of the employer, structural adjustment, human resources development and the prevention of industrial disasters are problems which affect the workers of Iraq.

Even so, we are optimistic about the future and we support what the Director-General says in Part I of his Report. We affirm the need to strengthen the supervisory machinery for the application of Conventions and Recommendations and confirm once again the need to apply the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. Finally I would like to thank all the trade union and humanitarian organisaitons which have supported the workers and peoples of Iraq, which have offered humanitarian aid, and which have said that they are ready to give medical attention to the sick children of workers, and all those which have supported law and morality.

May the peace, mercy and grace of God be with you.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MENESES (representative of the Permanent Congress of Trade Union Unity of the Workers of Latin America (CPUSTAL) – May I congratulate the President and the other Officers on their election to these important posts, and wish them every success in conducting our debates.

I would also like to thank the President of this session of the Conference for enabling us to take part in these important discussions, as representative of the Permanent Congress of Trade Union Unity of the Workers of Latin America (CPUSTAL), which groups together trade union confederations from more than 20 countries in the region. The CPUSTAL, in its recent statutory meetings, both of the Council and the Executive Committee, reiterated its historic and present commitment to continue the struggle in favour of unity of action, together with all the forces of the Latin American and international trade union movement that are ready to mobilise themselves with a view to achieving the aspirations of workers seeking progress and well-being. It is in this spirit that we take part in the 79th Session of the prestigious and important international gathering that is the International Labour Conference.

The 79th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place during a period of severe economic crisis, especially in the so-called Third World. In Latin America and the Caribbean the crisis is compounded by the foreign imposition of neo-liberal policies which are affecting all the social, political and cultural structures of the region with the so-called magic of the market forces. It is tragic illusion, and it is in fact an instrument with which the rich and powerful impose on whole societies a set of values and rules which only make it harder to achieve the social solidarity which the nations struggling under the weight of underdevelopment are more and more in need of.

Behind the figures, the stagnation and decline of the GNP, the hyperinflation, the continous drop in terms of trade, there are human beings, men and women, children and old people, who are seeing their possibilities of receiving health care, education, comfortable homes and sufficient food fading away.

The areas of destitution and absolute poverty are growing. Unemployment rates are growing. The purchasing power of salaries is falling. Production is falling and millions of people are moving to the cities looking for work and opportunities, which is turning the cities into gigantic metropolises with marginal populations who lack the most basis sanitary conditions, and hence are a prey to epidemics whilst, from another point of view, the chaotic and uncontrolled growth of these cities has resulted in such high levels of environmental pollution that the air is virtually unfit to breathe and the sun is unable to puncture the layer of cloud, dust and gases that obscures the cities.

Latin America and the Caribbean is a continent that cannot manage, in spite of enormous potential wealth, including skilled labour, to overcome underdevelopment, backwardness and misery. The CPUSTAL has a name for this phenomenon: dependency.

Today, dependency has taken on a definite economic form: it is the imposition of neo-liberalism and of the adjustment policies dictated by the International Monetary Fund.

It is a cruel policy which translates into enormous sacrifices which are a long way from leading us to development, and the only guarantee they give us is that we can keep handing over 25,000, 30,000, or 40,000 million dollars each year to the international credit bank.

It is because of this that wages are falling and unemployment is rising; because of this that State enterprises are being sold and essential resources are no longer available for health services and education.

In this situation, no Latin American, not even the most unwary one, could fail to be suspicious of the so-called Enterprise for the Americas Initiative.

It is clear to us that behind any small drop in the immense sea of our needs (caused by imperialist exploitation) is the intention of consolidating our dependency, of binding our markets and our potential to their needs, in a word, of consolidating the lowly rank that has been assigned to us.

For the CPUSTAL, regional integration implies changes in the application of the IMF's adjustment policies and in how countries carry on with regard to debt. For the CPUSTAL any solution to the difficult situation in Latin America and the Carribean must put an immediate stop to the blood-letting being suffered by our economies.

For the CPUSTAL, development cannot be imposed from the outside. It is a creative social process based on culture. Development cannot come from money, physical capital or foreign exchange alone, but must be based on a society's ability to tap collective wisdom in order to unleash the creativity of the masses, and to give people power and allow them to participate in order to liberate their intelligence. The trade union organisations are responsible for fighting the destructive forces that are hoisting the flag of market criteria and submission to the blind and irrational laws of their system, which, moreover, was the cause of the backwardness, the misery and the terrible exploitation that prevails in three-quarters of today's world.

The CPUSTAL is in favour of substituting the present IMF adjustment policies with policies that, using the resources that are at present set aside to service debts, would allow technology to be brought in, enabling us to modernise our production processes and make them competitive, improve the living conditions of our peoples, strengthen and develop our markets, policies, to use an ECLA expression, that would enable us "to grow with equity".

How can the trade unions and progressive forces respond to the problems and challenges before us?

We believe that although the problems are both big and complex, we mustface up to them. We believe that workers and their organisations, united with other popular forces in their respective countries, have the real option of fighting to change the order of things and working to achieve their claims, rights and aspirations.

The fate of workers in Latin America and the Caribbean is not unlike that of workers the world over and of the popular masses that are fighting together for the same cause. We can establish a common front which will allow us to change the present and project ourselves forward into a future of well-being and hope.

We believe that the Latin American trade union movement can find the ways and means to establish a common front that will allow us to make headway in the process of Latin American integration, to increase regional trade, to allow the harmonious development of our domestic markets, to give us the necessary strength to dismantle trade barriers and other protectionist practices that stop our products getting on to the world market, and to make all the nations in Latin America and the Caribbean a decisive force in building the world of peace and justice that humanity deserves.

Our organisation pledges all its forces in order to achieve this aim. We hope that the other trade unions on our continent will do the same: the Latin American Central of Workers, the Inter-American Regional Organisation of Workers and the Regional Organisation for Latin America of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). This will help us to create a single movement able to solve the major problems before us.

The main subject of the Director-General's Report to this session of the Conference is democratisation and the ILO. There is no question that this subject is synonymous with progress. We entirely agree that democracy is necessary for freedom, that democracy means participation in political power and in economic responsibilities, that democracy means respect for human rights such as the right to work, to health, to education, and to housing, to food, in other words to progress and social well-being. So we cannot believe that the simple fact that military dictatorships have fallen in certain countries on our continent means that those countries are now enjoying democracy. There are caricatures of democracy in some of our countries that are drowning people in mysery and hopelessness.

Before finishing I would like to express the request before this forum that the criminal embargo imposed by the North American imperialists on Cuba in their obsession to defeat a revolution that is a living example of justice and dignity be lifted. We also demand that Yankee forces be withdrawn from Panama and that the Panamanians people be paid compensation for the considerable damages in terms of life and resources they have suffered as a result of the genocidal intervention of the United States.

Original – Spanish: Mr. BERNAL CAMERO (Workers' delegate, Cuba) – I should like to begin by extending to the President the sincere greetings of the Confederation of Workers of Cuba. As always, we appreciate the important role that the ILO has played within the United Nations system and we express our willingness to contribute to its success.

With respect to the subject of our discussion, we understand democracy as being power of the people, for the people, and by the people, as Abraham Lincoln taught us, and this has not yet been achieved at the end of the twentieth century.

You yourself have said, and we agree, that trade unions – the other major pillar of tripartism – are the counterweight to employers' organisations.

For us, the independence of the trade union movement began with a triumph of the revolution in 1959. That was the beginning of an economic, political and social process at the service of the legitimate interests of the workers and the people. The Cuban trade union movement, without detriment to its autonomy, identifies with the revolution which it consciously and voluntarily defends and regards as the greatest victory ever achieved by workers in the history of Cuba.

In Cuba there are no official or semi-official trade unions. Our trade union organisations have been constituted by the free choice of workers without any interference from state or party organisations. Joining a trade union in my country is an individual and voluntary decision taken by each individual worker. No one and nothing forces anyone to join a trade union.

The trade union movement in Cuba is self-financed. We do not receive any subsidies from state, party or international organisations. The members of trade unions personaly hand over their dues which provide the monthly financing for their organisation. Therefore, in Cuba, there are no mandatory "dues" which were used such as those by corrupt trade union leaders to enrich themselves prior to the revolution.

Trade unions are strong and powerful and, at the same time, profoundly democratic. In my country, there are more than 70,000 trade union organisations in both urban and rural areas and every worker has a possibility to play an active role in trade union life. More than 97 per cent of workers are members of trade unions.

All of the leaders are elected by direct and secret ballot. The candidates are put forward by individual proposal made by another member or by the candidate himself, if he so wishes. It is enough to accept to be a candidate to be included in the list which is submitted for direct and secret ballot. When the votes are counted, anyone who wishes may join the committee that counts the votes. Therefore, I can say the candidates are not put forward by the party and they are certainly not appointed by the party as a certain international confederation has reported to the ILO.

I can say, with my head held high, that in Cuba that we find no danger to trade union freedom and democracy. Ten per cent of workers (more than 35,000) hold trade union leadership posts and have been democratically elected to these, as I said earlier. We adopt our statutes ourselves without any supervision by any Government institution or official.

In this world, which is so dominated by powerful interests, there are organisations which distort reality in the name of freedom and democratic values. They like to invent so-called trade union leaders of supposed organisations for some pretended democratisation, and they then channel to these anti-democratic organisations enormous amounts of financial resources, providing press coverage, communication and printing equipment, and trained, full-time specialists devoted to disrupting the unity of Cuban workers.

We are well aware of the ideological basis of this tactic. It has nothing to do with carrying out and implementing international Conventions. Thus, in 1957 to 1958, when hundreds of trade union locals in Cuba were attacked by the Batista army and with the approval of the Secretary-General of the Confederation of Workers of Cuba (CTC) at the time, which was then affiliated to the regional body of the ICFTU, trade union leaders were set in place by ministerial degree.

When there were no freedom of association or constitutional guarantees, a delegate of the International Confederation (to which the CTC was affiliated), after visiting and contacting leaders and attending meetings, said, and I quote: "The Confederation of Workers of Cuba is fulfilling an important and effective task in the strictly trade union area, and enjoys full freedom of association and meetings." They also said they had not encountered any evidence of lack of freedom of association and that on the contrary they had received the impression that there was no barrier to trade union action in relation to social benefits or workers' claims. They said there was no evidence of violation of the trade union rights that were universally accepted in the free world, and no reason to doubt that the Confederation of Workers of Cuba was acting in accordance with the basic principles of the ICFTU.

Naturally we are quite aware that only months after the dictator Batista had to relinquish power in the same year even, one could read in a report by that same organisation: "In Cuba there is a military dictatorship. Cuba is going through a very difficult and turbulent period of time which will require much tact and diplomacy on the part of the CTC".

Now there is no talk about tact and diplomacy, now, when the workers themselves are building their own society, a committee has been established which broadcasts radio messages from abroad to Cuban workers, calling on them to sabotage production, to stir up labour and social indiscipline, to sow disorder, and to burn the cane fields and destroy transport.

The CTC respects and recognises any trade union leader who has been elected by the members, but it has no obligation to accept passively the anti-democratic imposition of leaders and policies not in the legitimate interests of the workers.

For democracy to exist there must, among other conditions, be an end to outside interference of whatever type. Some international organisations employ methods and procedures that play into the hands of the powerful countries who regard themselves as defenders of freedom. For there to be democracy, we have to begin by democratising the United Nations and, first and foremost, the Security Council.

I do not believe that it is either democratic humane, or just, or ethical for the government of a powerful nation to prevent other countries and enterprises from trading freely with my country. Recently, the president of that nation stated his intention to sanction any vessels that put into Cuban ports.

I would request the ILO to intervene with the Secretary-General of the United Nations in order to oblige that government to change its position of economic and trade blockade which it has maintained against my country for more than 30 years, causing immense damage to our economy of other workers and enterprises in the world and naturally of those workers which I represent.

This same nation hides behind its military might and the acceptance of international organisations in order to maintain against the will of my people an aggressive naval base in Guatanamo Bay which is Cuban territory.

As long as the interests of powerful nations and multinationals prevail over the interests of the people, as long as there is abject inequality among those who live by the work of others and those who must live on their own modest wages, and as long as there are millions of unemployed and illiterate in the world, and as long as we continue to think of the market economy as synonymous with freedom and democracy, to say that there have been hopeful changes in the world is a utopia that we cannot share.

As for democratisation within the ILO, we believe that it is necessary to continue to perfect its procedures and structures, to increase participation in decision-making, to maintain and to improve balance in analyses between rich and poor countries, to base analyses and studies on the specific practices of each country, taking no account of external pressures that might distort reality and to sow confusion.

We favour the most effective control of the implementation of all Conventions equally in all countries. And I would like to conclude by proposing that we study the possibility of debating at an early session of the Conference the causes underlying the low level of union membership that we see in many parts of the world.

We also very much would like to see continued the efforts that have been made to prevent the implementation of the unjust decision to dislodge the headquarters of the World Federation of Labour from its present headquarters.

Mr. KHAN (Workers' delegate, Bangladesh) – Let me join the previous speakers in congratulating the President and the Vice-President of the Conference for their election. I repose my confidence in their abilities to conduct the proceedings of this Conference.

I take this opportunity to compliment the Director-General for his Report, Democratisation and the ILO. He has referred to the democratic movement that has replaced authoritarian political systems in Eastern Europe, some countries in South America, Africa and Asia, and indicated that the process has to be kept alive with necessary support from the social partners in member countries of the ILO.

The process has already enlarged the membership of this tripartite organisation, thereby placing additional claims on its resources and technical abilities. It has also expanded the horizon of democracy and fundamental human rights. It would call for more active and effective participation in the activities of the ILO by Governments, Employers and Workers, as well as the adoption of standards, not only for upholding the rights and interests of the workers, but also for institutionalising fundamental human rights.

In addition to the democratic parameters, member States are now called upon to ensure the expansion of economic activities, where necessary, by expediting structural adjustment, enterprise development and employment and training. The Director-General has duly emphasised the need for strengthening tripartism as a means for attaining those goals.

The 79th Session of the International Labour Conference has on its agenda some basic issues like the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, the prevention of industrial disasters and the development of human resources, in addition to the usual items.

The delegations of member States attending the Conference have already presented for consideration resolutions which will cover various issues including those on migration of employment. I would say that the ILO should not only adopt Conventions, Recommendations and conclusions on all these items, but also strengthen technical cooperation activities with a view to enabling member States to implement existing standards.

Coming as I do from a developing country and representing the workforce of Bangladesh, I ask this Conference to adopt standards that can be implemented in the majority of the countries of the world. The Conference should also adopt programmes and financial and administrative proposals that will activate the revelant departments of the ILO for effectively interacting with member States, where necessary with technical assistance. At this stage, I should underscore the needs of the developing countries which must be covered, in addition to the expansion of technical assistance to new members of the ILO.

The needs of the developing countries will naturally increase with the process of structural adjustment and human resources development. They will also increase due to technological development. This Conference should, therefore, adopt measures for meeting the upcoming needs of developing countries and of countries in Eastern Europe. Likewise, the Conference should deliberate on issues that come up with constitutional changes in South Africa and the continuing problems of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

On the subject of practical development, I wish to refer to the changes that took place in Bangladesh. This small country of 110 million people has opted for democratisation through the political upsurge in 1990 and democratic elections in 1991. The people at large reposed confidence in the leadership of Begum Khaleda Zia for transforming the political and economic aspects of life. Parliamentary democracy has been resuscitated, the economy is being restructured and the rights and interests of the people, including workers, have been rehabilitated. As a result, the country is now in need of inflow of capital and know-how, upgrading of skills of manpower and expansion of economic and trading activities. For all these, the resource-constrained country looks upon the world community through this unique tripartite organisation for adequate assistance and collaboration. This is necessary to ensure quick economic development through proper implementation of the "politics of productivity" introduced by the late President Ziaur Rahman and being pursued by the present Prime Minister Begum Khaleda Zia.

Bangladesh has a huge manpower surplus. Quite a substantial part of it is highly educated but unemployed. Part of the workforce is highly skilled, yet the need for the expansion of education and training is underscored by well-meaning people, including experts, that go to work under different technical assistance projects. As a representative of the workforce, I urge this Organisation to adopt programmes that will be of assistance to Bangladesh.

It is common knowledge that the demand for skilled manpower increase with technological advancement. In the case of Bangladesh, the same demand is added to the demand for skilled manpower in traditional industries like the textile and agro-industries. Bangladesh even needs to expand training programmes for construction workers, who are in demand. In the area of garment manufacturing, which employs the bulk of otherwise unemployed people, technical assistance is needed. Creating employment opportunities for rural women should be considered as another area of priority for technical assistance, while expanded support for workers' education is necessary for a better labour-management relationship and higher productivity.

I have so far touched only upon the fringes of the problems that a country like Bangladesh is faced with, and urged the expansion of collaborative activities. I would fail in my duty if I do not refer to the need of the workforce in terms of their organisational activities. It is because of the prevailing circumstances that trade union activities have not burgeoned into a comprehensive structure. Some of our workers are yet to be protected. With the move for structural adjustment, some of the actively engaged workforce is likely to be retrenched without an assured "golden handshake" or arrangement for retraining and rehabilitation. This grim prospect has made our active labour force rather concerned and reactive. This trend needs to be reversed through retraining facilities and rehabilitation programmes, both of which, may I reiterate, will depend on inflow of assistance from multilateral and bilateral sources. Through this forum I exhort the world community to come in good stead of the workforce of Bangladesh.

In regard to the adoption of Conventions and Recommendations on the agenda items, I should only say that, while issues like industrial disasters and workers' claims are of a universal nature, issues which are more relevant to the workers of developing countries, who constitute nearly 80 per cent of the world's workforce, should be given precedence. At the same time, national-level implementation of the fundamental Conventions like Nos. 87 and 98 should be pursued more rigorously. This will be in line with the theme of the Director-General's Report submitted this year.

Mr. MALENTACCHI (representative of the International Metalworkers' Federation) – Firstly, may I congratulate the President on his election and on the fair and partisan way in which he is presiding over this gathering.

The ILO, like many other of the world's institutions, has been seeking to define its role in a new world epoch. This is a challenging task.

The 1980s saw a crisis for communism which turned out to be terminal – at least for the European-based variety. Will the 1990s turn out to be a decade of crisis for capitalism?

The triumph and euphoria about the end of history are misplaced. Barely more than one hour's flight from where we sit, a great and a tragic civil war is raging in a European region.

Each week, it seems, unemployment in Western Europe rises, and the ILO itself has produced excellent reports on the possible tragedies that confront labour markets in Russia and other Eastern European States unless there is prudent planning and consensus in the passage to a market economy.

We are watching in Rio the sight of the world's rich countries turn their backs on the poor. But in the Third World we see mounting poverty, mounting hunger and a denial of a wide range of human rights. And what, in this process, is the role of the ILO?

It is a question partly tackled in the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO, a fascinating document in which many ideas and not a little provocation can be traced to the hands that helped to shape it.

There were also questions dealt with in the important opening address given by the ILO's Governing Body Chairman, Monsieur Chotard – a speech that deserves close study. He laid stress on three objectives for the ILO. Firstly, that "social dialogue is the vital complement to political democracy, and that this dialogue requires independent partners and public authorities that respect their independence". Secondly, he stressed the ILO's "constant objective of combating poverty". Thirdly, Monsieur Chotard emphasised the need for "the comprehensive protection of workers". If the last two are ends, then the first priority – social dialogue between independent partners – remains the means.

Let me also say that I strongly agree with Monsieur Chotard's remarks about the universality of the ILO and its tripartite philosophy and the necessity to avoid a regionalisation of world trade and values.

Sadly, it cannot be said that each and every one of the speakers who has preceded me to this rostrum appears to have read Monsieur Chotard's remarks, or to understand what the ILO's core message is, or why the values of the ILO are so essential to creating the new world order based on sustainable growth, political democracy and social justice.

Hyprocrisy, Voltaire said, is the compliment that vice pays to virtue. Now, Monsieur Voltaire, another wise Frenchman, lived only a few hundred metres from where we meet today but, alas, died two centuries ago. I often ask myself what a modern-day Voltaire would say if he heard all the beautiful speeches made from this rostrum and contrasted them with the reality back in the country or in the companies that the speakers represent.

We have the admission of a new country to the ILO, the Republic of Korea, whose Government is making no effort to ratify key ILO Conventions and which, far from instituting or encouraging a social dialogue, prefers to lock up trade unionists who organise independent unions.

I would like to suggest that the ILO's communications staff look into the possibility of televising by satellite the proceedings of this Conference to all the workers of the world so that they can hear what their governments and employers are saying here in Geneva, and contrast the words with the experience, the speeches with the reality.

I appreciate the solid work done the ILO and the unique nature of its tripartite composition. The ILO's record on apartheid and, in earlier days, in combating imperialism and colonialism gave it a moral standing in the world.

Today, there are no more imperialists, or are there?

Let me quote from the newspaper of international business and banking, the Financial Times, which recently described what it called, and I quote, "the New Imperialists". The new imperialists, said the Financial Times, come from the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. They arrive with a new gospel, the doctrine of the SAP – in English, the Structural Adjustment Programme. According to the Financial Times, developing countries can receive loans provided they follow the new orthodoxies of balanced budgets, devaluation, privatisation and a hearty welcome for foreign investment. The paper concluded that this new imperialism has involved the total integration of the International Monetary Fund and World Bank into the life of the target countries.

I support free trade and the free flow of capital, but I do want to issue a word of warning before the ILO gets too closely integrated with these new imperialists.

Much is made of contacts between the IMF and the World Bank and the ILO, but there is a difference between exchanging views and opening the gate of the hen house to the fox.

It will require very clear leadership and an unswerving adherence to ILO principles to ensure that this body sustains a vital role in the future, and I am sure the Governing Body and the Director-General and his staff can supply that vision and leadership.

I also appeal to all member governments to abide by ILO Conventions.

Normally, protocol demands that one avoid criticism of members States, but there is one violator of ILO Conventions which cannot escape criticism.

For nearly 20 years now, in complaint after complaint to the ILO, the Government of Malaysia has been found guilty of violating ILO Conventions Nos 87 and No. 98 by refusing to permit workers in the electronics industry to form a union or unions of their own choice.

In his address last week, the Minister of Human Resources made reference to forming in-house unions, but the very complaint which the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations as well as the Governing Body dealt with this year concerned an in-house union at Hitachi which was destroyed by the company and the Government. Electronics workers have sought to form in-house unions at RCA Harris and, again, because the union was formed by workers and not by the company, it was destroyed. I get rather sick and tired of the claim that Malaysia can do what it likes and reject ILO principles because it is a poor developing country. Compared with it neighbours, Indonesia or Thailand, let alone India or Bangladesh, Malaysia is a wealthy country, but the gap between the workers' living standards and the profits made by multinationals is getting bigger day by day.

Only independent trade unions and an adherence to ILO principles can put this matter right.

The full details of Malaysia's lamentable record in the ILO is contained in a special book available to all ILO delegates. This is no longer an issue to be brushed under the carpet, nor is it one that will surface only at this Conference. The issue of Malaysian violation of ILO core principles will remain on the agenda and grow in importance in the years to come. I urge all delegates to talk with the Malaysian delegation.

In conclusion, I would like to congratulate the Committee on the Application of Standards on the strong conclusion on Malaysia that was reached today, and to express the hope that the Malaysian Government accepts the offer of ILO technical assistance to bring it close into line with ILO Conventions.

It is not our business to interfere in internal Malaysian affairs, but it is our business to uphold ILO principles and to support the findings and recommendations of the ILO Governing Body.

Mr. RAHMAN (Employers' delegate, Bangladesh) – I am privileged to have this opportunity of addressing the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should like, first of all, to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the Presidency of this Conference. I am also happy to congratulate the Vice-Presidents.

The Director-General deserves congratulations for presenting an excellent report before the Conference. The theme of this year's Report, democratisation and the ILO, is of critical importance in view of the far-reaching reforms and changes that are currently taking place in the world. It is heartening to see that the ILO is addressing itself to the prevailing situation with a view to responding to the expectations of its constituents, to help strengthen democracies and consolidate transition towards market economy.

Political and economic systems are being rebuilt in many parts of the world. It is a delicate process, one that requires subtle handling and realisation of what democracy really entails. It would be a tragic mistake to assume that democracy automatically leads to economic development. To raise this point is not to question the essential virtues of democracy, but to stress that democracy is not an end in itself but a means to an end. All depends on how the means are availed and utilised.

What is needed therefore is a clear-headed realisation of the prerequisites for the success of democracy in bringing the greatest good to the largest number of people. Democracy requires institutions, rule of law, civil liberties, free press, supportive administration and deregulation. These have to be recognised, developed and nurtured.

As pointed out in the Director-General's Report, no political regime or economic system can expect to endure unless it is capable of satisfying the basic needs of its population. The transition towards democratisation in the low income countries is thus a formidable task because of economic crisis, widespread poverty and alarming unemployment.

The low income countries will be able to succeed in attaining lasting and sustainable democracies if the widening gap in global opportunities is reduced. These countries are being increasingly marginalised in the world trading system. The LDCs have been among the greatest losers; their share of global trade has been reduced by 50 per cent – from 0.8 per cent to 0.4 per cent over the last two decades. The lack of market opportunities for developing countries costs them at least US$500 billion a year, which is ten times higher than what they receive in foreign assistance. Net transfer of long-term lending to developing countries turned from plus US$21 billion per annum from 1972-82 to minus US$21.5 billion from 1983-90. IMF net transfer to developing countries was minus US$6.3 billion from 1986-90. In 1991, net World Bank transfer was minus US$1.7 billion. The Bretton Woods institutions thus failed many developing countries at their time of greatest need.

The democratisation process has been threatened in many low-income countries because of massive unemployment. Renewed protectionism in developed countries affected negatively on the abilities of the developing countries to generate employment. Industrial countries have been raising barriers to import from developing countries. Of 24 industrial nations, 20 are more protectionist today than they were ten years ago. The effective rate of protection against exports from developing nations is considerably higher than the rate against exports from industrial countries. Such restrictions, according to the World Bank, reduced developing countries' GNP by three per cent per annum. Non-tariff barriers, which increased by 20 per cent between 1987-90, are now the main obstacles to the exports of low income countries to the developed world. About 50 per cent of exports of textiles and clothing are subjected to non-tariff barriers. The Multi-Fibre Arrangement (MFA) denied the developing countries an estimated US$24 billion per annum in export earnings in recent years.

The disparities in the distribution of global economic opportunities are also serious in other cases. The developing countries effectively paid 17 per cent interest a year on their foreign debt during the last decade while the rich nations paid only 4 per cent. The income gap between rich and poor countries is not only considerable, it is widening at an alarming rate. The North, with about 25 per cent of the world's population, consumes 70 per cent of the world's energy, 75 per cent of its metals, 85 per cent of its timber, and 60 per cent of its food. During the last three decades, the countries with the richest 20 per cent of the world population increased their share of global GNP from 70.2 per cent to 82.7 per cent. The countries with the poorest 20 per cent of the world population saw their share fall from 2.3 per cent to a mere 1.4 per cent today.

In such an unfavourable international environment, the journey towards "more democracy" and "more market" will not be smooth in many cases. "More democracy" in most instances spurs hopes for greater expectations, demand for more consumption, and participation in the decision-making process. Such aspirations, in many countries, may be out of proportion to the existing politico-economic capabilities. It has been our experience in Bangladesh that the democratic process tends to be overwhelmingly preoccupied with reconciling the interests of political groups and employed labour, and has thus been able to give correspondingly less attention to focus on development issues including ensuring the basic needs of the larger section of the population. Such a process of reconciliation poses a political dilemma. I feel that the ILO has a major role to play, not only in such processes of reconciliation, but in the overall management of the transition.

Finally, as so many countries in the world focus their efforts on constructing market economies, international agencies, including the ILO, have to take them closer to the main actors in that process. For many decades, these international organisations have been financing governments and government-controlled projects. Of necessity, their relationships have been with government bureaucracy rather than with the private sector. They need to readjust themselves at the earliest possible moment so that private enterprise development is encouraged rather than discouraged.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. GODINHO GOMES (Minister of Administrative Reform, Public Service and Labour, Guinea-Bissau) – Speaking on behalf of my country, Guinea-Bissau, before this illustrious assembly, I should like to begin by warmly congratulating the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference of his brilliant and well-deserved election. I should like to wish him every success of which his career and his human and professional qualities are the best insurance.

This 79th Session of the International Labour Conference is taking place at what is a particularly difficult moment for developing countries, including Guinea-Bissau. The very negative consequences of the international crisis have been aggravated by those which arise from structural adjustment programmes under way in many of our countries and the difficulties arising from the process of political transition to a multi-party democracy currently taking place in most African countries. In his Report to the 1992 session of the Conference, the Director-General selected as his topic Democratisation and the ILO. On behald of the delegation of my country and myself, I should like warmly to congratulate the Director-General for the very appropriate topic he has selected and also for the quality of his Report.

Guinea-Bissau, like the other Portuguese-speaking countries of Africa, who have lived through a period of national liberation, a struggle that lasted more than ten years, is now in a situation which includes on the one hand, a historical legitimacy based on the massive voluntary support of our populations for the national liberation struggle, and on the other, the difficult legacy of colonisation and war. Poorly skilled leaders were educated within infrastructures which have by and large been destroyed, and the absence of implementation, of our very scarce human resources created, early on, conditions for dependence on foreign aid, which has increased in the years following independence. This historic legitimacy, established on a democratic basis has proved a major advantage for our country and the Party which took power in 1973. This was a historical precedent with regard to the fight for democracy. Some economic mistakes were made in our country, which have had consequences in both the economic and social sphere.

With the changes that took place on 14 November 1980, a very serious effort was made under the leadership of the new PAIGC to correct the errors of the recent past. Major reforms were undertaken and the State became more of a partner than a figure of leadership. In 1986, trade liberalisation began but as economic performance made it possible for a market economy to be introduced, political life in general began to stagnate, content with the conquests of the past, and failing to take into account the erosion of democratic consensus that had existed since the liberation. This consensus began to feel the adverse effects of the new situation. The Government undertook a series of political reforms that allowed large sectors of society in Guinea-Bissau to express themselves freely. At the same time the door was opened to a multi-party system, at the instigation of the single party which put into action, what the will of the people demanded. A new Constitution was promulgated and new laws on the freedom of association, the right to organise and the right to strike were adopted. At present we have seven legally constituted parties of which the PAIGC is one. These seven parties are preparing to compete in presidential and legislative elections which will take place at the end of this year. This process is taking place in a climate of social peace and tolerance that we are determined to preserve.

It is in this context that Guinea-Bissau is making an effort to implement its structural adjustment programme which is a precondition for continued economic recovery.

In order for this adjustment programme to be successful, our development partners, and in particular the Bretton Woods Institutions, should support the efforts and the political will that the Government has demonstrated. They also need to create conditions, conducive to a successful outcome, including an appropriate organisation of the labour market, strengthening of institutions and meeting the tremendous need for training. There is now a cooperation programme in the field of training, prepared by the Portuguese-speaking African countries, Portugal and the ILO. We believe this is an excellent and timely initiative and we would like warmly to congratulate those who promoted it.

In conclusion, I should like to appeal to the ILO to pay increasing attention to my country so that the sacrifies that have been made and all of our current efforts will not be in vain.

Original – French: Mr. ROLAND (representative of the International Miners' Federation) – The International Miners' Federation represents close to 3 million mineworkers and quarry workers as well as the energy sector. These workers, these employees, these technicians and administrative staff are grouped in 49 organisations, established in 44 countries.

Our organisations have confirmed that workers and their organisations have an essential role to play in the process of transition towards democratic government.

In the Eastern and Central European countries there is hardly any country where mineworkers have not been amongst the first ones to organise in order to destabilise and then overthrow intolerable regimes. From the mines of Valias, near Tirana, to the Kuzbass coal mines, to Upper Silesia, miners, through collective action, have helped to dismantle these regimes which had banished freedom of association.

In Africa, amd here I refer in particular to the struggle of the NUM in South Africa, but also in Latin America and Asia, miners and their organisations have been and continue to be the champions in the struggle for government which represents the nation and are answerable to it.

Our sector, because of this very ongoing process, especially in the economic field, is still faced with serious problems in many countries. Closures, transformations, rationalisations, restructuring, adaptations to market realities, in particular to price-setting mechanisms, the absence of social security schemes, are realities which affect us brutally. These are realities which quite often cause our members to wonder whether by insisting on more democracy or better adapted economic systems to meet their needs, they only won one right, namely, the right to our employment.

The International Labour Organisation could help to facilitate this transition by making it less painful.

First of all, it could see to it that there is a true social dialogue in those societies which are now undergoing a process of civil reconstitution. Democracy does not boil down to profit and loss statements or to casting a vote.

At present, in the mining and energy sector of Eastern and Central Europe, opportunistic advisers and consultants from the West find a broader audience than the workers of these industries. This is not healthy. The ILO could provide greater opportunities to the workers' organisations, to the employers' organisations and the governments of these countries in order to reflect jointly on their problems based on experience gained elsewhere.

The number of seminars and training courses to meet new needs, which are best indentified by tripartite organs, should be increased. The ILO could also increase its ability to provide diligent, qualified opinions on the new legislative proposals which affect the world of labour and industrial relations.

The Director-General was right to say that there are no ready-made solutions for these countries. But in our sector, at least, there are more credible solutions than just to close down mines as in Great Britain. The Organisation, to meet these tasks, quite often can count on highly qualified personnel which, in a better and more flexible environment, could work even more efficiently in displaying its skills.

The ILO could also strengthen its institutional role. An evaluation, untarnished by complacency of the tasks, especially as regard technical cooperation, would help to bolster the reputation of the ILO as a truly specialised agency of the United Nations. Organisations such as the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the UNDP, but also regional groupings such as the EC, which in its external activities quite often arrogantly disregards the world of labour, should be made to consider the ILO as a check-point when their plans might have an impact on workers.

The standard-setting activities of the ILO makes it different from quite a few other international organisations. This distinction should be constantly upgraded. The Governing Body of the ILO has, at the request of the Workers' group, finally agreed to consider at its forthcoming session the possibility of including an item on the prevention of accidents in the mining industry on the Conference's agenda in 1994. We welcome this decision.

My organisation, which was set up more than 100 years ago, still has no international instrument which is conducive towards greater safety and health in mines or establishes minimum standards for the protection of workers, especially as regards the prevention of accidents. However, this is an industrial sector which has very specific problems. Such a Convention would fit in very well with the work already undertaken by the ILO in this field. It would be the logical follow-up of the work undertaken by the two industrial committees which have been working on mines for years. It would enhance the value of the various codes of practice adopted by the ILO concerning mining activities by linking them with an international legal instrument.

In the month of April of this year, our organisation organised in Germany, with the technical and financial assistance of the ILO, an international conference which adopted a charter on occupational safety and health in mines and which reflected the wishes of the workers. The 113 participants coming from 53 countries called for the ILO to adopt a Convention on the subject.

That conference was dedicated to the memory of the workers who were killed in a dramatic accident in the Zonguldak mine in Turkey. A few days later, a fatal accident struck in Germany itself. Since then in Canada, Sierra Leone, South Africa, China and elsewhere, accidents led to the death of dozens and dozens of workers. On Tuesday last, 55 miners were killed following a methane explosion in Ukraine.

Many of these dramas could have been avoided. An international convention could have helped simply because in the field of occupational safety and health a precise knowledge of the conditions leading to accidents, drawing on internationally recognised criteria and comparative analysis, is one of the best sources for an expertise leading to avoiding these accidents. Such an instrument will be extremely useful to help developing countries where the mining industry is expanding and where existing legislation is still anachronistic. It also would help to ensure that all mining companies would respect the same occupational safety and health criteria, and thus would bear comparable financial burdens. The fact that companies obtain an international competitive edge by skimping on occupational safety and health expenditures is intolerable.

We fervently hope that the Governing Body will agree to place on the agenda of the 1994 session of the Conference an item on occupational safety and health in mines with a view to a Convention.This, of course, is a sectorial instrument, but to reject this proposal on that ground alone would be to deny the importance and specificity of safety problems in our sector, a fact which is unfortunately borne out by accident after accident. Our members do not wish to make a living by losing their lives. This is a legitimate aspiration which the ILO should heed.

I would like to conclude by coming back to the question of democratisation and saying that President Chiluba made a very clear and strong statement about the subject. Before he was elected President of his country, Fred Chiluba was also the democratically elected President of the South African Trade Union Congress. The Secretary-General of this Congress, Chakufwa Chihana, is today jailed without any charges having been brought against him, for having had the courage to say aloud what other people simply whisper, i.e. that Africans no longer wish to be victimised by dictatorial, decadent and corrupt regimes. The South African Trade Union Congress, the legitimacy of which was confirmed repeatedly by the South African Labour Congress, a tripartite organisation, saw its premises sealed.

The name Chakufwa means in the vernacular "dead child". It was given to him by his parents to ward off an ill fate. He was able to avoid death but he is still jailed and gagged. This is a heinous violation of human and trade union rights, unfortunately one more in this country and in many others.

Mr. JENNINGS (representative of the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees) – It is a great pleasure for me to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and to address him and the distinguished delegates present here today.

My organisation, the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees (FIET), is one of the largest international trade union organisations in the world with over 11 million trade union members in 370 unions in over 100 countries. Nearly half of our members are women – their numbers fuelled by the growth in service sector employment around the globe.

Workers in the service sector represent tomorrow's labour force. These workers need the ILO to devote more resources for research, education and training, and equal opportunities in our sectors if the ILO wishes to tailor its activities to the realities of today's labour market.

We need the ILO to support efforts to extend trade union and social and labour protections to them. We need new international labour standards; for example, workers in cleaning and maintenance – in what we term property services – need a specific ILO Convention and we hope that a future Conference examines this question with the utmost urgency.

Our members also need the ILO to integrate better our concerns in all its programmes and activities. Workers in commerce, in financial institutions, in property services, in offices, in industry, in social insurance and health care, in high technology fields and in professional managerial grades have concerns that need to be reflected in all of the ILO's work. New working patterns, including greater use of flexible and part-time workers, homeworking and other "atypical" employment relationship have consequences for all of the areas that fall under the terms of reference of the ILO. It is time we saw a response from the ILO to address these issues.

Technological and organisational changes, which are causing the shift in employment structures, must not be allowed to produce divided, more fragmented societies with greater disparities in living and working conditions. They must be geared to achieving sustainable and equitable development for all the world's citizens.

By the year 2050, it is estimated that the world's population will stand at 10 billion. Already in the last two decades, absolute poverty has increased substantially in all continents. How many people will be forced to live – or should I say die – in poverty in the future unless we take action now? The ILO has a strategic role in promoting concerted international action to bring about better social advancement. It must also sharpen its ability to influence the conduct of multinational companies.

Today, we stand at a turning point in history. At a time when just 500 companies control 70 per cent of world economic trade, 80 per cent of foreign investment and 30 per cent of world GDP, at a time of global democratic revolution, at a time of closer economic integration, ordinary working people are more vulnerable to social and economic forces over which they have little control.

We have seen governments adopt monetarist policies which fuel poverty and increase social instability. Such short-term policies reflect a notion of progress that recognises the price of everthing, but the value of nothing. Today in the OECD region alone unemployment stands at 30 million. We will never build successful economies at the local, national or international level through a process of pauperisation of the workforce.

The Director-General in his Report to this year's Conference is correct in recognising that the concept of social justice, which lies at the heart of the ILO's raison d'être, has to be rekindled and nurtured afresh if it is to continue to have a meaning in today's changing world order. But we will not succeed if we rely on "selling" social justice as a marketable product. It has to be much more.

It is true that political democratisation is taking place around the world. It is true that workers and trade unions have been a vanguard for the struggle for universal suffrage; but it is also true that human rights are more under attack than ever. Over 100 governments in the world practise torture; trade union rights are being systematicall violated in many countries. Child labour and bonded labour is widespread. The standards and principles of the ILO are more than just "sources of inspiration". Member States of the ILO must actively support the Organisation's principles and objectives and translate this inspiration into practice.

Many of our affiliates have long-standing conflicts with their governments. We cannot accept interference in the right of trade unions to organise all workers, including those occupying professional and managerial functions. We cannot accept delays on the part of governments to extend trade union rights to all workers. The Turkish Government, for example, still fails to give bank workers the right to strike or to organise in the public sector in spite of many promises and in spite of the repeated requests made by the ILO. In Korea today trade union leaders are indiscriminately arrested for conducting what we consider normal trade union activities.

It is promising that the Director-General in his Report points to increased cooperation between the ILO and the international financial institutions, and to the greater emphasis being given to the social content of national adjustment programmes and to the need for tripartite discussion in the framing of development policies. FIET would welcome the ILO playing a bigger role in the work of the IMF and the World Bank. FIET for one is ready to play its part in this process.

Much has been said already during the Conference in support of tripartism in building democratic, developed societies. As a tripartite organisation, the ILO obviously has a key role to play in promoting tripartism throughout its member States. In grouping together the main actors in society – trade union, employers and governments – it can help shape the social, political and economic relations which are necessary to the long-term viability of our civilisation. Tripartite structures are critical to the new democracies in Central and Eastern Europe, to the debt-ridden economies of Latin America, to the fast-developing nations in Asia and the Pacific, in Africa and in an apartheid-free South Africa.

These new relations have never been needed more than now with the growing racism and hatred that fill many of our societies.

The Director-General in his Report rightly emphasises the important role of the social partners in building and maintaining viable democracies. Strong and participatory social partners are fundamental to democracy. But the Director-General must not let himself fall into the trap of thinking that employers and trade unions are always equal players in the game. How can trade unions be truly equal when governments – rather than recognise and negotiate with strong democratic and independent trade union organisaitons – choose instead to enact restrictive labour legislation, curtail the ability of unions to function, make the right to strike difficult to exercise and where employers invest heavily in anti-union campaigns? The ILO must be much firmer in demanding that governments create the right conditions for tripartism to function effectively.

In conclusion, the ILO must harness the support of government to create a social framework where working people can be protected from exploitation. Democracy and social justice are two sides of the same coin. They need to be given shape through mutually agreed regulations and procedures and to be constantly developed by the active participation of all elements in society. Too often, governments look passively to market forces as a pretext for their inaction. They are "opting out" of their responsibility to create a better tomorrow.

I hope that, in the future, we will all hear much louder and clearer the basic philosophy of the ILO reaffirmed.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA) – I wish to allow the right of reply to Mr. Rachman, Workers' delegate, Indonesia, to the interventions of Mr. Torres Couto, Workers' delegate, Portugal, and Mr. Vittori, representative of Pax Christi International; and to Mr. Zhang, Government delegate, China, to the speech of Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States.

I wish to point out that the replies should refer only to the point under debate. They should be brief, not exceeding two minutes and should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, they should be couched in correct and parliamentary language.

Furthermore, I wish to point out that in order to avoid endless debates, it has been a practice of the President to refuse to allow replies to a reply.

Mr. RACHMAN (Workers' delegate, Indonesia) – During the second sitting, the guidance for the smooth proceeding of the Conference was set in which all delegates were requested to avoid mentioning any issue outside the topics under discussion.

The Indonesian Workers' delegate believed that this guidance was applicable to and would be respected by all. The Workers' delegate of Portugal was an exception. It is becoming a ritual for this delegate to refer to East Timor – a territory which was irresponsibly abandoned by this colonial power in the midst of a civil war which the latter had itself instigated. Breaking chains of over 100 years of colonialism, the people of East Timor themselves decided in 1975 to be independent through integration with Indonesia. The Indonesian people of the province of East Timor are now enjoying more than ever before their basic rights as well as improved living standards.

Concerning the incident of 12 November, my delegation would like to remind the speaker of the result of the proceedings of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights last March when, inter alia, it welcomed the steps taken by the Indonesian Government to correct and to redress the situation.

Consequently, no resolution or decision on the incident was adopted, and their all-frustrated cries for international solidarity went unheeded since they were groundless and politically motivated.

The tripartite system is unique to the ILO and when governments and non-governmental organisations directly concerned with labour matters, such as the Employers' and Workers' groups, deliberate seriously and harmoniously, they work for the benefit of workers and their families. However, these efforts are frustrated when an NGO – like Pax Christi International – intrudes into our work by raising an issue which is not relevant to it.

Original – Chinese: Mr. ZHANG (Government delegate, China) – In his speech this afternoon the Workers' delegate from the United States referred to the so-called Workers' Autonomous Federation of China as a trade union organisation, for which we have to express our regret. The so-called Workers' Autonomous Federation was developed in 1989 by a handful of criminal offenders who had attempted to overthrow the Chinese Government. Now some of them have fled the country and continued their activities against the lawful Chinese Government.

This development has nothing to do with the question of freedom of association and it also has nothing to do with the question of workers' rights.

We hope that the Conference will take note of this position of the Chinese Government.

President: Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues

Eighth Report of the Selection Committee: Submission and adoption

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda is the Eighth Report of the Selection Committee, which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 6G. This has been submitted by the Chairman of the Selection Committee and only contains changes in the composition of Committees. It is submitted to you for your adoption. If there are no objections, I shall consider it adopted.

Ratification of a Convention by Japan

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have pleasure in announcing to the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification, by Japan, of the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159). This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 5,688.

Statement by the President concerning the Special Sitting of the Conference

Original – French: The PRESIDENT – There is a statement on the Special Sitting which I would now like to read out to you. Delegates will remember that the Special Sitting of the Conference will take place in the afternoon on Tuesday, 16 June, in order to examine the Appendix to the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

You will also remember that the list of speakers for the Special Sitting was closed on Friday, 12 June at 6 p.m. so as to enable me, after consulting the Vice-Presidents, to submit to the Conference for decision without debate a proposal for a time-limit for speeches at the Special Sitting.

The list contains the names of 46 speakers, of whom five are representatives of international non-governmental organisations. This number has led the Officers of the Conference to consider fixing the maximum length of speeches at seven minutes, it being understood that this would be an absolute maximum. We would like to call on all speakers to ensure that their speeches are as brief as possible in order to respect the limits of the timetable already decided upon by the Conference.

An exception would be made in favour of the European Community, whose spokesman is in the unique situation of being able to speak on behalf of the 12 member States. Similar exceptions night be made for delegates who will speak on behalf of several delegations in so far as there will be no separate statements by these governments or delegates. Since this contributes substantially to an overall reduction in the length of debate, and since this practice is followed in other organisations, it appeared to the Officers of the Conference that, as last year, it would be fair and in the interests of the Conference itself to increase the maximum length of these particular statements from seven minutes to ten minutes.

Moreover, in order to ensure that the absolute deadline of 9 p.m already fixed by the Conference is respected, the Officers of the Conference have also concluded that it should be understood that the President will periodically review this situation in the light of the number of speakers remaining on the list and that the maximum time allotted to each speech will then be recalculated according to the time remaining for the speakers still on the list.

If there is no objection to these arrangements, which have to be decided without debate by the Conference in keeping with Article 14, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders, I shall consider them adopted. I see no objections.

(It is so decided.)

I would also like to inform the Conference of certain other arrangements concerning this sitting which fall within the prerogative of the President and the Officers of the Conference but which I feel I should inform you of now in order to ensure complete clarity and to enable everyone to act accordingly.

The first has to do with the right of reply during this sitting. In order to save time, this right of reply will be granted at the end of the sitting in a global but not in a cumulative manner. This means that the limit of two minutes which had been decided on in a general manner at the beginning of the Conference for the exercise of the right of reply will not be multiplied by the number of statements to which the speaker requesting this right wishes to respond, it being understood that the President may, if time permits, allow this limit to be slightly exceeded if the reply concerns a large number of statements.

The second matter concerns the non-governmental organisations, of which five have registered for the debate but may in principle speak only with the authorisation of the Officers of the Conference. My colleagues and I have concluded that they will only be authorised to speak at the end of the sitting, in the order in which they registered and only if their speeches do not result in the Special Sitting continuing beyond 9 p.m.

May I, in conclusion, emphasise that these arrangements have been decided upon by the Officers of the Conference in the interests of consistency and objectivity and of respecting the legitimate interests of all the parties concerned with whom, moreover, there have been contacts. The arrangements are entirely in accordance with the spirit of consensus without which this Special Sitting could not take place and in full conformity with the decisions taken last year. They should contribute once again to the success of an undertaking the importance of which everyone is aware of.

Original – French : The PRESIDENT – We will now move on to the second item on the agenda which is the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Spanish : Mr RODRIGUEZ (Minister of Labour, Venezuela) – On behalf of the Government of Venezuela, I would like to congratulate the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference on his election.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General, Michel Hansenne, for the relevance and quality of his Report. In essence, we agree with his approach and proposals.

Over the last three years, across Latin America, and most particularly in recent months in Venezuela, there has been an intense debate on democratic values principles and institutions.

Around 70 per cent of the population of Venezuela is under 35 years of age ; therefore, the majority of Venezuelans were born into a democracy and an even greater majority have known no other form of government. This is perhaps why we had begun to take democracy for granted, and had no doubt that it would always endure. But after events of February of this year, we were startled and concerned to learn that democracy is something which must be won every day, that it is a system of government which must be perfected and reasserted in an ongoing process.

Another lesson we have learned is perhaps rather more painful : it is that while democracy is not just for the wealthy, but is a universal value, as the Director-General of the ILO has stated, there are times in the history of countries when material difficulties and despair can make democracy, and indeed freedom, hollow, abstract concepts.

Much of the current debate is centred on the social and political effects of the application of economic adjustment programmes aimed at fostering a market economy.

On this last point, there are those who think that the economic adjustment programme, because of its high social cost, is the only cause of all our difficulties.

We would refute this contention, and remain convinced of the need for structural change in our economy. Although we are far from a socially satisfactory situation, the economic policy has now begun to show encouraging results : the economy is growing again (9.2 per cent in 1991), our current balance of payments is showing a surplus, and the rate of unemployment has been gradually diminishing towards more manageable dimensions.

We know that the market economy is not a panacea for all our problems. However, some sectors portrayed the market as a magic wand, and thus aroused unrealistic expectations which, when dashed, served only to increase the discontent of the people.

The market is a necessary condition, but not the only one, for reaching satisfactory levels of social development. The market, by itself, cannot guarantee a solution to the problems which governments face.

In order for the market to be socially effective, it must be part of a framework of respect for the principles of solidarity and social justice.

The sense of solidarity and the ability to express it is perhaps one of the clearest distinctions between man and animal. A society shows solidarity when it expresses concern for the fate of its most vulnerable members, that is, when it protects its children, heals its sick and cares for its elderly.

The search for social justice, for its part, shows the determination of a society to move towards improved forms of organisation and coexistence. A society is fair when it offers to all its members equality of opportunity for self-fulfilment.

Without overlooking the traditional role of mediation in the social dialogue between workers and employers, and the search for tripartite consensus, we have emphasised social security, giving top priority to the development and establishment of a comprehensive system of social protection that meets the country's requirements and can serve as a practical tool to give effect to the principles of solidarity and social justice.

Furthermore, we should highlight that the importance of a comprehensive social security system does not lie solely in what has been outlined above, for one of the greatest merits of a sound system of social security is that it promotes political stability.

Alongside the introduction of a market economy, the Government of Venezuela has also introduced far-reaching changes in the political sphere with a view to improving our democratic system. The electoral reform which introduced the direct election of mayors, councillors and state governors has brought about a revolutionary change which we have yet to appreciate fully; it is a key part of our transition from an imperfectly representative democracy towards a genuinely participative democracy.

The economic, social and political changes in the country require representative institutions such as trade union organisations and employers' associations, to redefine their strategies and re-evaluate their aims. They cannot continue to act on the basis of models which, while they may have been successful in the past, are ineffective and even counter-productive under present conditions.

Last but not least, the present situation should involve a change in the internal structure of these organisations. Dominant personalities and centralisation must give way to ongoing consultation and democratic decision-making methods, as well as the encouragement of individual initiative by members of the organisations.

In general, the Venezuelan Government hopes that the ongoing process of decentralisation will serve to foster an active and participative search for methods and schemes of social organisation which are more conducive to a fairer and more fulfilling community life. In sum, we hope that Venezuelans will participate more fully in the process of decision-making which determines our present and future life. In order for the economic and political changes which the Venezuelan Government is introducing to be legitimate and viable, it is necessary that there should be tripartite consensus around them. Workers, employers and the State must agree on their validity and necessity.

We know that it is not always easy to reach an understanding with and between employers and workers because the interests of each sector, in most cases, do not overlap. However, we believe that there are circumstances where it is necessary to set aside the selfish pursuit of one's own interests in order to think of the interest of society as a whole.

Here, we would point out that the collapse of communist hegemony in the countries of Eastern Europe has taught us one important lesson: mankind must always come before ideologies, and the interests of society as a whole must come before the exclusive interests of any party, trade union or employers' organisation. When this truth is forgotten, situations arise which may for a time benefit a particular sector; but these situations, however long they last, will not last forever, and will inevitably collapse and bring down those who were benefitting at everyone else's expense.

Together with the Director-General, we welcome the end of ideological conflicts within the ILO, but we but we would like to point out the risk that the end of ideologies may suffocate idealism, and that pragmatic and selfish opportunism may replace political action which is inspired by the ideals of solidarity and social justice.

Original – Arabic: Mr. MATAR (Employers' delegate, United Arab Emirates) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. It is an honour for me to communicate to this important Conference the good wishes of the Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry of the United Arab Emirates, representing the businessmen and employers of my country. They send their greetings to participants and observers, along with the wish that their work may be crowned with success so that constructive resolutions and recommendations may be adopted which will be at the service of those engaged in the production process throughout the world.

I also wish to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference, and I congratulate also the Vice-Presidents of the three parties represented here.

I should like to take this opportunity to express our appreciation and esteem as regards the outstanding role played by the ILO, through the efforts of its Director-General and his team, to create the conditions necessary for the holding of conferences and to ensure that there is appropriate follow-up of recommendations and monitoring of their application. Indeed, such activities are in the interest of the three parties involved in the production process throughout the world.

Our federation is doing everything it can to coordinate its efforts with all parties, including the ILO, in order to assist, organise and offer guidance to the labour world, and thus permit better production, greater productivity and more creativeness among workers engaged in the production and tertiary sectors. In so doing, we try to make extensive use of the training of administrative and technical supervisory staff and our participation in the ILO's conferences and technical meetings, where the problems and challenges facing labour are studied. These meetings also serve to keep us abreast of changes in production methods and the introduction of new technologies related to them, the interdependence of such changes and employment and the way in which the world of employment adapts to these developments (i.e. equipment, production processes, etc.).

The United Arab Emirates has adopted a liberal economic policy. The State has garnered this policy and has achieved considerable success. We have seen the highest growth rates in the various social and economic activities in our country. There are no obstacles or impediments to investors, and no problems and no contradictions as regards those involved in the production process. All parties concerned work together in cooperation and harmony within the limits of the laws promulgated by the State.

The United Arab Emirates has faced serious construction needs at various stages of its development. At the time the country had record figures, leaving an obvious and tangible legacy which includes, for example, the creation of the necessary infrastructure for the national economy and the construction of major national factories and plants. These projects required, of course, the presence of a major foreign labour force and a large number of foreign specialists. Their salaries and conditions of work were highly competitive.

The State has been able to transform large areas of the desert into agricultural land, orchards and public parks, for the pleasure and benefit of our citizens and of the foreign workers who come to join us in our young State. The Emirates have guaranteed a decent standard of living for all, in the spirit of our beliefs and social traditions.

Our federation is actively involved in the development of the country, and particularly the development of training and retraining. In this connection, our federation is involved in vocational training and in administrative training in accordance with the policy of the State, which is aimed at encouraging construction and development. Our State is extremely respectful of work, and encourages its citizens by offering broad opportunities for them in the world of work. The State has indeed created many schools and vocational training centres, as well as institutes to train managers, bank personnel, and agricultural colleges, technical schools and a university. Furthermore, the State encourages students to take courses at enterprises and in factories even during their school holidays in order to ensure that they acquire the necessary knowledge and expertise for their active participation in the economy.

We in the United Arab Emirates shall continue to work very seriously to draw full benefits from the training programmes which have been developed by the International Labour Organisation, an organisation which at the international level is able to promote and develop the labour world to help it to overcome its problems.

I would like to express my thanks to the Director-General for his excellent Report which has reviewed the work of the Organisation in 1991 and has also looked ahead as regards the further development of the labour world.

Mr. EDSTROM (Workers' delegate, Sweden) – May I congratulate the President on his election. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General for choosing Democratisation and the ILO as this year's topic for plenary discussion, and I welcome his Report to this forum. The basic ILO concept of tripartism must be recognised and established everywhere and – what is an important lesson – must be fought for continuously.

In Sweden, we have had a long tradition of established practices of industrial relations. Over 80 years ago, the Supreme Court recognised the trade unions' legal capacity. In 1938, the Swedish Employers' Confederation and the Swedish Trade Union Confederation agreed upon a consensus model with the aim of finding peaceful solutions to labour conflicts. The Swedish labour market has been characterised by strong, independent workers' and employers' organisations which have actively participated in formulating economic, social and participation procedures. The virtue of this is underlined in the Report of the Director-General.

What I have described might have belonged to the past, because our new Government's policy in a number of respects is contrary to workers' interests and basic ILO concepts.

Our primary concern is the rapidly growing unemployment affecting both blue-collar and white-collar workers. Up to now, it has mostly affected male workers in the industry and building sectors. But female workers' employment in the public sector is also threatened now. In a situation like this, all three partners ought to collaborate, but instead we face a Government policy which undermines the position of the trade unions.

In Sweden, we have regulated wages (including minimum wages) and working conditions by collective agreements, not by law. The social partners have also been free to make agreements concerning supplementary income protection in case of sickness, but during 1991-92, under the former Government, the rate of remuneration was reduced by law to the first three days in case of sickness. The question of whether this violates international labour Conventions is not yet settled.

In addition, the new Government intends to lower social security standards further by taking away all economic compensation for the first two days of sickness – a proposal which both social partners have reacted against.

The Government also intends to reduce state subsidies to the unemployment insurance system and thereby increase the part being paid by the worker himself by six times. This, of course, affects certain sectors and certain workers more than others.

An important area is the working environment. A proposal has been put forward to limit the scope of what is regarded as an employment injury, for budget reasons. The effect of the proposal will be that strain injuries, which may occur after repetitive monotonous work, will not be recognised as employment injuries. This type of injury occurs most frequently among female blue-collar workers. The situation for the occupational health service in accordance with the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161) is also troublesome because it has been announced that the state subsidies, which account for approximately 50 per cent of the costs, will be abolished.

Another step by our Government is to denounce the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96). The workers' organisations have protested against this, not only because we were not informed of how the new system would function but also because we think that it is better to work for a revision of the Convention. To denounce Conventions is a wrong signal to the ILO if one would like to see changes in the Conventions.

In his Report the Director-General rightly states that " there seems to be no country on earth where a discrimination problem does not arise in one way or another ". An obvious example of this is the ambition of our Government to introduce an international ship register – a so-called second register. The aim is to employ foreign workers under conditions which are much cheaper for the employer compared to those of Swedish employees. Such a register would discriminate against foreign workers as compared to Swedish workers, restrict the freedom of collective bargaining of Swedish trade unions and be a valid reason for dismissal of Swedish nationals working on Swedish ships.

Even legal regulations that are mandatory on the Swedish labour market will not be applicable on those types of ships.

One week ago the proposal seemed to be withdrawn but recent information cast this into doubt. I urge the competent ILO bodies to deal with the problem as soon as possible in order to prevent more countries from following this road of competition by means of social dumping and infringing international labour Conventions.

Tripartite consultation and participation are essential elements in democratic societies and in working life. I regret that our Government's policy is contrary to what the Director-General regards as essential, namely to involve the social partners in shaping the common destiny. The Swedish trade union representatives will now be thrown out from various social bodies. Even our representation on the Swedish Labour Market Board is questioned. I do not believe that this would promote a more democratic working life or a smoother functioning of the labour market.

I hope that all countries and governments understand the value of the international labour standards developed in the ILO during more than 70 years.

Original – French: Mr. LOUA (Minister of Administrative Reform, Public Service and Labour, Guinea) – I would like first and foremost to offer the President and the Officers of the Conference warmest congratulations on behalf of the Guinea delegation on their brilliant election at this the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation is convinced that our session will benefit from your outstanding qualities and your great experience and enjoy great success.

I would now also like to congratulate the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO on the quality of the Reports which be submitted to us and on the rich harvest of tasks which have been carried out since the 78th Session, during a period which saw the emergence of an era of great freedom and countries moving closer and closer to a market economy.

This means that the Report of the Director-General Democratisation and the ILO is most timely and tallies perfectly with realities of the present time. It also invites the member States of the ILO to reflect on their needs with regard to assistance and cooperation with the Organisation in the framework of their efforts to build new societies based on freedom, democracy and justice.

On a subject that has been of interest to thinkers and politicians for many years, the Director-General shed new light, further enriched by new decades of the experience of our Organisation. He defines the contours and requirements of a democratic State, the primacy of law, respect for human rights and the law, freedom and equality for all, etc. We thus see the dynamic and energising path to be followed, working towards the concepts of democracy, rights, freedom, justice and others which have constituted since time immemorial a legitimate motive for the struggle of peoples deprived of such rights.

In Guinea the creation of a second Republic on 3 April 1984 has recognised and restored respect for human rights, as proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) and implemented by specific Conventions of your Organisation. In the light of the adoption of liberalism in Guinea in the field of economic development, our Government has undertaken to recreate a modern State by freeing it from the concerns of production and the direct marketing of goods and services, by encouraging private initiative in creating a State based on the rule of law recognising the right to property and of enterprise. For this purpose, a whole series of new legislation has emerged in all sectors of national life, culminating in the drafting and adoption of the fundamental law in December 1990, supplemented in 1991 by organic laws relating, in particular, to the independence of judicial power, freedom of the press, the electoral code and the creation and functioning of political parties. In these provisions, the fundamental law has enshrined democratic choice with regard to politics, trade unions and the press. As far as industrial relations and the right to work are concerned, it has reconfirmed provisions contained in the new Labour Code, drawn up with the technical cooperation of the ILO and adopted back in 1988. Moreover, it is with satisfaction that we can note today the existence of some ten newspapers, independent of the Government, and the commitment of about 40 political parties to publicising their various programmes, in preparation for the elections to be held at the end of this year.

All these political and legal concepts exist within a difficult socio-economic framework that measures of structural adjustment have not always improved. Economic recovery is dragging its feet. Unemployment is on the increase, especially for young people, students, and also for personnel who have lost their jobs in the public service. Credit for productive investment is inexistent, out of reach for small producers. So, many people fail to understand the meaning and scope of measures taken in the interests of economic recovery, including privatisation of public enterprises. Those who have a job in the modern or the informal sector claim – in the light of the increase in the cost of living and inflation – an increase in their wages, even resorting to strikes, especially when dialogue is deafening by its silence.

All these realities besetting the Government are spurring us on to rethink labour relations and procedures and consequently also to ask more assistance of the ILO with a view to implementing the structures for consultation with social partners to train economic agents in the spirit of the enterprise in managing their businesses and intensifying the workers' training with a view to strengthening the tripartitism which is just beginning to emerge.

The protection of workers which is not the least of our worries must in the light of recent experience linked with the closing down of public enterprises be reconsidered, covering also workers in the informal sectors and self-employed workers. The help of the ILO will be of great use not only in finding the policies to create new jobs but also to halt the rise in inflation, even bring it down gradually and help us to improve implementation of ratified standards and guarantee stimulating conditions in the field of work and life.

In all these areas and in many others fruitful cooperation with local social partners and international technical cooperation in particular with the ILO and UNDP are really indeed precious and indispensable additions to public action.

The agenda of our Session covers also other questions of great interest for my delegation, in particular the question of protecting workers' claims in the event the insolvency of their employers. Here, my county has positively revised its legislation to support the adoption of an international Convention.

We hope that the provisions of such a Convention will also cover public establishments. The question of the prevention of industrial disasters is also under discussion and we hope this will lead to appropriate standards being drawn up with a view to better guarantees of safety at work and for the population and also give better protection to the environment and natural wealth.

Human resources development within the context of structural adjustment which our countries are undergoing today is of particular interest to us and continuous action is being taken in consultation with all partners involved in social and economic development.

Training young people for jobs required by enterprises and providing further re-training are aspects which prepare for better management and exploitation of our human resources – the most reliable resources available in our country whose budgetary capacities are falling far short of what is needed.

In this area, where its experience is at its greatest, our Organisation is perfectly placed to help its member States.

At the end of our intervention, our hopes are high. The common reflection started on such important questions will inspire us more and more to develop the working population in our various states engaged in the struggle for a better future, for safer working and living conditions and in a climate of true peace and democracy.

Original – French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – Allow me first to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the Presidency. I am speaking today as a delegate of the French employers and I am happy to confirm the solid links of friendship and cooperation uniting the enterprises of our countries.

"Democracy always has been, and still is, the instrument of freedom." This statement by the Director-General may sound surprising. Tocqueville predicted that the development of democracy might be at the expense of freedom – or rather of freedoms. The first gesture of countries which have rid themselves of democracy has frequently been to shed the adjective "democratic", added to the official name of the State. How many crimes have been committed in the name of democracy.

The Report of the Director-General dispels this first impression. Democracy in his view is not defined by the existence of an elected assembly but by a complex network of institutions making it possible for the citizens to participate effectively by the autonomy of enterprises in a market economy, the setting of limits to the functions of the State and the effective guarantee of the exercise of public freedoms – and in our particular field, freedom of association for employers and for workers.

On pages 22 and 23 of his Report the Director-General perceives three broard areas of ILO action in this respect: (1) respect for fundamental human rights; (2) encouragement of a market economy with a social dimension; (3) strengthening of tripartism.

Human rights first. By definition, I believe these to imply the rights of one man and one woman. These rights therefore take precedence over those of a group, whichever it may be. Collective rights exist only if they stem out of the free exercise of the right of association.

Tocqueville, once again, said that democracy functions better from the bottom to the top than from the top to the bottom. The so-called unions which act as a conveyor belt between the power – the Stahe – or single party – and the citizen – or subject – are the opposite of the right of association. The citizen on the other hand participates all the better in power if his action is relayed by that of groups which he himself has constituted out of his own volition and if there is an "art" of association, so dear to Tocqueville.

This is why freedom of association – freedom of trade unions in the context of the labour world – should be the crux of the IIO's strategy in the field of human rights. The right of employers and workers to establish organisations of their own choosing, in the sense of Article 2 of our Convention 87, gives these organisations, the best tool for resisting powers.

The main gauge for the respect of the spirit of freedom of association is the possibility for these organisations to be representative, that is to be founded upon the freely expressed choice of the individuals and to be autonomous – in other words, to express the will of their members, even if these disturb political power.

Thus freedom of association remains the guarantee of the most basic of our freedoms, freedom of speech, the one which appeared at the dawn of democracy. In the "Phoenician Women" by Euripides, Jocasta asks her son what he felt was hardest to bear in his condition of exile. The reply is clear : "The worst of all is that there is no freedom of speech." Jocasta concludes : "The fate of a slave is not to be able to say what he thinks."

The second field is just as important. Market economies are based upon a realignment of the role of the State towards its functions of arbiter and trustee of the general interest and the free interplay of the economic and social actors within the respect of rules which do not break the spirit of initiative. This market economy is social because it contains the limits intended for the protection of the weakest and also because it is based upon the free choice of men and thus encourages their individual responsibility.

The market has proved to be the method of economic organisation best suited to decentralised democracy and to the optimum management for modern economies. These require personal efforts, spurred on by the tough law of competition, and committing man in his totality.

A political system based on man – that is, democracy in the fullest sense of the word – therefore has affinities with the most advanced systems of the management of human resources in the enterprises, and allows for economic development, without which it would be vain to try to fight against poverty, the most serious danger threatening human rights.

The development of enterprises, and of the spirit of enterprises, is therefore at the crux of the ILO's mandate in its fight against poverty and in favour of employment.

Tripartism finally. This word, according to the excellent formulation of the Director-General, means " any system of labour relations in which the State, employers and workers are autonomous parties, each performing specific functions".

I would like to insist on the word "specific". We must not, indeed, confuse tripartism and corporatism. The sovereignty of the State, and in particular that of the legislative power, cannot be questioned. On the other hand, it is up to the employers and the workers, directly or through their representative organisations, to negotiate freely the terms of their contractual relations within the framework of the laws and under the supervision of judicial institutions.

However, if each of the components of tripartism bears a specific responsibility, consultation within the respect of the diversities is necessary because it enables the citizen, whether employer or worker, to understand the major economic and social options and to participate in their elaboration.

In France we practice freedom of choice and of expression, sometimes to the extreme. We love our diversity, but I think that I can state that there is a very broad consensus with respect to certain basic principles. Dialogue is recorded in our constitutional institutions, in particular through our Economic and Social Council, but even more so in practice. Our system of collective bargaining, which takes place at three levels national, branch and enterprise level makes it possible to tackle realities closely.

France, I am sure, is not a model, but it certainly is an experience. The greatest contribution the ILO can make to democratisation is no doubt to present and to confront these experiences, and to prepare the free organisations of employers and workers to fulfil the essential role they hold in a free society in favour of social development.

In every country, governments and the independent social actors must construct their own tripartism as well as their own democracy. This is a time-consuming process which will never be finished. The ILO must be the catalyser of this slow mutation and act as the humble servant of all these constituents in the accomplishment of their task.

Dr. HEPTONSTALL (representative of Soroptimist International) – First of all, I wish to join previous speakers in congratulating the President and all the other Officers of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference on their election.

It is an honour and a pleasure to take the floor as a representative for Soroptimist International. Ours is an international professional women's organisation, active in 98 countries and territories worldwide. We undertake service and local community programmes concerned with economic and social development at the grass roots level. Among the many new groups recently founded in all regions of the world, we have members in Bulgaria, Estonia, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Romania and the Russian Federation.

As Convenor of the non-governmental organisation Working Group on Women and Employment, I am also closely associated with the following organisations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council: the Associated Country Women of the World, Zonta International, the International Alliance of Women, the International Council of Women, Socialist International Women, the International Council on Social Welfare, the International Council of Jewish Women, the International Federation of University Women, the World Union of Catholic Women's Organisations, the World Federation of Methodist Women, the International Council on Aging, the Medical Women's International Association and the American Association of Retired Persons.

Reading the Director-General's annual Report to the 1992 Session of the Conference, Democratisation and the ILO, has been a matter of keen interest to us all. The Director-General highlights the central issue as follows: "How can the ILO, within its sphere of competence, help States to respond to the legitimate aspirations of their citizens?" The Report raises many new questions, but we are also happy to see that it maintains continuity with its predecessor of 1991 which focused on the needs of workers in the informal sector for the first time in the history of the ILO. We welcome the Director-General's remark that "the rural sector and the informal sector should remain priority areas for ILO action".

We therefore call on the delegates present to maintain this concern for all citizens, to utilise fully the experience of the International Labour Office to develop concepts of economic activity covering both the formal and the informal sector and, in so doing, to take account of household production and the economic contribution of care-givers.

Given the current turbulence in world affairs, there are no clear cut-answers as to how to respond to the legitimate aspirations of the people. No simple solutions that, once applied, will result in a successful conclusion to the need for economic restructuring. This need affects virtually all countries, whether they be in transition, are developing or even industrialised. It is important to recognise the multi-faceted nature of the problem. We therefore congratulate the ILO on "the efforts made (...) in the field of structural adjustment policies (...) to win acceptance of the principle that social objectives are of cardinal importance, and that they must be taken into account if economic restructuring is truly to lead to sustainable growth". We welcome the search for alternative structural adjustment policies and the ILO's current examination of the social effects of these policies, in particular on the promotion of employment and adequate incomes, access to education and training, and the reduction of poverty.

As members of non-governmental organisations concerned with building a just society, structural adjustment and democratisation are of special concern to us. While the current changes offer new opportunities for women, they can also mean new disadvantages if planners and policy-makers lose sight of the social objectives noted above. Women can find themselves marginalised if, for example, in the transition process from a planned economy to a free – market economy, services essential to supporting women's double role in society become either unaffordable or unavailable. The result is that men, women and children, that is families, are open to a number of risks: family benefits being reduced or eliminated, health care being restricted, fewer educational opportunities being available, increased poverty. Moreover, since women tend to be clustered in low-paid employment in the formal sector, they have a greater chance of being the first to lose their job. Finally, at older ages men and women can find the purchasing power of their meagre old-age and survivors' pensions severely eroded by inflation.

When making decisions involved in the structural adjustment process, a truly democratic society calls for special care to be directed to those least able to defend themselves. We therefore welcome the Director-General's recognition of this fact : "Help will also be needed in the planning of the policies and programmes that mitigate the social costs in times of transition and that protect those in the most difficult circumstances."

As underlined in the Report, one of the major considerations must be the provision of a basic social safety net, an issue that requires a new approach. The members of the non-governmental organisation Working Group on Women and Employment entirely agree with the Director-General's remark that "(...)social security is still too closely tied to the concept of employment and contribution (...). What should be promoted instead is an idea of social protection covering the entire population."

In developed countries, where fully evolved schemes for social security exist, men still predominate in the primary employment market, despite increasing opportunities for women. This means that when social security is exclusively tied to employment and earnings-related contributions in the paid sector, women in the secondary labour market and the informal sector are seriously disadvantaged.

In many countries, particularly those in transition and those rapidly industrialising, informal systems of social security based on the family can often no longer be relied on and women and children are the ones who suffer most. Even in many developing countries, where family care has been the norm in the past, traditional family patterns are undergoing rapid social change and these support systems are being disrupted.The ILO has researched and documented the problem in Women and social security: Progress towards equality of treatment. The development of international standards is fundamental to the activities of the ILO, and the Organisation has been in the forefront of the move to ensure human rights for women through equality between men and women in employment and occupation. Can we now, therefore, look to the ILO's tripartite system for progress – to move the issue of equal treatment and, I may add, of equitable treatment, of women and men under social security to greater policy implementation?

Discrimination has no place in democracy. It is a violation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and yet remains a sad fact of life. Overcoming discrimination calls for targeting vulnerable groups and the Director-General cautions that "despite progress made in certain areas" discrimination remains a major obstacle to carrying out the aims and purposes of the ILO, and programmes targeted on the needs of women remain essential. Therefore, it is not surprising to find women listed with young persons, old persons, the disabled, unemployed persons and migrant workers as in special need of education and training. These categories, however, are not mutually exclusive and may often engender double discrimination as, for example, in the case of elderly women. It must be underlined that men and women in equal measure comprise the world's population and that democracy, development and human rights relate to all.

A major obstacle to economic development everywhere lies in the pervasive discrimination that women still attract despite the important progress that has been made in this area. It is, after all, non-productive and financially wasteful to train women or any other member of a targeted group if, subsequently, they are not given adequate opportunities for employment and promotion in the market place. More and better programmes are required for special groups but discrimination continues to block the path to success, as the Director-General has made clear. As long as it does so, discrimination equally blocks access to a world less beset by poverty and hunger.

Mr. COWEN (Minister for Labour, Ireland) - May I begin by joining with other speakers in congratulating you the President on his election and in wishing him and his Vice-Presidents every success in their important work.

Our distinguished Director-General has focused attention in his Report on the opportunity which changes in the world's political climate present for a renewal and a reassertion of the fundamental aims and purposes of the International Labour Organisation.

An entirely new political landscape has been established in Europe in the past few years. The new situation presents great challenges and great opportunities. Much has already been done in forums, such as the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), but clearly this important work is far from finished. The political transformation is accompanied by – and, indeed, closely connected with – unprecedented changes in the economic area as the transition from rigid central planning to systems based on the market takes place. But under conditions of democracy, it is evident that the free market economy should be more than a free-floating system of the kind associated with classical laissez-faire theory.

The transition to the market economy must go further than building up a supportive infrastructure of democratically controlled legal and financial institutions. To ensure that the reform process does not lose momentum, a pluralistic approach in political and administrative life is required. Tripartite cooperation between employers' organisations, trade unions and governments is essential in sustaining reform. The transformation is, however, a most arduous one. The euphoria of the first days of democracy in Central and Eastern Europe has now given way to a realisation of the scale of the undertaking and to an acknowledgement that a considerable length of time will be needed for its completion.

The mobilisation of support at the international level is vital to sustain the processes of political and economic change. It is only at the international level that sufficient resources can be assembled and delivered in a coordinated way that will maximise their impact. It also provides a strong signal of collective international concern and of a desire to integrate the new democracies fully and as quickly as possible into the multilateral economic system.

In the light of its membership and of the expertise it has developed, the International Labour Organisation has a vital part to play in this process. I would like to take this opportunity to express our appreciation for the excellent work that the ILO is carrying out in the newly democratic countries.

Ireland as a newly independent State made its first formal entry into international affairs through its membership of the International Labour Organisation. We have also had direct experience of the valuable assistance which the ILO can make available not only in relation to the development of strong, representative and independent organisations of workers and employers but of social policy generally.

Ireland shares the widespread desire to contribute in a practical way to the establishment of peace, prosperity and stability on the continent through support for political and economic reform in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. Our effort is integrated with that of our partners in the European Community which has a special responsibility of its perceived role as a centre of stability in Europe.

The Community's PHARE programme of technical assistance for Central and Eastern Europe is going from strength to strength, and is coordinated with wider efforts through the Group of 24 mechanism, with which the International Labour Organisation is associated. Substantial, indeed exceptional, balance-of-payments assistance has been extended by the European Community to a number of States in the region. The Community itself and its member States, including Ireland, are founder members of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, an institution which we believe has enormous potential in tackling the challenges of developing infrastructure, promoting the restructuring of enterprises and creating employment. Contractual ties are of great importance at this juncture and Ireland, in common with its partners, will this year ratify the association agreements which the European Community has negotiated with Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

We will work for their full and effective implementation and look forward to the completion of similar links with other countries in the region. On a bilateral basis. I have also been directly involved in confirming a joint agreement on aspects of labour cooperation between Hungary and Ireland. I believe that our commitment to a tripartite partnership as the key to transforming Irish society and improving our standards of living and social equity has been a positive factor in helping us forge such cooperative links.

In Ireland we have, on the basis of a partnership between Government and the principal economic and social partners, fundamentally altered our approach to managing our national affairs. This has enabled us to put in place macroeconomic policies geared to low inflation and lower interest rates, together with a programme of major structural reform designed to generate new employment and reduce long-term unemployment and involuntary emigration. This tripartite partnership has endorsed a long-term strategy which also includes as its key objectives: the development of greater social rights within our health, education, social welfare and housing services; the promotion of collective and individual social responsibility in relation to the discharge of tax liabilities, fair conduct and business dealings, the sensible treatment of the environment and the reasonable use of public services; and, thirdly, the development of worker participation and women's rights.

There is a shared recognition on all sides that these objectives must be met in the context of very radical changes now taking place in the international economic environment.

The end of the cold war presents this Organisation with an opportunity to reaffirm its purpose and its mission. The historic Declaration of Philadelphia, adopted towards the end of the Second World War, marked a radical departure by proclaiming that social progress should never again be subordinated to the supposedly natural workings of market forces. The situation of those countries in the throes of transition from centrally to market-oriented economies is a new challenge. I congratulate the Director-General for his Report to this session of the Conference. By linking the issues of human rights, democracy and development, he has outlined how the Conference and the Office, especially through the ILO's active programmes, can help member States to regenerate their economies and promote social justice.

Thank you for this opportunity to address such a distinguished audience this morning, and I would like to wish the Director-General and his staff and the Organisation as a whole every success in the coming years.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity) – Please permit me, on behalf of African workers and the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, to congratulate the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference on his well-deserved election.

I would also like to express our sincere appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for his excellent reports. In particular, the choice of democratisation as the theme of this year's session is of particular importance to us in Africa.

The wind of democracy is also blowing across Africa and African workers and peoples have warmly welcomed this invigorating development. African workers have not only contributed to the initiation of the democratic process in Africa, but they have also been insisting that African democracy should be based on popular participation: empowerment of the people; accountability; social and economic justice; respect for human and trade union rights; and the rule of law – in conformity with the African Charter for Popular Participation in Development and Transformation (Arusha, 1990), which the African Heads of State and Government adopted at the Addis Ababa Summit in July 1990. Therefore, any type of democracy that does not contain the above-named cardinal objectives, will be an alien democracy and, as such, not welcomed in Africa. That brand of democracy will disempower the African peoples, perpetuate social and economic injustice, increase poverty among the vast majority of our peoples and cause social instability. That brand of democracy will then be "government of the rich, by the rich, for the rich, on behalf of the people". We do not accept that.

African workers and the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity agree with the Director-General's assertion that " the law of the market cannot be the law of the jungle. The law of the market should point the way to prosperity for all, for the aspiration for a free society has not eclipsed the desire for a just society " . It is our view that the neo-liberal economic philosophy of greed, selfishness and insensivity, which is presently pursued by a few minorities, will neither bring prosperity for all, nor ensure a just society.

The Director-General said in his Report that the objective of the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade is to " help provide an environment that supports the evolution everywhere of political systems based on consent and respect for human rights, as well as social and economic rights, and of systems of justice that protect all citizens " . May I ask if the United Nations and its agencies will protect the social and economic rights of all peoples and all countries in this decade of the 1990s ? I ask the question because the social and economic rights of most Third World countries, especially in Africa, were not protected by some United Nations agencies in the decade of the 1980s. This gross lack of protection is manifested in : (1) The injustice in international trade against the developing countries. For example, it is estimated by O. Knudsen, that African countries will suffer a net loss of about US$ 3,000 million annually as a result of the Uruguay Round of GATT (2) The imposition of neo-liberal, anti-people conditionalities by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank, on African countries in their orthodox structural adjustment programmes.

With more than 34 African countries adopting, through blackmail, the orthodox structural adjustment programmes of the IMF and the World Bank, poverty has increased among the majority of African people, so have unemployment and illiteracy. These have increased social injustice and brought political instability to many African countries.

In spite of mistakes, which even the President of the World Bank himself admitted that the World Bank made in its orthodox structural adjustment programmes, the Bank and the IMF have consistently refused to support the African Alternative Framework to Structural Adjustment Programmes for Socio-Economic Recovery and Transformation – otherwise known as AAF-SAP – as a basis for the design of structural adjustment programmes in each African country.

Are the IMF and the World Bank respecting the economic rights of African countries ?

We, African workers and trade unions, maintain that there can be no democracy without social and economic justice, both at the national and international levels. The right of countries to their economic and development paths is as fundamental and inalienable as human rights are to individuals. This right should therefore be protected, enforced and defended by the international community, the United Nations and its agencies, including the ILO.

In the light of the difficult economic and political transition which African countries are presently passing through, and the key role African workers and the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity are playing in that process, we call on the Director-General to assist African workers and the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity in capacity building and human resources development.

In the area of capacity building, we want the ILO to provide assistance for equipment like computers, audio-visual aids, and books to enhance the research and education capabilities of African trade unions.

In the area of human resources development, we want more intensive workers' education programmes with the ILO Workers' Education Branch in the areas of international labour standards, health and safety, cooperatives, development studies, investment of trade union funds, trade union administration, employment, project design and environment, and through fellowships.

The development of human resources and capacity of African workers and trade unions will be an important contribution of the ILO to the democratisation process in Africa.

The ILO should be actively involved with the IMF and the World Bank in the design of structural adjustment programmes, and should participate in IMF and World Bank missions connected with the structural adjustment programmes, especially in the developing countries. The present arrangement, whereby the two Bretton Woods institutions involve the ILO after their structural adjustment programmes have caused devastating social and economic destruction, is not in the interest of the developing countries. We want the ILO to prevent the social and economic fires caused by the IMF and the World Bank, and not to act as their fire brigade, as it is doing at the moment. The ILO should be " the devil's advocate " for the two institutions.

I would like to conclude my speech by expressing our appreciation and gratitude to the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and all his Officers and staff for their cooperation and assistance to our members. The Assistant Director-General in charge of ILO activities in Africa, Mr. Faisal Abdel-Rahman, has been particularly helpful and instrumental in the transformation of the Organisation of African Unity Labour Commission into a tripartite commission.

Original – French: Mr. BREHOI (Government delegate, Romania) – Allow me, on behalf of the Romanian delegation, to extend to the President our warm greetings and our cordial and sincere congratulations on the constructive discussions which are taking place under his presidency.

The Report of the Director-General Democratisation and the ILO gives me an opportunity to report on the experience of my country, Romania, a country which is now in the throes of radical and democratic transformation, directly reflected in labour legislation and social protection issues.

The path which we have followed since the historic act of December 1989 has seen, apart from the new Constitution, the elaboration and the implementation of fundamental standards which have had mayor social and economic consequences, such as the transformation of State enterprises into commercial autonomous companies ensuring the effective transition towards privatisation of industry and agriculture.

In this respect, I would like to emphasise from the outset that Romania has enjoyed the permanent and continuing assistance of the International Labour Organisation in the preparation of new standards. The accumulated experience of this important Organisation, the vast documentation to which we frequently refer, and the periodic consultations with ILO experts are all elements which fully reflect the implementation of the ideas expressed by the Director-General in his excellent Report.

To this should be added the fact that there are now before Parliament three Conventions for ratification: the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144); the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98); and the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988 (No. 168).

Allow me now to summarise the changes which have taken place in the labour legislation and social protection schemes in our country. We can say that at present our labour legislation is undergoing radical change. In practical terms, what we have done is to draw up and adopt absolutely new laws and regulations relating to the market economy and which well govern the subject of labour relations.

The complex process of the transformation and democratisation of all our labour legislation may perhaps be best characterised if we understand that at a preliminary stage some standards were abrogated which contained regulations which were restrictive and anti-democratic and were contrary to the spirit of certain international labour Conventions. These were then replaced by provisions to remedy the situation. At a second stage, which is now underway, we have already adopted or are in the process of preparing further new regulations which will modify from a structural point of view the entire system of labour relations, establishing a new legal order based on freedom and the equality of social partners , the workers and employers. This series of regulations appropriate and pertinent to the market economy, has its roots in the legislation and the traditions of Romanian legislation which prevailed between the two World Wars, highlighting the experience of the ILO and that of other countries with long experience with market economy systems. Some of these standards and regulations are real innovations so far as Romania is concerned.

Among the legislation which has been adopted, I would like to emphasise the importance of the Act respecting collective bargaining because it is the tool which well provide have recourse to legal practice to interpret former labour legislation. It also represents the "pivotal" law around which we are now structuring and developing our new legislation. Thus the Wages Act, the Act respecting the settlement of collective labour disputes and the exercise of the right to strike and the Act respecting paid leave follow the concept of affirming the principle of collective bargaining.

The implementation of collective bargaining would not be possible without the Act respecting trade unions. And so, in order to have a full picture of the new Romanian legislation in the field of labour legislation, mention should also be made of the Act respecting the employment of workers based on their skills and the Act respecting the social protection of unemployed persons.

A decisive role in this development of regulations governing labour relations in Romania has been played by the provisions of Title II of the Romanian Constitution which came into force last December, concerning the basic rights, freedoms and duties of citizens. Among these fundamental rights are those which will have direct incidence on labour legislation: freedom before the law, freedom of movement, the righ to education and training, the right to health protection, the social protection of labour, the prohibition of forced labour, the right to strike, the protection of private property, the protection of children and young people and the protection of disabled persons.

From what I have stated, you can see how very complex are the problems of labour legislation, particularly since all this is still in the process of transformation and renewal. The process of the radical transformation of our labour legislation will be completed by the end of this year when it is planned that the Act respecting individual employment contracts will be adopted, as well as the legislation on the legal responsibilities of worker's labour jurisdiction, as well as the status of civil servants.

At the same time, new important structures for the development of labour relations will be created, such as the Social Policy Council which is responsible for the application under our legislation of Convention No. 144.

As of next year, it is anticipated that there will be a real transition towards the complex process of systematising labour legislation in a new Labour Code and probably, for the very first time in our history, a Social Protection Code.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABDEL HAK (Minister of Manpower and Training, Egypt) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I would like to start by congratulating Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are sure that the work of this Session – in which we are placing all our hopes that we shall attain comprehension, cooperation and justice for workers and peoples throughout the world – will, thanks to his wisdom, devotion and abilities, be crowned with success.

I have read closely the Report of the Director-General, Democratisation and the ILO. We agree with him that social justice is the main objective of our Organisation and that true democracy is vital for the setting up of social justice, tripartism, the application of basic international labour standards, the respect of basic human rights, freedom of association and the elimination of all forms of discrimination. At this point, I would like to say that Egypt is one of the member States that has ratified – and committed itself to applying – the most international conventions concerning basic human rights; furthermore, it is working, in cooperation with the International Labour Organisation, to amend its labour legislation and bring it in line with the new economic situation arising from structural adjustment and from the extension of the private sector and market economy – while totally respecting its international obligations and international labour standards.

In this respect, we agree with the Director-General when he says in his Report that when drafting international Conventions and Recommendations, care should be taken to ensure they are flexible enough to allow member States, without too many difficulties, to fulfil their commitments and apply the provisions in these instruments; it goes without saying that this flexibility should not in any way undermine their basic objectives.

As regards freedom of association I should like to point out that in October 1991, trade union elections were held at all levels, in accordance with the law and under judicial supervision.

In order to strengthen trade union participation to allow unions to play a role within enterprises, the Egyptian legislation on enterprises in the public sector stipulates that trade unions must sit on administrative councils of "holding" companies and their branch offices, because these councils establish the regulations and fix the working conditions in these enterprises.

In the Conclusion to his Report on democratisation, the Director-General mentions the issues to which the Office proposes giving priority in its forthcoming programme of action: democratisation; assistance in the war against poverty and the promotion of workers' protection. The document submitted by the Director-General to the 252nd February–March 1992 Session of the Governing Body contained the guidelines for the Programme and Budget Proposals for 1994-95, as well as the Director-General's estimates on the funding of this programme. We support these proposals and are pleased that the social partners have achieved consensus on these issues which are inter-related. They require the assistance of the ILO in the regions and a greater decentralisation of technical cooperation activities. We would be happy if the city of Cairo, in which the Organisation's Regional Office is situated, could welcome one of the four working groups the Director-General intends setting up in Africa; not only because of its geographical situation but also because we have decided to grant all the necessary facilities to this working group, both from the standpoints of transport and communications.

In his Report, the Director-General devotes considerable attention to the struggle against discrimination and equality of opportunity and treatment in employment. We agree with him that these issues are vital and inextricably linked with the ILO's objectives and Constitution. We welcome the efforts to promote equality of opportunity and treatment of migrant workers and their families; however, we hope that this problem will give rise to a global solution that sets out to eliminate discrimination against migrant workers in the countries of immigation – and not only discrimination as regards working conditions. They should also be able to enjoy their rights and be ensured that their claims are met when they terminate their service or contracts in the countries having welcomed them.

We in Egypt, given that we are one of the countries whose workers were most affected by the Gulf War, hope that the International Labour Organisation will play a role in helping our workers recover their debts and claims – estimated at several billions of dollars.

The workers who suffered as a result of the Gulf War – from whatever country – hope that the Organisation will play an active role in this respect. Nobody denies the social injustice inflicted – and still being inflicted – on these workers; but no progress has been made towards enabling emigrant workers to recover their claims, rights and compensation for damages. We already stated at your Conference, at its 78th Session in June 1991, that it was time that the ILO took the measures it considered necessary, in cooperation with the compensation fund of the Security Council, to ensure that emigrant workers obtained all their rights and debts and that they should be guaranteed justice and equality in their working conditions in line with international labour standards. We hope that the ILO will start to take the necessary steps in this area so that these workers may no longer find themselves in this situation.

We highly appreciate the ILO's efforts and role in drawing up and implementing training and further training programmes, so vital for economic growth. Indeed, the developing countries, more particularly the African countries, are confronted today – more than ever – with many problems linked to programmes of economic reform and structural adjustment; the most serious of these are unemployment, inflation and the foreign debt. It is for this reason that the Organisation should increase its technical assistance to educational and training programmes linked to the policies of these countries in the areas of employment and development in general. We believe that the solution to these problems in job creation and an increase in revenues in the rural and informal sectors – as well as in the establishment and implementation of labour-intensive programmes and the development of local resources to create jobs locally.

We commend highly the ILO's activities in its struggle against apartheid, as they are reflected in the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa. This Report analyses the latest developments and most recent measures taken by the ILO and other international organisations to overcome apartheid; and we hope that progress will be achieved in this area over the next few years so that all forms of racial discrimination and apartheid will be eliminated once and for all.

I have no need to repeat Egypt's unaltered position towards the policy of apartheid. Egypt has approved all the resolutions taken to support the struggle of the peoples against racial discrimination in South Africa – in the same way that it supports the front-line States in the defence of their sovereignty. Allow me to greet the representatives of workers and liberation movements from South Africa, who are struggling to dismantle the system of racial discrimination. I urge the international community to encourage dialogue in South Africa with a view to setting up a provisional government and establishing the foundations of a new non-racial society, in which all citizens will enjoy equality of rights and duties. In order to obtain this objective, we believe that we should continue putting pressure on the Government of South Africa; we also hope that the ILO will step up its technical assistance to southern Africa to support the Black majority, thus eliminating apartheid.

We welcome Albania, Estonia, Lithuania, Latvia and the Republic of Korea to the International Labour Organisation and congratulate them and their peoples for having succeeded in winning democracy and freedom.

We believe that these new member States bear witness to the ILO's vital role to promote social justice within the international community.

Mr. AHMED (Government delegate, Ethiopia) – On behalf of the delegation of the transitional Government of Ethiopia and on my own behalf, I would like to congratulate the President upon his election to preside over this august assembly. I am also fortunate to be able to address this august assembly as the first delegate of the Transitional Government of Ethiopia.

My delegation has noted that the Report of the Director-General to this year's Conference consists of two parts: Part I on Democratisation and the ILO, and Part II, covering the activities of the ILO during 1991.

In part I, which contains the central theme for this year's Conference, the Report has given a very comprehensive account of the topic in the light of the changes currently being experienced by various countries in their determination to establish genuine democracy.

Indeed, democratisation is not new for the ILO since, as the Director-General rightly puts it, its values have been enshrined in the Organisation's Constitution since its earliest days. But what is new about it is that its seeds are bearing fruit in its constituencies. And hence, we firmly believe that the ILO has a tremendous role to play to strengthen it. Today, our world is witnessing a profound change in international relations as an outcome of the democratisation process. Confrontation is giving way to cooperation. Peoples are rising up for the preservation of their basic rights, freedom and participation in the social, political and economic life of their country. The wind of change sweeping across the continents is creating an opportune moment for the promotion of the spirit of tripartism. Although free and independent, all the social partners have one lofty ideal to uphold, the betterment of the conditions of their people through dialogue, consultation and negociation in a time of difficult economic conditions.

Ethiopia is today ushering in a new era of peace and democracy. Decades of war that consumed hundreds of thousands of our youth and did irreparable damage to our national economy are at last over. The historic conference that was convened by the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front, after crushing the Military Junta from power in July 1991, in which a wide range of domestic, political and ethnic groups were represented, and some organisations from abroad also took part, ended by adopting a National Charter embodying principles for the reconstruction of the Ethiopian Government and society along democratic lines. Among the most significant results of the July Conference was the endorsement of the National Charter which incorporates the United Nations Covenants on Human Rights and the OAU's African Charter on Peoples and Human Rights. The Conference made the endorsement in the realisation that respect for human rights is the foundation of peace and democracy. The right of nations and nationalities to self-determination was also endorsed. Freedom of speech, press, assembly and association is being observed in so far as possible in a country that has never had any experience of democracy. In general, democracy is triumphing in Ethiopia. Our past has prepared us for it, and our present makes it inevitable.

On the economic front, the Transitional Government has adopted a realistic, modest and pragmatic new economic policy to deal with a national economy left a shambles due to unrealistic policies and the Military Junta's obsession with central planning and uncritical imitation of foreign economic models. The new economic policy thus attempts to provide various incentives to encourage domestic and private investments. As government resources were severely depleted, economic recovery is believed to rely largely on private sources to reactivate industries, stimulate the market, revive the devastated farm sector and overcome the shortage of raw materials. With a favourable political climate prevailing, there is a high expectation that the national economy will benefit from such a turn of events. However, as you all know, a country just emerging from decades of war cannot overcome alone all the obstacles placed in its way. Hence, the significance of international assistance is beyond any doubt in this regard.

At the moment, our country has given priority to reconstruction of war-damaged areas and to the rehabilitation of more than a quarter of a million demobilised soldiers, displaced persons and returnees from neighbouring countries who fled the country on account of political repression and persecution.

In the labour field a Draft Labour Law is under consideration by the Council of Ministers and will soon be presented to the Council of Representatives for approval. To mention the major highlights of the new Labour Law, employers and workers can form their own association of their own choosing without any public interference. Gone are the days when, under the Military Junta's regime, the Ethiopian trade union was a wing of the governing political party. The new labour law has also fully incorporated the basic provisions of those international labour standards to which we are a party. International labour standards that are not ratified by my country were also referred to as guiding principles in the new Labour Law.

Therefore, we commend the ILO for its unsparing efforts over the past years for the promotion of social justice. We hope the ILO will redouble its efforts in the field of technical assistance in the light of the dramatic events unfolding today, in such areas as promotion of employment, the rural sector, the informal sector, and the development of social security systems.

The Turin Centre has made its mark in the field of vocational retraining, management training and training in project formulation. The African Regional Labour Administration Centre in Harare (ARLAC) has made, and is making, a remarkable contribution in the field of professional training and policy development in labour administration within the context of a social and economic environment in changing Africa.

Finally, we call on the ILO to continue its support and to increase its resources to make available more opportunities for us and for Africa to benefit from the capabilities of those Centres in developing our human resources.

Mr. VASURATNA (Employers' delegate, Thailand) – It is a great pleasure for me to be among the honourable delegates at the International Labour Conference once again. May I take this opportunity to express my sincere congratulations on behalf of the Employers' Confederation of Thailand (ECOT) to the President on his election to the presidency of the 79th Session of the Conference. With his wisdom and able leadership, I am confident that he will lead the deliberations of this session to a fruitful and successful conclusion.

I would like to begin with the agenda item, the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. I still insist that the existing laws and procedures in most countries, as well as Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) provide sufficient protection for workers and I feel it is not necessary to create a new international instrument to cover this subject. If this session of the Conference decides to draw up a Convention and Recommendation, I will consider them to be provisions for the protection of workers' claims by means of a privilege.

The other provision, involving a guarantee institution which would pay the workers' claims, will cause additional costs and thereby discourage investment and the creation of new jobs. Furthermore, it is not fair to penalise successful enterprises by making them pay for the mistakes of other incompetent enterprises, and it may be jeopardising the competitiveness of enterprises, especially in the developing countries.

My suggestion regarding the provisions concerning workers' claims is that they should only appear in a Recommendation and should be considered a privilege. Each country would develop its own forms of regulation, according to its practices, culture, constraints and legislation.

On the agenda item, the prevention of industrial disasters, I agree in principle on developing instruments for the prevention of industrial disasters and I am in favour of a Recommendation only. Whether this session of the Conference decides to draw up a Convention or a Recommendation, the following factors should be taken into serious consideration: (1) there are many constraints in most of the developing countries, such as weakness of law enforcement, too many small enterprises, the informal sector, etc.; (2) the proposed instruments should not be too exhaustive, covering such items as process safety management, but should be limited to major hazard control only; (3) the need for training programmes and various technical assistance programmes; (4) the coordination with existing regulations of other international organisations within the United Nations such as the WHO, OECD, UNEP, IPCS, EC, etc., and even the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155) and the Occupational Safety and Health Recommendation, 1981 (No. 164), in order to avoid unnecessary duplication.

Since the ILO suggested that the elaboration of a Recommendation may not be appropriate, its long and detailed provisions may become obsolete before it is possible to consider revising them. For this reason, I agree with most countries' employers that the Recommendation simply makes reference to the ILO code of practice on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents and that the Code should be used as a basis for giving effect to the policy for the prevention of industrial disasters. For any future amendment of the Code to come into effect, it would be necessary to adopt a Protocol.

Next, I would like to touch on the topic of adjustment and human resources development.

There is no doubt that human resources development, through education and training, is a crucial factor for the future growth and prosperity of workers, employers as well as nations.

Education and training are creating skill development, adaptability to change, increasing productivity, higher incomes and an improved quality of life. Governments have been forced by economic crises and structural adjustment to reduce expenditure in education and training budgets. This is because education and training are still publicly financed. I believe that in order to protect education and training programmes that are considered to be critically important for economic and social development, the combination of legal definitions of the size of budgets, levy systems, the political mobilisation of interested groups and the privatisation of training institutes is needed.

Enterprises are the primary market for education and training, and therefore, employers are the ultimate arbiters of market demand for skills and knowledge. For this reason, employers should have stronger roles in deciding vocational training programmes, course content and enrolment in each course. Nowadays, employers need more and more dual systems – the combination of theoretical school-based education and practical on-the-job training.

Lastly, I would like to support the idea of increased international funding to help the economically underdeveloped countries to provide universal primary education. Credit must be given to the ILO's effort in trying to provide a better quality of life for everyone.

Mr. BOEDJOSASTRO (Employers' delegate, Indonesia) – On behalf of the Employers' Association of Indonesia (APINDO), I am greatly honoured to be participating in and to have the opportunity to address the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I wish to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, for his valuable and comprehensive Report on Democratisation and the ILO, which has reminded us of what we have already done so far and what remains to be done in the consolidation of democracy.

As you are all aware, democracy is not just a system to organise and exercise government activities, but a philosophy of life. Democracy is a way of life. In a general sense, democracy promotes liberty and equality. Since democracy is a philosophy and a way of life, democracy may develop from the evolving civilisation of a country. Democratisation has to be linked also to the economic development of the country.

In his Report, the Director-General refers to the address of Mr. Camdessus, Director-General of the International Monetary Fund, to last year's session of the International Labour Conference, and his view that there are possible ways of making democratisation and economic development proceed hand in hand.

The philosophy of pancasila has been accepted as a natural expression by the Indonesian people through a long historical process. Indonesian culture is basically composed of varying cultures of many ethnic groups which are of highly diverse nature. Nonetheless, the Indonesian nation has successfuly maintained its unity under the national motto "Unity in Diversity". In its very essence, it places high value on a sense of tolerance, pluralism and of oneness, which constitute essential ingredients of democracy. In short, Indonesian democracy is rooted in the country's culture and sense of brotherhood.

This motto is also applied to industrial relations and advocates the concept that workers, employers and government should adopt a sense of co-ownership, a sense of joint responsibility and a sense of continuous introspection. Management and labour are "social partners" in the process of our industrialisation and form a pillar for our national development. Every dispute between management and labour should be settled by the peaceful means of consultation and not by the antagonistic means of confrontation.

In the process of substantiating Indonesian democracy based on pancasila and in observing our basic human rights, a number of laws have been promulgated; to mention but a few, there are those governing equality of treatment for national and foreign workers, workmen's compensation for accidents, the right to organise and collective bargaining, equal wages for men and women for work of the same value, etc.

With regard to tripartism, Indonesia established its National Tripartite Council in 1983, followed by provincial tripartite as well as district tripartite councils. Any decision made by these councils is considered as having a decisive influence not only on industrial relations, but also on national industry and the economy.

In the past few years, our Government has taken positive steps in respect of structural economic adjustment and human resources development which are of major interest to the Indonesian development endeavour. A series of step-by-step deregulation and debureaucratisation measures have been taken to make the Indonesian economy more efficient, improve the competitiveness of our products on the world market and attract more foreign investment into the country. As a result of such policies and measures, the Indonesian economy has expanded quickly in recent years, with an annual average economic growth of around 7 per cent.

However, due to basic infrastructural problems, particularly electricity and telecommunications, the Indonesian economy has been progressing at a slower pace in the past two years. These phenomena have forced the Government to take the necessary steps to prevent the "overheating" of the economy. While in the long term this policy is expected to lead to healthy growth, in the short term it has adversely affected the role of enterprises in the creation of employment opportunities. The situation has been further worsened by the world economic recession and the policy of protectionism undertaken by the industrialised countries.

Now we come to a basic question; namely, what do we expect from the ILO in the coming years ? We, the employers of Indonesia, consider that the ILO should be able to organise itself in such a way so as to enable it to meet growing and more complicated challenges resulting from unprecedented economic and political structural changes at the national, regional and global levels.

Now, I think the time is right for the ILO to determine its priorities to make it more responsive to its member countries' aspirations. While recognising the importance of ILO programmes with respect to standard-setting and monitoring, my delegation would like to emphasise that the ILO in its future efforts should give more attention to technical assistance programmes, particularly as regards education and training programmes. Human investment will be of paramount importance for the employers as well as workers, especially in the developing countries, and to making their respective contribution to the country development efforts more effective.

I wish the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference all the best and sincerely hope that it will bear fruitful and concrete results.

Mr. MARAKKAR (Workers' delegate, India) – On behalf of my delegation from India and on my own behalf, I extend our hearty congratulations and felicitations to the President of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference on his election to his prestigious position. I am sure that under his able and efficient stewardship the 79th Session will attain its objectives with utmost satisfaction.

I am happy to note that it is quite appropriate and timely that the Director-General in his Report to this session has chosen democratisation as its theme. Coming from India, I and my delegation are happy to endorse the sentiments expressed by the Director-General with regard to democracy. India is the largest democracy in the World where more than 850 million people are governed by a Government of their free and willing choice, according to the principles and precedents of parliamentary democracy. So far as India is concerned, the concept of democracy is not a new idea. It is a part of the great tradition and the cultural ethos of our ancient country with a history of thousands of years. It was because of this traditional background that after achieving independence from foreign yoke, the great leader of our freedom struggle lost no time in passing on the newly achieved political power to the millions of people at grass - root level. Within three years of assuming political authority in August 1947, India was transformed into a democratic republic. Overcoming various trials and tribulations, Indian democracy continues with its vigour and vitality without abatement. Hence India will be second to none in acknowledging and apllauding democracy as it extends and spreads to new areas of the globe.

But democracy is not an end in itself. It cannot survive long unless it is strongly supported by economic measures. In a country where substantial sections of the citizens find it difficult to make both ends meet, the foundation of democracy might become vulnerable. To the starving millions rhetorics about democracy will sound simply ridiculous. It is in the interest of democracy itself that poverty and inequality should be eradicated and ameliorative measures adopted for alleviating the miseries of the teeming millions. The ILO declared far back as in 1949 that "poverty anywhere is a threat to prosperity everywhere". It is heartening to note that the Director-General has this aspect in mind when he states in the concluding portion of his Report that : "Most of the Office's major technical and regional programmes will focus on the war against poverty. Among the crucial issues in this area are employment promotion, the fight against unemployment, all the measures designed to support structural adjustment policies, special attention being given to measures tending to soften the adverse social impact which some of these policies might produce on the most deprived population groups in the States concerned. Our purpose in this respect is not to impede structural adjustment policies needed for restoring overall economic equilibrium and for creating the conditions for renewed growth, but to assist member States in fitting social objectives into these policies and in designing mechanisms of social protection that will make the economic restructuring acceptable and help to achieve sustainable growth." Democracy without prosperity is dangerous. Hence the principles and application of democracy must be blended with economic and social justice. It is with this end in view that India has declared "democratic socialism" as its national objective. Socialism is nothing but an extension of democratic practice into the realm of economics. The socialism which we propagate in India is not one which is imported or imposed.

In the prevailing world situation characterised by political turmoil and economic tribulations, developed countries have a significant role to play. With the end of the Cold War the world is witnessing the process of the formation and formulation of a new world economic order. The substantial resources that the superpowers were spending on defensive and offensive operations are now available for constructive activities. Economic prosperity being the essential prerequisite for the sustenance of a democratic political structure, it has become imperative that developed countries interested in the survival of democracy strengthen the economic infrastructure of developing and less developed countries.

Democracy shall not be allowed to degenerate into a system where citizens are provided with an opportunity to cast their secret ballots once every four or five years. Democracy should be a living concept permeating all aspects of social, national and international behaviour. While in a national context democracy involves equality of opportunity, in the international context it means respect for the sovereignty of nations and non-interference in the internal affairs of one country by another – economic or political. But such a spirit of equality and non-interference is rarely evident in the realm of interaction among nations at the global level. What we still see is distinction and discrimination between the haves and have-nots among nations. Developed countries continue to create roadblocks in the economic progress of developing countries. Protectionist barriers are raised and punitive measures are adopted against developing countries by developed countries. Arm-twisting methods are used to impose on poorer countries conditions which are more favourable to the richer countries. Such practices on the international level will only help to undermine the principles of democracy the world over. Democracy can flourish only in a political situation where there is no hegemonism.

The working class has a vital stake in the establishment and endurance of democracy. It is only in a democratic system that fundamental human rights are recognised. The right to organise and the right to protest are the cornerstones of the free trade union movement. The working class of the former Soviet Union and East European countries started voicing its grievances only after the collapse of the totalitarian regimes under which these countries were toiling. In this context, I wish to congratulate the workers of the erstwhile Soviet Union and of the East European countries for achieving independence and the right to organise freely. I also take this opportunity to felicitate the delegates of Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, the Republic of Korea, Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan and Slovenia on this auspicious occasion of their joining the International Labour Organisation.

The subjects which the Director-General has included in the agenda of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, namely the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, structural adjustment and human resources development, the prevention of industrial disasters are of immense importance to the developing and less developed countries of the world. These subjects are currently being debated in my country with much vigour and enthusiasm. In this era of rapid technological innovations and economic upheavals, the incidence of industrial sickness is on the increase. The closure of industrial undertakings consequent upon the economic incapability of the employer is not an uncommon phenomenon in India. In such circumstances the innocent worker who is thrown outof his job on the street shall not be penalised by denying him his well-earned wages. The workers' wages constitute the first claim over the assets of the establishment under liquidation.

Structural change and human resources development are also subjects engaging serious attention in our country. We are aware that no country can isolate itself from and insulate itself against the wind of change sweeping across the world. Change is an essential ingredient of progress, but such changes should be in conformity with the socio-economic conditions prevailing in the respective countries and must not be imposed by external forces. Quite naturally, when structural changes are introduced manpower utilisation may also have to be modified accordingly. Such adjustments may entail redundancies and necessitate retraining and redeployment, which is a costly affair. It is imperative that financial institutions, like the IMF, should come forward with a helping hand to the developing countries to face this new challenge without imposing conditions injurious to the interest of the recipient countries.

Another important item on the agenda of this Session, namely the prevention of industrial disasters, is of particular significance to our country especially in view of the Bhopal disaster, the memory of which still haunts our minds.

I hope the deliberations of this august assembly will culminate in appropriate instruments which will be of historic importance to the working people of the world.

Original – French: Mr. JOUEN (representative of the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions) – On behalf of the International Federation of Free Teachers' Union (IFFTU) I would like to congratulate the President of this Session of the International Labour Conference on his election.

We congratulate the Director-General for the relevance and the excellence of his Report, Democratisation and the ILO. The theme is particularly timely because we have all witnessed over the last few years profound changes in the political, economic and social structures in many regions of the world. These changes, which often spring from the free trade union movement and from the teachers in its midst, are rich in hope and must be consolidated.

This consolidation of the democratic ideal involves a number of efforts and we would like briefly to address some of them. Firstly, we believe there is the great effort towards education in democracy, a process already begun and developed in many countries with a democratic tradition but which is virtually nonexistent in the majority of countries who have only recently democratised their structures. In more general terms, however, the consolidation of democracy involves above all a general effort to raise the standard of education of the people, because we all know that democratic ideals will not truly take root among illiterate peoples or those who are under-educated. On this point much remains to be done; indeed, UNESCO statistics show that almost 30 per cent of adults and young people over 15 years of age, are illiterate.

The consolidation of democracy also involves efforts to improve the quality of life of peoples, particularly in those countries which have recently turned to democracy. We are all aware that democracy is a necessary but insufficient condition for economic and social development. We are also aware that the advantages of the democratic process emerge in the medium and long term rather than in the short term. But we must also bear in mind the fact that the transition from an authoritarian regime to democracy often at first leads to deteriorating conditions of life, particularly for workers and young people. There are more redundancies, wages are cut, go unpaid or are paid in arrears, the prices of staples rise sharply – these are but a few examples which workers find very negative although this is also part of the change to democracy. If it is truly to take root in minds as well as in practice, democracy must speedily demonstrate that it does provide the population as a whole with a better life than the previous authoritarian regimes.

Finally, the consolidation of democracy requires that it be truly experienced in daily life, particularly in labour relations. There are major weaknesses here even in countries with a long-standing democratic tradition. Tripartism as advocated by the ILO over many years as a means of approaching and regulating labour relations – accepted and experienced by governments, employers and workers at the international level, as demonstrated by this Conference – is far from being accepted and experienced at home, whether at the sectoral or enterprise level. The unions are all too often only tolerated by too many governments and employers, and rarely are they truly consulted or invited to negotiate. Complaints submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association by a number of international teachers' trade union organisations against the governments of the Republic of Korea, Sierra Leone and Turkey, to mention but a few, are an unfortunate illustration of this. The democratic ideal involves not just political freedom and the regular holding of free elections, but also involves the democratic practice of labour relations.

This Conference also has on its agenda a report entitled Adjustment and human resources development. Allow me to emphasise its excellence and to associate myself with a number of its points, particularly the effects of structural adjustment policies on education and training. Very objectively, and indeed courageously, with precise examples to support its claims, the report shows how in the first place, wages and working conditions of teachers have been affected by these policies, often discouraging teachers and leading them to leave the profession. The report also shows that funding restrictions on education and training has an impact on the quality of education, and ultimately on the human resources which are necessary for economic and social development.

At this stage we should bear in mind the fact that those countries which today are most successful in economic terms are precisely those which have made great efforts to improve human resources, not simply in order to create an elite, but so as to raise the general level of education and of training of all of their working population. We should also bear in mind that workers' success in the field of occupational reconversion is essentially a function of the general level of education and training. The ILO certainly must review all of these issues which, we believe, are the major challenge of this decade.

Since the last Session of the Conference, a joint meeting was held in November on the conditions of work of teachers. The most recent meeting of the Governing Body of the ILO approved its conclusions and resolutions. We would like to stress our satisfaction with these conclusions, which were approved unanimously by the meeting's participants. Our joint meeting stressed the importance of the negative impact of structural adjustment programmes in many countries on education, teachers, social relations and human rights. We hope that the impact of structural adjustment policies on our profession will be included on the agenda of the first standing technical committee for the teaching profession, which may be held in 1995.

By way of conclusion, I would like to announce to the Conference that this is probably the last time that the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions, as such, will address this forum. On the 26 January next our International, together with the World Confederation of the Organisations of the Teaching Profession, will be setting up a new international secretariat associated to the ICFTU, with a membership of 20 million, which will be known as Education International. This will doubtless be a major event within the international trade union movement. One of the reasons for the establishment of this new organisation is to be found in the fact that we hope to focus on and improve our human and financial resources, the better to tackle the challenge of the major changes which are certain to affect the areas of education and training.

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. Solórzano Martinez) – We will continue this afternoon the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ETCHEVERRY ESPÍNOLA (Workers' delegate, Paraguay) – On behalf of the Paraguayan workers and their mother organisation, the Paraguayan Confederation of Workers (CPT), I would like to greet the President and all the delegates. I would like to congratulate the President on his election and wish him the greatest success in the leadership of this session of the Conference. The workers of the world are pinning their hopes on the positive conclusions of this session of the Conference being translated into better social, economic, cultural and professional conditions for them.

The Paraguayan workers in general, and the CPT in particular, have studied Part II of the Report of the Director-General on the activities of the ILO in 1991 very carefully. I can state with satisfaction that these documents clearly indicate the outstanding efforts made to achieve the objectives of social justice and greater dignity for people at work and in society. Great efforts have been made to achieve the observation and effective implementation of international labour standards, to achieve complete respect for freedom of association, increased employment and development possibilities, and more humane structural adjustment procedures and industrial redeployment in the countries in areas of economic integration. The Report discusses the promotion of employment in rural areas, the development of enterprises and cooperatives, training and further training, the problems of migration especially of workers for employment reasons, labour relations and labour administration, the work of the ILO concerning multinational and transnational enterprises, working conditions and environment, social security and health at work and the important regional activities of the ILO throughout the world.

In its attention to and fulfilment of all these programmes the ILO in 1991 once again demonstrated its abilities and devotion to the full satisfaction of the Paraguayan workers.

I would now like to speak of my own country, Paraguay, a nation which, as you all know, only three years ago managed to free itself of one of the bloodthirstiest tyrannies ever, which for 35 years harassed human dignity, annihilated freedom, destroyed democracy and subjected the people and the workers to a regime of oppression and exploitation from which we are now emerging with the firm will to live once and for all in a responsible, democratic and pluralistic society. We want a society where all organised workers, overcoming a thousand and one difficulties, but reaffirming their unity and their objectives of social justice, will build, and are already building, a new Paraguay where justice rules, where the supreme will of the people will triumph, where corruption will be a thing of the past and the people's just desire for "bread, peace and freedom" will prevail. The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and the Inter-American Regional Organisation of Workers (ORIT) have proclaimed this message on their banners for almost half a century now in their struggle for free and democratic trade unions in America and thoughout the world.

At this very moment something extremely important is happening in my country – the Constituent National Assembly is being finalised, and a new national Constitution is being promulgated. Immediately after this momentous event Parliament (the House of Deputies and the Senate) will study and then promulgate the new Labour Code and the Act concerning the social security system and retirement and other pensions. From then on Paraguay will begin its quest for well-being, work and happiness.

We Paraguayans are resolved to leave behind us, once and for all, our long, dark history of dictatorships, that, for more than 145 of the colony's 179 years of independence, have mortgaged freedom, have fettered our national progress and have imposed a system of exploitation upon the working population.

For all these reasons, the Paraguayan workers, represented today democratically by three workers' confederations (the CPT, the CUT and the CNT), have decided to take upon ourselves fully the commitment to defend democratic principles, the standards of civilised existence, on the basis of fraternity, respect and a sense of trade union unity, in order to avoid our country ever again falling into the ignominy of tyranny and exploitation. Therefore we are fighting, and we will continue to fight, for a new institutional structure in our country, inspired by solidarity and the absolute respect for human dignity.

In Paraguay we, the workers, think that the tripartite principles in industrial relations which are defended by the ILO are valid if the parties concerned (employers, the State and workers) sit down together at the same table in good faith and with open ears.

A dialogue on that level must be carried out for the benefit of sound and constructive relations between employers and workers. In Paraguay this practice does not always result in reaching agreements and solving problems because in certain employers' sectors there is still a retrograde attitude that despises trade union and labour rights.

In this connection I cannot fail to bring to your attention, as an example of anti-democratic and anti-social attitudes, what is happening to Paraguayan workers in textile, pottery and other enterprises. The main trade union leaders and the leaders of the CPT are being badly treated and dismissed simply because of their legitimate trade union activities.

Another matter which we would raise again here is that of Case No. 1546 of the Freedom of Association Committee, concerning the unjustified dismissal of the leaders of the association of airline attendants of Línea Aereas Paraguayas (LAP), brothers Antonio García, Ralt Gehre, René Salomón and Francisco Montanaro. Their union has been registered and recognised, but nevertheless these four leaders have been dismissed from their employment by an arbitrary decision of the above-mentioned company.

In the light of the new situation created by the constitutional recognition of the right of free association for employees in the public sector, from which of course employees of LAP benefit, we request the ILO and, through the intermediary of the ILO, the Ministry of Justice and Labour and the Supreme Court of Justice of Paraguay, to revise this case and to reinstate immediately these leaders who have been unjustly dismissed.

Finally, from this rostrum of the International Labour Organisation, which is a guiding light and a hope for just solutions in the labour world, on behalf of our Confederation, I would like to address another request to the ILO, that it should, by the most appropriate means, urge the Supreme Court of Justice of Paraguay, through the Ministry of Labour and Justice, to review and seek a satisfactory solution to the cases brought against the chief leader of the construction industry union of the Alto Parana y Canindeyú C. Efigenio Lisboa, affiliated to the CGT, who for the last four weeks has been held in the prison of Tacumbú, Asunción, facing accusations and charges which basically have trade union implications and for this reason can and must be examined and solved within the context and the spirit of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). We do not wish to interfere with legitimate judicial action, but we consider it appropriate for the Ministry of Justice and Labour of our country to find a fitting solution to this case since it is within its field of competence.

Finally, I should like to thank you for your kind attention to my complaints and express my best wishes for the continuing progress of the ILO in its essential role of orienting the understanding of social problems within the context of an effective implementation of freedom and social justice.

Mr. KARA (Workers' delegate, Israel) – May I, first of all, join the former speakers in congratulating the President and his deputies on their election and wishing all of us a good and fruitful session.

I come from a country today facing great challenges and seeking ways to solve the problems that these challenges present. The first challenge is existential – the challenge of finding a way to live in peace with our neighbours. The State of Israel was born in a stormy war for existence. Thirty-two years passed before we managed to sign the first peace agreement with our largest neighbour – and strongest adversary – Egypt.

This peace, albeit still a cool one, is certainly preferable to a state of war. And now, ten years later, we stand again at the gate of a new promise : Israel, its Arab neighbours and the Palestinians have embarked on the long and complicated road to peace. I have no illusions concerning the difficulties involved in this process. The road we have taken will not be short, neither will it be painless or free of frustrations.

The peace we shall hopefully achieve will not be one between winners and losers ; there is no such peace. It will be a peace reached by compromise – peace which will put an end to bloodshed and hostility. No more will either side have to suffer the pain of widowhood and orphanage ; a new promise of stability and prosperity will come to the people of our tortured region.

On 1 January 1993, Europe will become a single internal market. We in Israel, I must admit, are somewhat jealous of the problems facing the Europeans : problems of integration as against problems of identity and national sovereignty. I keenly hope that the day will come when all the nations of the Middle East will be faced with similar problems stemming from a thriving Middle East community. In the meantime, however, we in Israel – the working people in particular – are facing the challenge of structural adjustment towards the new reality of an integrated Europe. Workers in other European countries, outside the Community, are faced with the same challenge, particularly as regards everything concerning human resources development, and it was a timely and wise decision on the part of the ILO Governing Body to place this important issue on the Conference agenda.

The European Community Charter on the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers provides a framework of basic norms of protection for EEC workers. But alongside this Charter, the Community is duty-bound to remember that one of its main sources of manpower is the Mediterranean basin countries. ILO has already determined a framework of norms for migrant workers to a national State. It must now face the challenge of setting norms for migrant workers in the face of a rigid multinational reality. Workers' organisations are already facing well-organised multinational employer frameworks ; the time has come for the workers to organise similar bodies for themselves.

The challenge of a united Europe which Israel faces is indeed a big economic challenge, but if peace is the major challenge then the second major challenge facing us is the challenge of absorbing the large masses of immigrants who have flocked to Israel over the last two years, bringing a 10 per cent increase in the country's population. This is not only a national challenge of providing housing, employment and schooling. It is also a challenge for the working public faced with the necessity of retraining hundreds of thousands of new immigrants to trades and professions in which they can find employment in their new country. There is also the necessity to adapt the technically qualified immigrants to our more advanced technological methods as well as to acquaint them with new working norms prevailing in an economy which does not ensure automatic employment. Then there is the question of acquainting them with the activities of a free, independent trade union organisation, which is not at all the kind of government organ they had in their former country. This wide range of challenges, in addition to culture shock inherent in the uprooting process, is part and parcel of the topic of structural adjustment and human resources development which this Conference has placed on its agenda, and which we will be following with the greatest interest.

The International Labour Organisation was established, among other reasons, to reconcile the differences between the social partners in a free-market economy.

Today we are constantly witnessing insolvency to one degree or another of employers in the free market system. Clearly, legal obligations have priority over obligations under terms of agreement or contract, but the objective of international labour standards is to induce governments to pass laws, in this case laws which will determine that, in the event of employer insolvency, the first obligation is payment of the money due to the worker who has lost his source of livelihood, rather than towards the State, whose duty it is to protect its citizens. Histadrut – the organisation representing Israel's workers – initiated and succeeded in passing a law in our Parliament – the Knesset – that in the event of insolvency, in addition to whatever is due from the court ruling, the worker is entitled to receive from the National Insurance a sum of up to as much as ten times the average wage in the economy.

For several years now, society has become aware of the importance of environment protection for the quality of life. The ILO has, in many cases, been a pioneer in setting safety standards at the workplace. Safety at the workplace has far-reaching implications for environmental protection, as we have seen in the Bhopal and Chernobyl disasters, which have led to a revolution in the approach to ecology. It is our duty here, in the ILO, to find means of preventing industrial disasters, and determine supervisory machinery which will make our world a safer and better place to live in. Here again, let me say how important it is that we are addressing these issues at the present session.

I opened my remarks with a hope for peace. Let me end them by reiterating this hope. To our Arab neighbours and the Palestinians living in our midst, I say: the time for recrimination and blame is past. These have brought only violence and terror. Now is the time to turn from violence to dialogue, to travel jointly to a new destination.

Thousands of human lives have been lost tragically and billions of dollars spent to no avail. We are unable to change the past – yet we can design a better future. Our choice is between hatred and dialogue; between suspicion and hope. Our choice is between an endless arms race and investment in the well-being of our people. Our choice is between extremism and moderation; between fundamentalism and reason. It is our choice to prevent the next war; the choice between those resigned to the fatalism of belligerency and those determined to alter this fate. For the future of our children, for a better tomorrow, let us make the right choice; let us choose moderation, dialogue and peace. Let us together design a future where our region can develop into a testing ground for mobilising science and technology, to offer a new source of growth. A future where peace attracts economic investment; a future where resources spared by arms reductions are invested in basic and higher education; a future of regional stability and economic co-operation.

In the two Hebrew and Arabic words that sum it all up, I say again, SHALOM, SALAAM.

Mr. BOGGS (representative of the International Federation of Chemical, Energy and General Workers' Unions) – The work of the ILO is more important today than perhaps at any other point in its history, for a number of reasons. As the Director-General's Report points out this year, the most important theme is the process of democratisation in member States and the role of the ILO in this process. We in the international labour movement emphatically agree. There is indeed a trend towards democracy in the assertion of civil liberties, but what the Report blithely cales "short-term social costs" in the "liberalisation of markets" is a medium and long-term disaster for many workers in many industries around the world.

That tragedy in a very real sense is embraced by the term free-market economy.

Unfortunately, in many political environments of the world, free-market economy means free of trade unions. In fact, one of the basic tenets of many of the so-called market philosophers and technocrats is the diminution of the role of the trade union in all of its aspects which are of great value to industry. These include occupational safety and health training, training in general, skill upgrading and all the other very specific contributions of trade unions to the industries in which they work through the work they carry out to ensure stability and safety or provide training. In many countries where free-market structures are being introduced or reintroduced, labour codes are being fine-tuned, resulting in the weakening of trade union movements.

In the United States of America, where in the 1980s the groundwork was laid for the failure of the U.S. economy, such fine-tuning was based in large part on the use of replacement workers in times of industrial strife. Workers legitimately striking when collective bargaining processes broke down were and are permanently replaced by non-union workers at much lower cost and at much higher profit margins for the companies involved. This widespread practice has taken on monstrous proportions in the United States, to the point where it is now a major battle for the labour movement to seek legislation to stop this onerous practice. Of course, in many societies there are no laws to be twisted in this fashion. In such cases striking workers know they have no chance, because they will be replaced by unemployed workers, whose numbers in many economic and social environments are staggering. There is thus a positive role played by the ILO in ensuring freedom of association, by hearing complaints concerning the violation of trade union rights and freedoms in many parts of the world.

Many of us in the international labour movement are working very hard to foster responsive trade union development and training programmes where no such activity existed before. This is particularly true in Eastern Europe, where private capital has tried frequently in the very recent past to take advantage of workforces accustomed neither to collective bargaining, nor to dealing with non-government industry. Although there is a sophisticated electronic network extending across Eastern Europe, which our international developed to gather and disseminate information, my own international is still beleaguered with requests for information from our newest affiliated organisations in the East. They ask how to deal with Western capital interests as they move in quickly to take advantage of advantageous potential. The ILO has been working in the East European reaches, and I am sure it will do more in the future to help develop responsive trade union institutions that can deal effectively with the evolution of economies in this very difficult context.

Another equally troubling and highly dangerous practice occurring from North to South and from East to West is the widespread use of contract labour to perform tasks previously carried out by trained and organised trade union workers. The clear and present danger of using unskilled maintenance and cleaning personnel contributed to the accidents in Bhopal, in oil refineries in Texas and in countless other major industrial accidents in recent years. While the advantages of hiring non-union workers who are unskilled or underqualified to perform tasks previously carried out by long-term trade union employees may be attractive to employers, it can be deadly in terms of the environment, plant and community safety and, in a very direct sense, the safeguarding of the workers themselves in refineries, energy, nuclear energy plants, chemical plants and other relatively high-risk industrial sites.

This is a point that will be brought to bear strongly in the discussions now going on in the first discussion of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters. It will be important in the context of the major hazard control system. We are working very hard to develop an ILO Convention on this very important matter for next year.

The "rites of privatisation", another phase of the free market approach to social and economic organisation in many countries, has sent shock waves among the workers of what heretofore has been public industry. Privatisation often entails job cutbacks, higher costs to the consumer and generally undervalued sellouts of industrial plants and equipment to private investors. This too is an area of considerable concern to us, in particular in the energy and utilities sector. We hope that the ILO's venerable forum for discussion and research will help us bring the extremely important elements of this new challenge of privatisation clearly into focus.

The Report of the Director-General entitled Democratisation and the ILO forcefully underlines the importance of the ILO not only to employer and trade union organisations that have traditionally subscribed to the Conventions and Recommendations of this great institution, but in a very real sense to newly-emerging economic and political structures in Eastern Europe. In fact, the Director-General's Report is a primer for trade union rights and freedoms throughout the world.

The Director-General echoes the posit of the former Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Pérez de Cuellar, stating that "genuine political democracy has little chance to survive... without social justice". The ILO is based on that premise, and our Director-General has rightly seized this historic moment to put this thoughtful document before us. He underlines the 1952 International Labour Conference resolution which stated that "the fundamental and permanent mission of the trade union movement is the economic and social advancement of the workers". The 1952 Session of the Conference further resolved that "to these ends it is essential for the trade union movement in each country to preserve its freedom and independence so as to be in a position to carry forward its economic and social mission irrespective of political changes". That, I submit, is the challenge before us today in the established democracies and in the newly-emerging ones as well.

The ILO machinery for triparite consultation for freedom of association, for the establishment of mediation, arbitration and conciliation services, must be implanted effectively in all societies. My organisation will continue to cooperate and work with the ILO in its many manifestations to implant the democratic structures so clearly outlined in our Director-General's Report to this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am delighted to note the progress towards the ratification and application of ILO Conventions in Turkey, and I congratulate the Turkish Government for its long-awaited efforts in this important regard. These actions serve to illustrate the practical value of the ILO and its instruments, as it corresponds to the main thrust of the Director-General's Report to this Conference.

Original - French : Mr. CHOTARD (Government delegate, France) — Allow me in my turn to congratulate the President and the Officers of the Conference on their election to these very prestigious posts. I am all the happier, as the President's country is at present presiding the European Community.

The subject which the Director-General has chosen to deal with this year in his Report to this session of the Conference is an essential one for our Organisation. It is a question of knowing how, under what circumstances and at what cost the ILO can respond rapidly to the tremendous needs which have resulted from the current rush towards democratisation throughout the world. The ILO must play its role in this worldwide event, just as it has greatly contributed in its own way to the fall of the dictatorial and totalitarian regimes.

Let us remember, some years ago, when Central and Eastern Europe, part of Southern Europe, Latin America, were all dominated by dictatorships. All these countries have now chosen, one after the other, to go back to constitutional government and to a State based on the rule of law. And yet, many people at that time said it was all just par for the course, the wind of change which has, so often blown throughout history. But there are not only ill winds and the dominoes of the famous theory have fallen in the opposite direction. Once again, I would like to pay tribute to the ILO and to its leaders for the action they have taken during these dark years.

The Governing Body, in particular in its Committee on Freedom of Association, the Conference, in particular in its Committee on the Application of Standards, together with the constitutional complaints (remember the complaint submitted ten years ago today against the Government of Poland) have all quietly and continuously recalled the value of human rights. The small obstinate voice of our Organisation has counted, for something, with others of course. It has helped to undermine propaganda, dismantle the walls and the totalitarian apparatus. The democratic movement has spread throughout the world : in Africa and in Asia, we find that small steps are being taken, sometimes huge strides. We have to go further. It is democratic peace that we have to attain. Time is short. Let us not disappoint the people who expect so much from freedom and justice.

The Report submitted by Mr. Michel Hansenne is remarkable. It is clear, well thought-out, well written. We fully approve the tack it takes. It comes at just the right time to relay the deliberations carried out in the Governing Body as regards the budgetary choices for the next biennium.

As is the case in other international institutions, a unique opportunity is before us to think about the role, priorities and adjustments to be carried out within the ILO including in its structures, following the example of the United Nations secretariat.

The problem that arises is simple to state: how can we meet, with the resources of our zero growth budget, the demands from an ever-growing number of member States? The reply is also very simple. In each of our countries, as we well know, there is room to redeploy the use to which funds are put and to make savings. The Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference, which has been made responsible for improving its efficiency at as low a cost as possible, has a very necessary task to carry out.

When we meet each year here in June, between these walls, sometimes fleeting, we are both struck by the perfection of the machinery, and also sometimes a bit overwhelmed because of the importance and the value of the Conference.

I therefore welcome the work which has already been done by the working party. Similar research in my opinion will have to be undertaken as regards other types of meetings. In the interest of all concerned, a great effort at rationalisation has to be made.

The same calm deliberation carried out without haste but with intellectual boldness will have be used to review all the main meetings such as the maritime conferences, industrial committees, regional conferences, and the same questions will have to be put as to their real use, their structures and their periodicity.

Concertation is, of course, indispensable. However, very often it could be a little bit more sober and less expensive.

The Report of the Director-General is, I would like to repeat, very well written. It is also very complete, so I am not going to go through all the interesting points made. I will merely make a few comments which apply to special original aspects of the ILO, namely the standard-setting system and tripartism.

The Conventions and Recommendations, that is, the "International Labour Code", are a coherent and dense package of instruments by which the new democratic governments can be guided.

In this connection, I would like first of all to see greater account taken of the concept of fundamental standards, that is, those which concern human rights. It is important that these standards be given priority. This is already coming true in the more regular submission of application reports. It should also be true with regard to collective pressure exerted on member States so that they will firstly ratify and then of course apply all these instruments. That is the essential part of the social aspect of democracy.

Secondly, special attention should be given to the drafting of standards. The force of our great Conventions, for instance the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), or the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention 1958 (No. 111), lies in the fact that they are drafted in clear sentences and in general terms. For some time now we have found that there is a tendency to draw up standards in which the provisions are too specific, complicated and at times even ambiguous. This perfectionist tendency is unfortunate. Technocracy is at times the enemy of democracy. Conventions which keep to the usual practice of setting general rules are easier to ratify, easier to apply and easier to supervise.

And finally, now that the cold war is fortunately over and the same concepts are now accepted more or less throughout the world, the time has come to think about the interpretation of Conventions. Certain clauses give rise to problems for governments that are of good faith. The International Court of Justice, the supreme authority, has been applied to only once since the foundation of the ILO. The ILO's Constitution provides for the possibility of setting up an ad hoc tribunal which would deal with any questions or difficulty related to the interpretation of a Convention. I would like to encourage the Girector-General to explore the possibilities in this connection.

As regards tripartism, I would like to recommend to the delegations of this Session of Conference to read very carefully the conclusions of the symposium on the new prospects for tripartism in Europe which took place in Brussels and which I attended. These conclusions are full of lessons for the fledgling democracies throughout the world.

It is not here, in this Organisation which more than 70 years ago invented tripartism, that I am going to speak about the merits of elasticity, flexibility and efficiency.

The Report emphasises very properly the main difficulty in this field for countries moving over to democracy the question of defining the role of the employers and workers in a liberal economy. It is up to one group to invest and decide and the others to respond to the proposed adjustments within the framework of negotiation techniques, which have been tied and tested, and which suit the particular conditions of the countries in which they are used.

The ILO has the privilege of being able to contribute directly to the emergence of freely chosen, representative and responsible organisations, but also that of continuing to facilitate closer relations between the international and national organisations which already exist. It is an urgent and fundamental task.

I would have liked, but I see that I am exceeding my time, to have made two further comments on tripartism. I will sum them up in a few words. Let us be careful that we realise that in order to achieve democracy, people need certain conditions – certain minimum living conditions. Secondly, there are not two categories of people in the world: those whose vocation it is to enjoy democratic rights and the others. I am convinced that there is only one category of people. And I am convinced, and my country has proved this through its history, that the desire for freedom and justice is deeply rooted in the hearts of all the men and women on this planet who we are representing here.

Original - Spanish: Mr. LUKOVIC (Workers' adviser, Yugoslavia) - First and foremost may I, on behalf of the Independent Trade Union Confederation of Yugoslavia, congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and wish them every success in the exercise of their important functions.

I would also like congratulate the Director-General on the excellent Report he has submitted and on the very wise and timely choice of the theme: Democratisation and the ILO. The Report gives us an opportunity to discuss some of the most crucial issues with which we have all been confronted in recent years.

All the documents for this session have been well prepared and give us an opportunity of engaging in a highly fruitful exchange of experience.

The Independent Trade Union Confederation of Yugoslavia lends its support to the political and economic reforms under way in our country. I would like to emphasise that we need to incorporate into them a social dimension and constantly improve the living and working conditions of all workers. We believe that these are the foundations needed if reform and democratisation are to succeed. However, with the advent of the crisis and the armed conflict which are besetting Yugoslavia, the progress of social democratisation and reform has been violently and abruptly stopped.

From the beginning of this crisis, the Independent Trade Union Confederation of Yugoslavia has been calling for a peaceful and democratic solution to the problems, based upon an agreement all parties and the respect of the interests of all people living in the region. We were amongst the first to stand up against violence and destruction wrought by the nationalist forces.

In this terrible conflict which has now being going on for almost a year, it is the workers and young people and other innocent citizens who have suffered most. The tragic war in Bosnia-Herzegovina is an example of this.

Over the past year our trade union confederation has carried out a number of campaigns in favour of peace, and together with other democratic forces, we organised a peace movement. This campaign, unfortunately, was not very successful, because we ran into a large number of obstacles which were put in our way as a result of nationalist unilateralism, which is the source of this conflict.

However, we continue to pursue our activities in favour of a lasting, peaceful and democratic solution to all conflicts and problems. We wish and hope that it will be possible to continue to pursue economic, political and social reform and to make headway towards democratisation on the basis of an effective multi-party system which fully respects human rights and trade union freedoms.

We lend our support to the economic changes and reforms for the introduction of a market economy. If we have a more effective, more rational economic structures, we are confident that it will be possible to improve the social conditions of workers and, in the process, guarantee their basic rights. It is absolutely vital that tripartism is promoted. It is vital that collective bargaining be conducted on a broad scale, and in this context the ILO and many trade union organisations throughout the world can lend us a helping hand.

The situation in my country is going from bad to worse. Some 700,000 people are without work and the real value of wages is on a steady decline. Inflation has exceeded 50 per cent per month. Social benefits are no longer adequate. There are hundreds of thousands of refugees and all these difficulties have been caused a large extent by the armed conflict besetting my country, the destruction of economic relations and links which existed between these united republics in the past, as well as outside pressure. Let us not forget that our economic system in the past was one economic entity and now that it is breaking up we are afflicted with economic chaos and our workers are confronted with uncertainty.

For all these reasons the Independent Trade Unions Confederation of Yugoslavia calls for peace and will spare no effort in trying to bring about peace as soon as possible. We are certain that we can rely upon the support of trade unions in Europe and all over the world.

In spite of very difficult circumstances, we continue to struggle for full employment, the increase of wages, better living standards for our workers, more humane working conditions, a healthy living and working environment, the respect of trade union rights and freedoms, the right to collective bargaining, the right to information and the consultation and involvement of workers in the decision-making process at the plant level. In other words, we are striving for the dignity of work and of the life our workers, for a society which is open to Europe and the rest of the world in the hope that this development will be carried out in full compliance with international labour standards.

To this end, we rely on the support, assistance and cooperation of all trade union organisations, as well as on the technical assistance of the International Labour Organisation.

Original – Spanish: Mr. FERNÁNDEZ (Workers' delegate, Uruguay) – First of all, please allow me to congratulate the President and the other officers on their election, which is a matter of prestige for all delegates to this session of the Conference.

I would like to share with you our thoughts on the Report of the Director-General.

We agree with almost all the statements made in this document. The PIT-CNT, the only trade union confederation in Uruguay, believes in genuine democracy which guarantees individual and collective freedoms and is based on fundamental rights and social protection. We also believe in the dynamic concept of democracy which, starting with the recognition of political freedom, extends to economic and social relations.

The Director-General has rightly said that "democracy . . . demands that everyone should share in political power and in economic responsibilities". This is a major point since there can be no doubt concerning the legitimate expectations of the workers to participate in some way in economic and social decisions. The Report itself promotes tripartite action by stating that "social dialogue is possible only if the State . . . does not decide everything in advance."

Here we have a difference of view with our Government. We reject the Government's unilateral decision to grant to the public sector workers a 5 per cent wage increase for the last quarter when inflation was over 80 per cent last year and is estimated at 50 per cent this year, according to a report prepared by the Government for the International Monetary Fund. We believe inflation will be even higher than that. Workers in this sectors of the central administration no doubt receive the lowest wages and are therefore sentenced to an unacceptable sacrifice.

There is also a mistake in the wage policy for workers in the private sector. Wage increases are on the order of 35 per cent annually, in spite of the much higher rate of inflation. The Government, moreover, has said that it will not validate collective agreements which exceed these limits.

Consequently, a large part of private sector workers are sentenced to underconsumption. In response to this unjust wage policy, the Senate, on 29 May, stated that the Executive Branch's wage policy greatly affects the purchasing power of public and private sector workers and of pensioners, by reducing real wages which already are insufficient for most of these persons. In this light, the Senate demanded that the Executive Branch correct this policy, and for this purpose, instructed its Finance, Labour Affairs and Social Security Committees to discuss and implement this correction with the corresponding government ministries.

The Government's reaction to the legitimate protest of public sector workers against the deterioration of their wages and their conditions of life, is in open violation of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98; indeed, it has curtailed the right to strike more severly than has ever been the case in Uruguay under democratic regimes. A "directive" issued to the senior officials of the Administration, who are requested to identify striker workers on a specific form authorises them to qualify strikes as legal or illegal, and to undertake summary proceedings which may lead to dismissal. The directive also grants exorbitant powers in the definition of essential services. It establishes a restrictive and unconstitutional concept of the right to strike, limited to occupational demands ; moreover, it introduces other arbitrary measures in saying that go-slow strikes, work to rule and the suspension of work by a group of workers constitute illegal and abusive strikes leading to the severest sanctions.

We would like to recall that the Committee on Freedom of Association has said that "regarding various types of strike action denied to workers (tools-down, go-slow, work-to-rule, and sitdown strikes), the Committee considers that these restrictions may be justified only if the strike ceases to be peaceful."

At the same time the Government has denounced a collective agreement of the workers of the National Port Administration, eliminating certain benefits and creating a climate of confrontation.

This wage dispute brings to mind a comment of the Director-General on the policies advocated by the International Monetary Fund. He recalls that the Managing Director of the Fund "spoke of possible ways of making democratisation and economic development proceed hand in hand" These concerns have been reiterated time and time again by the Managing Director of the IMF. However, it appears that no adequate answer to this question has been found because the fact is that the Fund continues to leave greater poverty in its wake.

We hope that cooperation between the ILO and the IMF, announced at last year's session of the Conference, will bear fruit by leading to the creation of a social space or dimension in a world dominated by neoliberal thinking. Under this banner, the State has indiscriminately privatised its services, selling its strategic sectors to the highest bidders, reducing its expenses and increasing social hardship and thus, at the same time, creating a larger marginal population and obliging the workers to turn to the informal sector where their lot will be underconsumption and the lack of social protection.

Following this neoliberal thinking, our Government presented a Bill for the reform of our social security system. It calls for a clear-cut decrease in benefits, which will force workers to postpone retirement and then provide them with pensions that are lower than the current pittance they receive. Parliament again defeated this neoliberal incursion ; by majority vote it decided to reject the Bill in order to open a calm discussion to all sectors of the population, given the importance of this subject.

Let us now proceed to this fascinating question of what the ILO can contribute to the process of democratisation. There is no doubt as to the efforts that must be made to apply fundamental rights, in the understanding, of course, that these include political, social, economic and cultural rights.

We believe that, together with the adoption of new standards by the ILO (unfortunately standards adopted during the last few years have been very weak due to the intransigence and intolerance of the employers), the ILO must continue intensifying the implementation of technical cooperation. Along these lines, we would like to express our deep gratitude to the ILO for the valuable support it has given and continues to give to the Uruguayan workers through its technical support in training, seminars and other events.

We hope that this effort of the ILO will continue in connection with the problems created for us by MERCOSUR. This is the most important process of integration in Latin America, in terms of the territorial extension of the countries which are Members and their respective populations. We reiterate the request already formulated in the past that MERCOSUR should have a unit which is exclusively devoted to its requirements.

Let us, moreover, recall that Uruguay, as one of the smallest countries of the MERCOSUR common market, runs a greater risk of suffering the negative effects which the integration is expected to engender. This is why we want to participate fully in this process, which is of great interest to the workers. And we would like to say, finally, that we firmly object to the requirements imposed by the international financing organisations like the Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank, because these requirements are contrary to the interest of workers.

Finally, we demand the unrestricted respect for trade union rights and the self-determination of people, and we condemn the assassinations and persecutions of trade union militants and trade union leaders in Colombia. These crimes are not compatible with democracy, nor with the wish of men and women around the world to live in peace, in freedom and with social justice.

Mr. QUIGLEY (representative of the World Confederation of Organisations of the Teaching Profession) – For 40 years the World Confederation of Organisations of the Teaching Profession has attended the International Labour Conference, but this will be the last time.

As my colleague from the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions said this morning, on 26 January next a new teachers' international organisation and an organisation also of education employees will come into being. The Education International will be founded in Stockholm as a result of a historic agreement between our two organisations.

International teacher unity has been a long-time goal for the WCOTP, enshrined in our Constitution. The new Education International will not only consolidate the position of teachers in the international labour movement, it will also be the international trade secretariat for the entire education sector.

Representing over 20 million teachers and other education employees initially, but with a potential for considerable growth in the very near future, the new organisation will be the largest ITS associated with the ICFTU.

The achievement of international unity comes at an important moment for teachers worldwide. During the last decade, the number of cases of violations of teachers' trade union rights has increased dramatically. The ILO's Governing Body itself has commented on the increase of cases before the Committee on Freedom of Association, particularly as regards teachers.

The WCOTP currently has complaints before the Committee on Freedom of Association involving serious violations of basic trade union rights: in the Republic of Korea, where 1,500 teachers have now been out of work for over two years because of their trade union activities; in the Philippines, where nearly 3,000 teachers in Manila were suspended or dismissed for going on strike and are only now being reinstated; in Morocco and Peru, where striking teachers were also intimidated. We still have ongoing cases in Sierra Leone, Ecuador, Nepal, Guatemala, Haiti, El Salvador and Iceland. As the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Governing Body will proceed with these cases in the usual way, and as we have great confidence in ILO procedures, I will not comment further on any of these cases at the present time.

However, I would like to make a general comment based on my experience in the trade union movement of my own country and in Europe, including past experience as President of our National Trade Union Centre. My comment is this : it is in a government's own interest to seek partnership with teachers' unions and to recognise their legitimate role as negotiating partners on educational policy and on the conditions of their members. Such recognition is in the public interest and it will bear fruit for the benefit of the society as a whole.

The erosion of teachers' trade union rights represented by this increase in cases, has been closely linked with a significant decline in working conditions. Last November, the ILO organised the Second Joint Meeting on Conditions of Work of Teachers. The excellent ILO working document prepared for that meeting entitled Teachers: Challenges of the 1990s, provides irrefutable evidence of the decline of real salaries and working conditions since the mid-1970s. The conclusions of that meeting, resulting from a successful negotiation between the teacher union representatives and the Government and Employers' representatives are of the utmost importance.

The Governing Body's decision to establish this meeting as a Standing Committee for Education Personnel is timely. It provides recognition for the importance of education, not only for the members on whose behalf I speak today, but also for all the components of the International Labour Organisation – the trade union movement, the employers and the public authorities.

We strongly support the recommendation that the next meeting of the Standing Committee be held as early as possible, preferably during the forthcoming biennium.

One month before the Joint Meeting held at ILO headquarters last year, another event highlighted the same issues. In October, a special ceremony in Paris, addressed by the Deputy Director-General of the ILO, marked the 25th anniversary of the ILO/UNESCO recommendation concerning the status of teachers, which was adopted at an intergovernmental conference in 1966. That recommendation, which has been described as "a work of justice and progress", is fundamental to all education systems, but it is still overlooked or even ignored by too many policy-makers in too many countries. We strongly support the work of the ILO in promoting information about the recommendation as well as international labour standards which affect teachers and the education sector generally.

Let us note that, like the ILO document to which I referred earlier, the reports of the Committee of Experts on the application of this recommendation, prepared at five – yearly intervals, provide more irrefutable evidence of the decline of teachers' salaries and working conditions over the last decade and a half.

Let us also note that in a changing world, teachers a more important role than ever to play. Their salaries and working conditions are important not only for our members, but also for the quality of the education they provide.

If a teacher has to "moonlight" by taking an extra job in order to feed his or her family, the quality of education suffers.

It goes without saying that low teachers' salaries will affect teacher recruitment. Their salaries must be able to compete with those of other qualified groups on the labour market.

One of the important conclusions of the Joint Meeting last November was that the teachers' unions cannot be excluded from the protection of international labour standards, including the right to organise, to negotiate and to bargain collectively. Arguments presented by a minority of governments that teachers should be denied basic trade union rights because they are, in the main, public employees were rightly rejected by the joint meeting. As the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Governing Body have asserted in the past, there is no reason or justification to deny teachers the application of basic international labour standards.

The presence of private school employers for the first time at last November's meeting highlighted the issue of privatisation of education which has been debated in many countries. There are important educational considerations to be taken into account. We need to guarantee equality of opportunity and to provide guarantees against discrimination. Moreover, if the teachers' unions in the future have to negotiate with a multiplicity of different employers, there is an obvious risk that salaries and working conditions will be very different from one school to another. The result will inevitably be that some schools will provide excellent working conditions and a high quality of education, while others will have exceedingly poor conditions. Is this really the wish of parents and of society as a whole?

Last November's meeting pointed to the need for the development of in-service training which must be the responsibility of the school system as a whole.

Education is by definition a people-intensive industry. Investment in education means investment in people, and such investments are profitable not so much in the short-term but in the long-term. Short-term structural adjustment policies which cut budget allocations to education and which reduce the funds needed to pay the people who work in education, therefore run in opposition to the longer-term interest of each national society. By cutting education expenditure, they cut the very investment which counts most for future development.

We strongly endorse the view expressed by the Organisation for African Trade Union Unity on the importance of removing the debt burden afflicting Third World countries. Unless this burden is removed there is no realistic prospect of improving the conditions of teachers and thereby improving the quality of education.

Our new Education International, to which I referred at the outset, will work closely with the ILO as a responsible partner. Together with our colleagues in the trade union movement in general, we in the education sector have to confront new challenges affecting the fate of communities throughout the world. Although the Cold War is over, we live at a time of increased civil conflict and risk based on ethnic, religious or national intolerance.

It has always been true that education has a central role to play in the search for understanding and peace so that people can live together harmoniously and work together productively.

Our new Education International, will work for dialogue and understanding. It will continue to promote the view which has underpinned the philosophy of WCOTP during the last 40 years, that quality education for all is fundamental to the attainment of peace among nations, respect between communities and justice for men and women, girls and boys throughout the world.

Original – French: Mr. KUBWIMANA (representative of the Organisation of Workers of Central Africa) – First please permit me to join those who have spoken before me in extending my sincere congratulations to the President of this session and to the other officers on the unanimous vote of confidence they received from the Conference participants when they entrusted the guidance of this Conference to them.

I would also like, on behalf of all the trade unions which are members of the Organisation of Workers of Central Africa which I have the honour of representing as President, to congratulate and thank the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the exceptionally high standard of the documents which have been presented to us. I would like to single out in particular the first part of his Report, which deals with democratisation and the ILO.

It is this extremely topical subject which I propose to address in my modest contribution to the discussion on the Director-General's Report. I would like to inform the distinguished delegates to the Conference of the overall experiences of Central African trade unions with democratisation in their respective countries. I would also like to express our fervent hope that the ILO will contribute effectively to strengthening the impact of the trade unions' participation along the long and winding road leading to democratisation in our region.

As the Director-Director of the ILO himself says in the above-mentioned Report, the socio-political reforms under way in most countries of the Third World and Eastern Europe have always been called for by the ILO in the past. Some of these ideas may even be found in ILO Conventions, which unfortunately were not always ratified or observed by the member States.

In the democratisation of social and economic relations the ILO has always been at the forefront. This economic and social democratisation is now giving rise to political democratisation. The ILO has indubitably played a decisive role in the rising awareness of democratic professional associations, and in particular trade unions, and in the shaping of the strategies and tactics they used to get rid of outdated regimes. Indeed, it is the ILO that always has emphasised the concepts of participation and negotiation. It was because these ideas were taken to heart and implemented by the social partners in industrial relations that several political leaders of the developing world eventually adopted new approaches to national issues, such as the use of dialogues, concertation, transparency and consultation of the people whenever their interests of future were at stake.

It would not be an exaggeration to say that since its inception the ILO has been a genuine school of democracy for many governments and professional associations. Within their countries, they in turn have been a breeding ground of democratic learning, sometimes becoming no less than a paradigm for all progressive national forces, and especially for young people and women.

In nearly all the countries of the Central African subregion it was trade unions or social and professional organisations akin to them which lit and held high the torch of democracy. They first demanded the right to organise and function independently, thus freeing themselves of the stultifying and stifling grip of the party state, and subsequently proclaimed their ideological independence from the parties in power.

It was this activity that led to the emergence of previously banned free and independent trade unions, the establishment of human rights associations and opposition parties and the creation of cultural or professional associations free of all tutelage.

The formal return to political democracy and the liberalisation of the economy cannot, however, suffice in these countries to ensure proper protection of workers' rights.

Indeed, as the Director-General emphasises quite relevantly in the first part of his Report, "the newly constituted trade unions are coming up against all manner of constraints, their difficulties are aggravated by an excessive fragmention which is scarcely conducive to that unity of expression and participation so indispensible to these organisations if they aspire to play an effective part in the consolidation of trade union structures and policies and in a genuine participation in their country's economic and social life." On page 55 of the Director-General's Report he also says: "A basic question is which type and level of trade union will predominate in the longer term: national general unions, industrial or craft unions, company unions, or some new form?"

In my country – Burundi – the former union, the Union of Workers of Burundi (UTB), was restructured as a central trade union organisation grouping 18 federations and free and independent trade union organisations. This helped us to avoid many of the pitfalls and setbacks plaguing freedom of association, which the Director-General so aptly identified in his Report.

Even before the referendum on 9 March 1992 approving the new Constitution of the Republic of Burundi, which enshrined the principles of multipartism and freedom of association, the national trade union congress, held from 29 to 30 December 1991, asserted the autonomy and independence of the trade unions and the crucial need for their unity faced with partners who, for their part, also favour the use of a common line of defence.

The trade unions of Burundi, which previously used to hold separate national congresses and conferences, freely and democratically created a joint coordination stucture for national representation to permit them to defend the interests of the whole working class of Burundi.

The Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Burundi is indeed a democratic organisation defending the common interests of all workers of Burundi, and as such it is recognised by its traditional counterparts, the Government and the Association of Employers of Burundi. Such is the case, whether a certain pseudo-independent press manipulated by the anti-democratic lobby likes it or not. Those behind this press are simply afraid of being washed away by the democratic current, which is primarily fueled by the new style of trade unionism in Burundi. If the workers' organisations in my country are to be steadfast in the face of the various constraints and adversity of our current trade union struggle, they will be looking to the ILO for support. As the Director-General says in his Report, this support has always been extended to the trade unions, in particular in assisting them to develop workers' education programmes.

One cannot sufficiently emphasise the vital need for trade union and vocational training programmes for efforts to teach workers how to handle the new responsibilities that are arising in the international context, both at the economic level.

The ILO should provide its workers' education department with greater human, financial and logistic resources in order that the ILO's assistance to trade union organisations may truly meet their many and urgent needs.

The trade unions in the Central African subregion are already grateful to the ILO for all the efforts it has made in the area. We will never cease to turn to the ILO for advice, technical and financial support, and with many other request which are bound to be generated by the circumstances of the trade union struggle over the next few years.

I will close in saying on behalf of the trade union organisations of Central Africa represented at the Conference, that I wish the conference every success.

Original – Arabic: Mr. KHOURY (Government delegate, Lebanon) – I would like to start by expressing my sincerest congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of the 79th session of the International Labour Conference. He deserves our confidence and I hope that he will succeed in leading our Conference so that it adopts resolutions and recommendations which will be respected and implemented.

I would like now to tell you that the Lebanese Minister of Labour, Mr. Abdulla El-Amine has entrusted me to express his best regards to you and his best wishes for your success, and I will read his speech in this respect:

"The Director-General of the International Labour Conference did not raise in vain the question of democracy under a new international order. Had he not proposed this as a principle of the International Labour Organisation, Lebanon would have raised this question because it is the secret of its existence, the essence of its being, the spring of life for its hopes and the cause of vitality for future generations.

"Why do I say this? Because democracy is the dream of all people; but is also a nightmare for the whole world. You may enjoy freedom and justice, work and wages, if controls are placed on the democracy you exercise. You may also lose everything, even your dignity as a human being, if you go to extremes in your exercise of democracy; if you throw democracy to the wild animals, or you carry them to democracy. And I would confess that we in Lebanon went to extremes in our love for democracy, in such a way that our enemies were tempted, and therefore we fell victims to our illusions and were an easy prey before these enemies.

"On the basis of this premise, I would like to explain to you why the delegation of the Lebanese Republic is participating in this Conference, but the Minister is not participating. I did not come to Geneva because a dictatorship carrying the mask of democracy is occupying our land, is burning our harvests, demolishing our houses, killing the old people, women and children in our country, and imposing homelessness on them, obliging me, and many colleagues of mine in the Government, to remain in the country beside those workers whose factories have been destroyed by the Israeli war machine, and therefore become unemployed. I also wanted to remain beside the peasants who are trying in vain to graze their cattle and to harvest their crops; but they can harvest only shattered hopes. I have already told you why I did not come to your Conference, and in this way I think I have presented my apologies to you. I should like to pay respects to the Report of the Director-General, which demonstrates once again how great the International Labour Organisation is, because it always adapts to whatever new developments occur and to the century's achievements.

It thus bears witness to the fact that an organisation which adopts the logic of science and is guided by faith never grows old, because it draws upon the experience of its experts and through the wisdom and knowledge of its member States, gathers the best of what they can offer; and even if they go away or grow older; it remains young and strong.

"I was pleased to see that the Report deals with ways of democratising society in the new world order. Why was I pleased? Because we in my country Lebanon – and particularly now after the wars, feuds and conspiracies we had to face – find that we are enjoying absolute support from the Syrian Arab Republic; a support offered to us on the basis of fraternity and friendship and the common struggle between the two people of Syria and Lebanon on behalf of safety and peace of the Lebanon and the whole area; under the Taef agreement which the Servant of the Two Holy Shrines welcomed in his beloved country.

"I am happy because we are now charting a single path consistent with the goals of the International Labour Organisation.

"It is true what I told you at the outset that, because of our love for democracy in Lebanon, we fell prey to democracy. But, despite the fact that Israel is obstructing, with unprecedented savagery, our attempts to mobilise all our efforts to work after ourselves, we still believe that setbacks of democracy may only be remedied by more democracy.

"A week ago, thousands of employers met and elected in a purely democratic way their representatives to Chambers of Commerce in Beirut, Mount Lebanon, Northern and Southern Lebanon. A month earlier, thousands of industrialists met and, in the same purely democratic way, elected their representatives to Chambers of Industries. Not a single bullet was shot; no stick was used. But all that happened was the free people met and elected free people.

"Did you know that the General Confederation of Lebanese Workers closed all workplaces in the country for one day, in defence of its conception of how the performance of the State could be redressed? Nobody was interrogated; no one was harassed; not a single worker was imprisoned. But we started a democratic debate with the representatives of this Confederation, which is exactly what should happen when courageous people meet and discuss.

"I was pleased to read in the Report of the Director-General the way in which our Organisation is fighting class and racial discrimination; because the new generation in Lebanon is contributing to the destruction of the last traces of financial, tribal and political feudalism, looking forward for a future in which ideals of democracy, justice, freedom, social and political equality will prevail.

"As I do not want to go beyond the ten minutes allotted each speaker, I would like to say briefly that we need your support to reorganise the Ministry of Labour, to reform social security to broaden the scope of vocational training programmes, to improve working conditions and levels of work to develop skills among State officials and to reorganise employers' associations and trade unions, because we need better work in a better country.

"But, before anything else, we need security. You know very well that when we were invited to the International Peace Conference on the Middle East, we responded immediately in the affirmative, because we hold customs which forbid us to pass in front of anybody, even our enemy, without saying "peace be with you". And our religion punishes us for violating this custom. If anybody greets us, we have to greet them in a better way or at least in the same way. And we have opened our arms to peace. Israel, unfortunately, is still striking both militarily and politically. Israel does not open its arms to peace but, striking with its two fists, tries to possess the sea, land and air, the trees, the stones and the people; after that, it would like to give us the peace of the graveyard.

"I thank you very much for listening, but I hope that you realise why it was impossible for me to participate personally at your Conference. There is another duty which obliges me to remain in my country to negotiate for peace and to fight for freedom. I should like, in concluding, to recall the words of the first Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Albert Thomas, who said if you want peace, you should cultivate justice (Si vis pacem, cole justiciam). Albert Thomas, after your death, we are still waiting for the fulfilment of the wish of your life."

Original – Arabic: Mr. DAJANI (Employers' adviser, Jordan) – In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! It is a pleasure for me to address this great assembly on behalf of the Chamber of Industries of Amman, the representative body of the employers in Jordan. I would like to congratulate the President on his election and I would like to associate myself with other participants in expressing our confidence in his wisdom and his ability to bring our work to a successful conclusion so that we can attain the objectives which we have all set ourselves. I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report this year which is worthy of admiration and which is adapted to the spirit of the age. It gives democracy and its development their proper place on the road to a new era where we will have stability, prosperity and peace, and where every people will enjoy its right to live freely and to enjoy social and economic progress, and where work will play a constructive role and contribute to the respect of human dignity and well-being.

I would also like to welcome the new Members who have adhered to the International Labour Organisation and I am sure we will have the occasion to meet and cooperate with the employers of these countries in the work of our Organisation.

As regards the promotion and practice of tripartism, a question examined by the Director-General in his Report, we would like to see a tripartite charter drawn up by the Conference and, if necessary, incorporated into the Labour Code. As one of the social partners, we the Jordanian employers are endeavouring to apply the principle of tripartism in all areas of work (legislation, social security, vocational training, occupational safety and health, employment, crisis management, etc.) Of our recent achievements in this sphere mention may be made of the preparation of a project for modernising our labour legislation, which goes back to 1960, to make it clearer, as regards reciprocal rights and obligations, the settlement of disputes, the employment of women, the employment of disabled persons, vocational training, trade union rights and many other matters.

In Jordan, employers' and workers' organisations have become democratic institutions. They are now free to act in accordance with their statutes and within the framework of the general democratic policy established by His Majesty King Hussein at the time of the parliamentary elections in 1989, when democracy became an integrated part of the life of the nation.

We have not forgotten that democracy, if it is to be authentic and strong, must be accompanied by economic and social development. This is why the Government of Jordan, in collaboration with the private sector, has prepared a social and economic development plan for 1993-97. The objective of this plan is to promote development and, above all, to address the problem of unemployment which has become even more complex since the return to Jordan of 300,000 persons who worked in the countries of the Gulf and who account for some 10 per cent of the population of Jordan. A great number of these people need a job to meet their daily needs, in addition to housing, health services, education and other social benefits. Another objective of this plan is convert the present negative economic growth rate, which is between -2 per cent and -3 per cent, into a positive rate in order to increase the GDP and compensate for the losses incurred in 1990 and 1991 following the Gulf War.

Jordan relies above all on its human resources and for this reasons appreciates the efforts made by the ILO in the sphere of vocational training and the retraining of workers who return to their countries, thus enabling them to find work more easily in industry or the service sector.

The efforts made by the Government of Jordan and by the employers and workers have the same objective, namely to resolve the major problems which have taken a large part of our population to the threshold of poverty. We hope that these clouds brought by the crisis of the Gulf war will disappear and that peace will return to the Middle East and this region can play an active role in the new world order.

The establishment of a new world order of peace and stability cannot be achieved as long as the country which claims to be democratic in the Middle East continues to violate human and trade union rights and freedoms. This is not a subject which are examining today since it will be analysed tomorrow during the course of a special sitting. I would, however, like to take this opportunity to thank the Governing Body and the Director-General for their comprehension of the special situation posed by the violation of human and trade union rights in the occupied Arab territories. They have courageously decided to devote a special sitting to the examination of the Director-General's Report on this subject.

We note with satisfaction the interest of the Director-General and the Governing Body in convening a number of special seminars on labour problems and workers in a number of Arab and Asian countries. I should like, in particular, to mention the seminar on the employment of disabled persons which was held in Cairo in 1991 and we hope to organise a similar event in Jordan. We would also like to applaud the holding of a special seminar on ways to promote small businesses organised jointly by the ILO, the Queen Alia Fund for Voluntary and Social Work and the Chamber of Industry of Amman. This seminar brought together for the first time a large number of persons working in the informal sector. These persons who had never heard of the ILO were thus able to see the interest which the Organisation has in them. As a result of their awareness, they expressed a wish for further assistance in improving their working conditions.

During the seminar I expressed a special wish that the working conditions of workers in the informal sector might be improved. This is, of course, within the framework of the strategy of the Government of Jordan, which is oriented towards the preparation of a national plan for the protection of the environment. The Chamber of Industry of Amman made a contribution to this project by setting up an environmental service to combat environmental pollution.

We have also participated in the seminar held in Colombo (Sri Lanka) on the protection of workers' claims in the event of insolvency by their employers. This seminar was very successful because of the efforts made by its organisers and the support given by the Government of Japan. We hope that the recommendations adopted by the seminar will enrich the discussions on this subject at the present session of the Conference.

The seminar was attended by representatives of the countries of East and West Asia as well as representatives of advanced countries such as Japan, Australia and New Zealand, thus enabling us to learn of the experiences of the advanced countries. We thank the Government of Japan for its support of this seminar and we hope that future meetings will be attended by representatives of the advanced countries and countries of the Third World.

As employers in Jordan, we accompanied the mission of inquiry which was sent to this country to report on the violation of trade union rights, a subject to which we will return.

We hope that the ILO will continue to combat ideologies which have been detrimental to man and peace, such as apartheid in South Africa. We are convinced that these efforts will result in the total elimination of these ideologies which are contrary to human dignity and which stir up racism and hate between men. In saying this, I am referring essentially to international Zionism. This kind of retrograde ideology is out of place in a world in which men reject egoism and racism.

We would like to see greater cooperation between the ILO and the Arab Labour Organisation, which indudes around 12 per cent of the Members of this Organisation and is concerned with the interests of a large number of workers in need of training, in particular advanced training in the industrial sector. We hope that the ILO will organise seminars such as those that were held in Tunis and Amman to promote cooperation and democratic dialogue between the social partners with a view to promoting the principle of tripartism which, in the view of us all, will help improve output. Finally, the ILO should examine on a permanent basis the questions of productivity and output.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABUZEID (Workers' adviser, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. On behalf of the General Federation of Artisans and Production Workers in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, I would like to extend my sincere congratulations to the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. His election, in addition to being a great honour for Portugal, a country with which we have friendly relations in Libya, will enable this session of the Conference to reach its objectives. I would like to seize this opportunity to extend my congratulations to the other officers of this session of the Conference, as well.

I would like also to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, for his comprehensive and remarkable Report to this session. We would like also to express our great satisfaction for his choice of democratisation as the topic of his Report, given the importance of this issue at a time when our world is experiencing so many changes, evidence of mankind's yearning to find the right approach to solve the problem of democracy. The struggle of peoples over the centuries, and indeed since the very inception of mankind, centres on finding solutions to the problem of democracy. In spite of the repeated efforts and the great sacrifices made by peoples in this respect, mankind was not able to find the right formula for democracy until the advent of this era and the glorious revolution of Al-Fattah, which gave rise to the history of the people's masses, which offers a final and unique solutions to the problem of democracy. This solution is based on the right of the people as a whole to practice direct democracy by enabling the masses everywhere to exercise power through popular conferences, popular committees and occupational organisations.

The theory of the masses is based on one important foundation, and that is that very human being in society is free and the master of his own destiny. It is every individual's right not only to express his opinion but to participate in decision-making in all issues which concern him as an individual and as part of society, without any deputisation or representation by another individual. The theory of the masses, which was engendered by the Third World theory and is expounded in the Green Book, emphasises the right of every individual to possess power, fortune and arms, and the need to break every monopoly, because power, wealth and arms are the source of force and should not be monopolised by any third party.

Therefore, democracy, in its vast and precise meaning, is the enjoyment of all rights and of all sources of power. Everyone has the right to draw up internal and external policies and to select delegates to executive organs, to practise popular supervision, to introduce legislation that will govern the exercise of this popular authority. Thus, the theory of the masses is the result of the struggle of the peoples for democracy.

Thanks to the implementation of direct democracy and the publication of the great Green Agreement on human rights in the era of Jamahiriya, and thanks especially to the accomplishments of the Revolution, human freedoms were consolidated on Libyan soil; and basic human rights were realised and democracy fulfilled. We could give many examples. I would merely like to mention here that right to organise, the right to defend all employees, the right to choose work freely and democratic dialogue are all guaranteed in the theory of the masses. Moreover, the workers, after the 1978 Revolution, were able to eliminate all causes and instruments of exploitation and moved from the category of paid slaves to the category of partners. Our workers have obtained great advantages, unavailable to any other workers. They are able to take decisions at the workplace; they select their own management and executive bodies; and they have become partners in factories and companies. They have even become shareholders in all the enterprises in which they work.

Since we are discussing the issue of democracy and how to bolster and defend human rights throughout the world, it is imperative here that we mention the desire of the Libyan Arab people to defend human rights and freedoms everywhere: this prompted Libyan people to contribute effectively to the liberation of a large number of States which were under the yoke of colonialism and exploitation. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya supports the struggles of peoples for liberation and sets out to consolidate democracy and human rights. It provides assistance to those liberation movements, be they Arab, African or international, which conduct a legitimate compaign to obtain freedom and independence. For instance, I may mention the support provided by the Jamahiriya to the Palestinian and Lebanese Arab peoples to assist them against the occupation of the Zionist entity, and to the South African people to assist in their struggle against racial discrimination. As a consequence of this stance, the Jamahiriya has fallen prey to a neo-Colonialist orchestrated campaign of false and unfair accusations made by certain western States which, under the leadership of the United States of America, are attempting to pin responsibility for the Pan Am airplane incident on some Libyan citizens. This campaign grew to the point where the pressure brought to bear on our country infringed on the sovereignty and independence of our people. Our federation cannot possibly accept such a state of affairs.

We condemn terrorism in all its forms, just as we condemn all violations of human rights. We support all initiatives and sincere attempts to find a solution to problems with the States concerned. However, we are resolved to demanding respect for our sovereignty and independence along with observance of human rights and international practices and instruments.

Consequently, we believe that this question should be dealt with giving due consideration to human rights instruments, with respect for the eternal values of sacred religions, the law of nature, the instruments of the United Nations and international conventions. In our view, this is a legal question concerning two people who have been accused and who must be guaranteed their basic rights. It is thus appropriate to cite the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and particularly Article 10 of the Declaration, which reads as follows: "Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him".

Furthermore, we would like to stress the importance of Article 11 (1) of the Declaration which says that "everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence".

This is why the accused are innocent until proven otherwise and international and Libyan law do not authorise handing them over to the States requesting them, since that would undermine Libyan sovereignty. Both logic and law preclude the possibility of the aggressor being both judge and judged.

Despite that, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya has declared its readiness to collaborate to find an equitable and honourable solution to this affair and has requested that the inquiry be held in a neutral country, although that is contrary to Libyan penal legislation and the rules of sovereignty. We believe that the solution to this problem should not be found at the expense of respect for human rights, and individuals should not be made victims of political conflict between States.

Security Council resolution 748 imposing arbitrary sanctions on the people of Libya is a blatant violation of human rights and the result of pressure coming from certain powers, under the rule of the United States of America, on certain members of the Security Council. The imposition of these sanctions including the ban on civilian flights has had serious and negative consequences for the situation of all workers in our country, Libyan, Arab or foreign. This embargo has limited workers' freedom of movement and hindered the movement of migrant workers, as well as production processes.

The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya has more than two million workers of over 46 nationalities, mostly Arabs and Africans. We also have many Asian and European workers. The majority of them live in Libya with their families and this resolution has hindered their freedom of movement.

(The speaker is interrupted by the President.)

Mr. ABUZEID: I have not been able to finish my speech…

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SOLÓRZANO MARTÍNEZ) – I would remind you that the statutary time limit that has been fixed for speeches is ten minutes.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ARBELOA (Employers' delegate, Venezuela) – First of all, my sincerest congratulations go to the President as well as to all the Vice-Presidents on their well-deserved elections to their posts at this session of the Conference. Their success will be ours.

I feel extremely pleased to be able to express my special gratitude to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the excellent and refreshing Report he presented to us entitled Democratisation and the ILO. In this Report, he shows a very deep understanding of the situation of the developing countries which, like Venezuela, are still fighting to consolidate their democracy. This document also is a commitment by the ILO to make the necessary investments to achieve these aims and of the decisive determination of the Director-General to support energetically structural readjustment and the very difficult but essential changes required in the traditional attitudes of the social partners. We trust that the various components of the ILO will also commit themselves to the objectives and the philosophy of the Director-General's Report. For this purpose we suggest that the Director-General do everything in his power to guarantee the multiplying effect of his Report.

As advocated by the ILO, the guarantee of liberal democracy requires political, economic and civil freedoms. The employers' federation of my country, FEDECAMARAS, claims that the guarantee of an organic democracy requires in addition positive economic results, as can be inferred from the Director-General's Report.

There is no doubt that in order to achieve reasonable economic results, it is essential to produce wealth which must be subsequently distributed in keeping with the efforts and contributions of each. In most developing countries, as is the case in Venezuela, it is obvious that we must give much greater attention to this aspect. Today, in view of the need for sustained competitivity, it is essential to have before us as a national objective a clear strategy which will achieve balance between the various sectors which have contributed to development.

In the first place, the strategy for this purpose must create the bases for generating wealth with honest labour, so that both employers and workers will be more autonomous and may depend only upon the fruit of our comparative advantages, the counterpart of which is rational development with renewable resources. All this must be pursued within the framework of appropriate laws in the commercial, labour and taxation spheres which will promote greater flexibility on minimum, realistic and internationally acceptable bases.

In the second place, it is essential to consider the growing interdependency of economies at the world level, which demands the development of an effective commercial diplomacy able to negotiate and bring about suitable agreements for the developing countries, such as Venezuela. There is no doubt that this requires not only negotiating skills, but more important, a certain leeway to actually exercise those skills.

On the other hand, to distribute wealth, the product of labour, as the Director-General's Report points out, requires the establishment of social justice, through the furthering of tripartism and the application of duly conceived international labour standards.

We must remember that wealth is not distributed better if the State transfers to the enterprises its responsibility for the quality of life of the workers. The only thing that this would achieve in practice would be to exhaust the capacity of response of the enterprise, endangering the stability and promotion of the small and medium-sized undertakings which are such a good source of employment.

FEDECAMARAS furthermore maintains that there is an urgent need for a profound renewal of ethical concepts in all activities in the battle against corruption in all sectors and to act differently rather than bogging ourselves down in an economic system of unearned income, which will bring with it a social model of consumerism likely to result in corruption and inefficiency which will debilitate democracy. We fully share this concern with Mr. Hansenne.

FEDECAMARAS accepts that the Venezuelan Government should try to correct various decades of economic and political mistakes by applying a policy to overhaul the economy with the support of all Venezuelans. But we must say that this requires more comprehensive and enthusiastic support from the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and other international organisations in every sense.

The results of this sensitive, although insufficient and somewhat uncoordinated policy in our case, so far have been to provide only a partial and temporary palliative, since there is a need for a macroeconomic readjustment which must coincide with structural change, the symbiosis of which is a demanding and integrated process. In Venezuela we should have by now moved on from a paternalistic economy which has been falsified by subsidies and controls, of demogogy and populist practices to a freer economy, based on productive work and shared risks. We support this policy in Venezuela in a free, pluralistic process based on a respect of political minorities. But FEDECAMARAS believes that good democratic government is to be judged by its achievements and daily work in preventing the deterioration of living standards and fighting against poverty.

Indeed, the failed and unjustified attempt at a coup d'état of 4 February last was for us Venezuelans, and perhaps for all of Latin America, proof that changes must not be delayed and that they cannot be imposed without the concerted commitment of all the social sectors. However, these reforms must be made within a framework of exemplary honesty and transparency by the political sector, guaranteeing the promotion and protection of private enterprise and of property, equality of opportunities, moralisation, an appropriate judicial system, the elimination of monopolies and oligopolies, the decentralisation of the State, as proposed by the Director-General in his Report.

Latin American democracies are fragile. The peoples who have made them possible through arduous struggle need to be persuaded of the concrete benefits and qualities of the system and that the sacrifices which are made are on their own behalf and not for the benefit of the small privileged minorities which have always existed. The responsibility in countries such as Venezuela, whether good or bad, must be shared internationally and by those who have the tools in their hands to change the destiny of Latin America and who fear the commitment required by change.

For some deterministic reason, humanity at the end of every century has its collective conscience stimulated and its faculties for introducing changes are awakened, the changes which are the great protagonist of our contemporary history. We thus welcome the disappearance of degrading and oppressive totalitarianism of all kinds, German reunification, the acceptance by the European Economic Community of the challenge of GATT, the internal reform for which the United States seems to be preparing in the medium-term after the events at Los Angeles. Change cannot be improvised nor can it remain in the hands of the adventurers of power. Latin America must cross the threshold of the twenty-first century with a positive diagnosis in its hands which will include its potential progress, facts and figures with the supreme objective of bringing about its integrated transformation through its commitment towards improving its capacity to become an integral part of the global economy and to consolidate its democracy and its development.

History will not wait for Latin America.

I cannot close this statement without congratulating all those who participated in this Session of the Conference for having unanimously adopted at the Resolutions Committee, with the tripartite support of the delegation of Venezuela, the enthusiastically co-sponsored resolution of the employers of my country concerning the role of enterprises in the growth of employment and the creation of full productive and freely chosen employment. This resolution will now become the catalyser of structural readjustment, particularly in developing countries.

In concluding, I should like to remind you that we are expecting you in Caracas for the forthcoming session of the Conference of American States, where we will have a chance to discuss and give more thought to these subjects of such great importance to our continent.

Original – Russian: Mr. BAASANHUU (Employers' delegate, Mongolia) – Thank you for giving me the opportunity to take the floor. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and I would also like to wish him every success in carrying out this responsible task.

I would like to associate myself with previous speakers who have praised the topicality and experience of the subject selected for his Report.

I would like briefly to inform you about the current social and economic situation in our country, and about the activities of the Mongolian Employers' Association. An improvement of the material welfare of the nation is quite clearly impossible without changing the economic model and making a decisive move towards a market economy. Thanks to the process of democratisation which has been initiated in our country, the social and economic life of the country is changing completely. We can say that the emergence of employers in Mongolia is the result of democratisation. Fairly intensive privatisation is underway in services, trade, light industry, food production, construction, and agriculture. Whilst moving over to market relations, we are coming face to face with problems, as in other countries, such as prices going through the roof, inflation, and unemployment. In connection with the economic difficulties in our country, for the first time ever, this year, we have been holding tripartite consultations in the field of labour relations. A number of laws have recently been adopted, including a law on the activities of economic units; a law on investment, and a law on joint ventures, etc. All these measures on the part of the Government are providing support during the move to a market economy. But, they are still not enough to develop a new economic system. Young entrepreneurs are still very vulnerable and their situation easily jeopardised. Suffice it to say that our tax legislation and custom barriers do not satisfy today's requirements.

Our employers are interested in obtaining guarantees regarding freedom to carry out their commercial and industrial activities and protection of material welfare. Success in developing a market economy will, to a great extent, depend on how possible it is to increase the number of enterprises able to produce high-quality goods, be competitive and which would be in a position to generate employment in industry. It must be said that enterpreneurial activity with regard to creating small and medium-sized enterprises is being held up by a lack of investment. In this connection it is pleasing to be able to point out that the ILO in its Programme and Budget 1992-93 provides for the allocation of resources to enterpreneurship and small enterprise development. The appearance of small private economic units and companies in services and trade, and the privatisation of industry are still relatively slow-moving. The Mongolian Employers' Association is giving particular attention to the setting up of small and medium-sized enterprises including joint ventures. We are relying on domestic and foreign credit to establish these enterprises.

Our employers are making contribution to the development of democratisation, and are raising hopes that there is no turning back along the path we have chosen – the development of a market economy. In order to increase the role of our employers we must act effectively and receive resources so that we can competently carry out our functions. We have no institutes or machinery to attenuate the difficulties caused by unemployment and the drop in income. We are vividly aware of the shortage of managerial staff and skilled workers able to adapt to other types of production. We understand that in order successfully to pass through the transitional phase towards a market economy we will have to make considerable efforts. Above all, our entrepreneurs have a lot to learn.

I leave this rostrum with the hope that our problems are those of the transitional phase towards a market economy and that they will be borne in mind by the ILO and that it will contribute to the development of entrepreneurship in Mongolia.

Mr. LARSEN (representative of the International Confederation of Executive Staff) – On behalf of the International Confederation of Executive Staff I would like to offer my sincere congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President. Also I wish to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report, the contents of which will certainly inspire and initiate further developments on the very important theme of democratisation.

The recent developments in Central and Eastern Europe and other parts of the world have, as never before, reinforced the need to evaluate and discuss and implement all the ingredients involved in the process of democratisation at all levels of society. The breakdown of barriers and the removal of borders, and the building up of new democratic structures gives an added responsibility to all parties involved – governments, employers and trade unions.

The International Confederation of Executive Staff, who represent the employees who carry out tasks requiring a specific high level of responsibility, competence and professionalism in the management of the companies in which they act as representatives of the owners – but who are certainly at the same time employees – is ready to take part in the process of democratisation; it has already been involved in setting up a number of union structures in the former Eastern European countries, specifically dealing with managerial staff. At the same time, to obtain a true democratic representation it is important to underline the fact and to recognise the need for a pluralistic representation in order not to have a monopoly of interests. If we have that we go directly against the theme of democracy.

If that pluralistic approach is not established, there will be no true social dialogue which is crucial for the development and progress of democratic institutions and procedures of the labour market.

In the coming years we will also see more flexibility and mobility in our countries. Mobility is essential to the success of a market economy, and can only be obtained, as it is pointed out in the Report of the Director-General, in connection with a social dimension where the parties of the labour market through a social dialogue will be able to establish rules of labour law that create a visible network of rules and agreements to enable employees to work in different countries without losing already obtained rights.

Part of the democratisation process is also to establish bodies of information and consultation, especially now where we see more and more companies with a multi-national dimension. And employees will need to meet at regular intervals and at all levels, to be informed and consulted about the financial, technological and other plans of the multi-national companies.

A final theme of major concern to the International Confederation of Executive Staff, which is fundamental to the success of a market economy and the flexibility which this implies, is the establishment of training programmes. We fully support the Report in addressing this very important topic. However, we would like to point our that training is still oriented to a large degree to the requirements of national markets. But in order for it to be adapted to the new world business environment, we believe that it is not enough to recognise qualifications; it is necessary to gear training to the requirements of a large world market which will need employees and managerial staff trained to work in several countries. Only in emphasising training at all levels will a market economy succeed.

To conclude, the International Confederation of Executive Staff fully supports the Report of the Director-General. We would like to add, however, that in order to attain its objectives, the active and dynamic cooperation of all parties of the labour market and government is need.

Original – Italian: Mr. CHIARUZZI (Workers' delegate, San Marino) – I would like to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

As the Workers' delegate of San Marino, it is a great honour and pleasure for me to comment on the Report of the Director-General.

The question of democratisation has become extremely topical over the past few years because of the profound and sudden changes which have occurred in many different countries. The Director-General's Report presents us with a lucid and accurate analysis of the meaning of democratisation.

The foundations upon which the democratic process is based are social justice, peace and economic development. The International Labour Organisation is the principal organisation called upon to ensure that the process of democratisation unfolds as it should, especially through reliance on tripartism.

The protection of workers and adequate social security, must interact with the struggle against poverty and the process of industrial conversion, in a context of profound and constructive debate between the two sides of industry in order to reach the "balance" that is the crucial prerequisite for economic and social democracy.

After a period of confrontation between trade union organisations and employers in the Republic of San Marino, we now have a system of dialogue which at the end of last year led to the conclusion of an agreement which sets out various objectives and means for achieving a new system of industrial relations between the social partners.

The main principles of this new system of industrial relations are the active and responsible participation and information concerning all problems relating to the enterprise and the workers. In this context, we have reached an agreement on a joint statement by the trade union organisation and the private employers' organisation concerning a proposal for institutional reform in San Marino.

For the first time, we have been able to renew the collective agreement on the basis of collective bargaining alone, with excellent results both as regards pay and as regards standards. In particular, this agreement provides for instruments and means which will promote health and safety at work.

The objective of the trade unions of San Marino is to extend this new process of industrial relations, hoping that it will help us to overcome the traditional confrontation of social and political factions, and replace it with a system of active and responsible debate.

Still thanks to the new system of industrial relations, we have reached agreement on a new system of wages to replace the old sliding scale; it provides a guarantee of full compensation for loss of purchasing power as a result of inflation.

This novelty, introduces with the agreement of San Marino industry, has been extended to other sectors, including the public sector and pensions.

In concluding, I would like to reiterate and highlight the importance of the information provided in the Director-General's Report. The trade unions of Sans Marino believe that this information is vital for the social partners in countries experiencing complex and deep changes.

The programme of action and intervention of the International Labour Organisation is a vital benchmark in this context for all countries, and an important instrument for proclaiming the fundamental principles of democracy, peace and social justice.

Mr. JOEL (Government delegate, Papua New Guinea) – It is with great pleasure that I, as the leader of the Papua New Guinea delegation, join the previous distinguished speakers in conveying to the President, on behalf of the people and the Government of Papua New Guinea, our sincere congratulations on his election to the highest post of this Conference.

This year's 79th Session of the International Labour Conference is once again charged with a weighty agenda. However, I am confident that with the wealth of his experience and able leadership the Conference will achieve its objectives with ease.

Before proceeding any further, may I take this opportunity to extend our warmest greetings to the delegations of our fellow member States who have come to participate in the discussions of this Conference.

The Director-General of the ILO and the Office must also be applauded for the excellent Report which is very timely in the light of major political and economic developments of recent years around the globe, principally as far as the collapse of authoritarian regimes around the world is concerned. These events also serve as a timely warning to other governments around the globe to be reminded at all times of the basic human rights of their people.

Democratisation and democratic values have been and are being experienced and enjoyed in my country. In fact, I must warn here that too much democracy, as that experienced and enjoyed in my country, can also be disruptive and counter-productive so that what we should be searching for are systems of democracy which are controlled and restrained through full tripartism and participation.

To this effect, it is pleasing to note that the ILO, together with other international institutions, is willing to provide assistance to new brother democracies of our world. What our brothers and sisters in new democracies need today is enough democracy – not too much and not too little either.

Papua New Guinea is a relatively young democracy of the South Pacific. It has a population of just over 3.7 million people, scattered over about 500,000 square kilometres of plains, mountains and valleys, as well as hundreds of islands. With diverse cultures and over 700 different languages, Papua New Guinea has a unique system of democracy which is highly participatory through a system of decentralisation, involving 19 provincial governments, thus enabling our people to participate both directly and indirectly in governing their affairs.

Papua New Guinea, since political independence, has followed a democratic and participatory path to development. Multi-party elections every five years have ensured the freedom of our people to exercise their rights to choose each successive government.

The Government of Papua New Guinea is a staunch supporter and believer of the principle of democracy. Its ratification of several ILO Conventions concerning basic human rights bears witness to this fact.

Its ratification of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and its incorporation of this standard into its industrial legislation legitimises the existence of industrial organisations, whether of employers or workers.

In Papua New Guinea, with its capitalistic economic structure, the employers' objectives are principally to maximise profits, while the unions' interests are basically to maximise their shares of benefits derived from the sweat of their labour. Obviously, based on this, there exists a natural state of conflict between employers and workers. At the same time the Government also wants to develop the country as much as possible, given the resources at its disposal.

Our Government believes that Papua New Guinea, being a developing nation, cannot afford to allow conflict situations to threaten or continue to disrupt the peace and stability of our national development.

To reduce and restrain this tendency for conflict situations to arise, the Government has established a national tripartite consultative council which is charged with the responsibility of reviewing and improving existing labour policies and legislations. It also provides a venue whereby the three social partners gather in round-table consultations to settle major and prolonged disputes.

In practice, the development policies and practices of the Government are formulated bearing in mind the objectives of promoting and fostering the growth of the labour movement. The emphasis on integral human and rural development ensures that the majority of our people in the rural areas, as well as disadvantaged groups, are not left out. The promotion of a market economy in a stable industrial environment is generally intended to attract foreign assistance to develop our vast national resources.

It is not my wish to lead the Conference to believe that Papua New Guinea does not have any social and economic problems.

Like many other Third World nations, my country has its share of problems – unemployment, shortage of skilled manpower and law and order, to mention a few. The rapid increase in the discovery and development of our mineral resources – gold, copper and petroleum – are changing our social, economic and political lifestyles very rapidly. Our mineral boom in the last decade has resulted in the rapid introduction of modern technology into the most backward parts of our economy. This has prompted our Government to review existing policies or formulate new ones to cope with new situations and problems.

I now return to the themes of our discussion at this Conference. While we continue to look for solutions to the problems confronting our new brother democracies, we should never lose sight of the plights of Third World nations which are also struggling to find solutions to their own problems.

I now return to the themes of our discussion at this Conference. While we continue to look for solutions to the problems confronting our new brother democracies, we should never lose sight of the plights of Third World nations which are also struggling to find solutions to their own problems. The assistance intended for our new brother democracies, as mentioned in the Director-General's Report, are also most needed indeed in our Third World countries today.

Third World nations constitute the bulk of the member States of the ILO. This is in no small part due to the fact that international labour standards adopted by the ILO have proved to contribute positively to developments in all our countries.

The task of restoring normalcy at minimum social and economic costs to our new brother democracies is not an easy task. However, it is my Government's conviction and firm belief that through our international collaboration and cooperation, and by the invisible hands of God the Almighty, these countries will be able to pull through.

In this respect, therefore, the ILO together with other international agencies must continue to play a leading and continuing role in assisting our new brother democracies, including the rest of the Third World countries, in their every endeavour towards political and social stability as well as economic recovery and growth.

On our own economic restructuring, as insisted upon by the IMF and other international lending agencies, the Government in recent years adopted a national training policy established our National Training Council which, in turn, is aimed at coordinating all our training and retraining needs. I am, however, unable to share any lessons from our attempts to deal with the problems and needs of our own economic restructuring, as far as our human resource development needs are concerned, as the programme is still being established.

Finally, I again extend warm greetings to the Conference and to the ILO from my people and the Government of Papua New Guinea.

Mr. MAUNG (representative of the International Union of Food and Allied Workers' Associations) – It gives me pleasure to join other speakers in congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

First of all, on behalf of the trade union members and the democratic movement, I would like to thank the IUF for giving the Federation of Trade Unions of Burma, the honour to attend this Conference as an observer on their delegation and giving me the mandate to speak, the Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions (LO), the FES, the AFL-CIO, all the brothers of the ITS and the ICFTU for doing their utmost to get the Burma issue in the proper legitimate perspective.

As the only United Nations agency with a tripartite character comprising governments, employers and workers, who together cover all the population of a nation, this is the best meeting through which to send messages to all the 157 member nations. I will be speaking about Burma, hoping that this message will reach your peoples and your governments.

The theme for the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference is Democratisation and the ILO. It underscores the importance the Director-General attaches to democracy and the ILO's commitment to the processes of change that are taking place in many parts of the world today. Also in his Report, the Director-General has called on the international community to respond positively to recent political, economic and social changes in the world.

We would like to emphasise that democracy does not stop with political and civil rights but has also to be achieved in social rights, such as the right to freedom of association, the right to freedom of religion, trade unionism and equal opportunity in the distribution of wealth.

In Burma there is an elected Government. This Government won 92 per cent of the seats during the general election in May 1990 but has been denied the right to enter office by the junta which is using its troops as an effective anti-democratic machine. The military has imprisoned over 2,000 political activists, dismissed over 10,000 civil service personnel and has refused to release Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, the General Secretary of the National League for Democracy – the biggest opposition party – who nevertheless during her detention was awarded the 1990 Sakharov Prize for Freedom of Thought and the 1991 Nobel Peace Prize.

The junta, in violation of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No 98), has abolished all free trade unions and has warned the public services sector that anybody who tries to associate or make any move favourable to a free trade union is to be considered a traitor to the country.

Not stopping there, in violation of the right to freedom of religion and from oppression based on racism and culture, the junta has launched genocidal campaigns against ethnic minorities who live in the border areas. In their campaign, they have driven out no less than 200,000 of our Muslim brothers to Bangladesh, 20,000 of the Kachins to China, and more than 300,000 Karens, Mons and Burmese to Thailand.

Despotism has caused Burma, which used to hold 28 per cent of the world market in rice, to become a least developed country. Sad to say, during the years the junta has been in power, international agencies have reported that the production of opium has grown so much that Burma is now recognised as the world's largest exporter.

Although the GNP of the country has declined very badly, the strength of the military has grown to 280,000 from 180,000 in 1964. According to the Asian Week magazine, it has the 16th largest world population. And one important fact that can be seen regarding the growth of the military is that it is in direct proportion to the increase in the production of opium.

Nevertheless, in December 1990, in order to establish a democratic government in Burma, with respect to the wishes of the people who voted for them, some elected members of Parliament formed the National Coalition Government of the Union of Burma with the help and support of ethnic brothers who had been waging a fight against the junta for their rights and equality.

The union members, who were dismissed for their activities but were able to move away before the military jailed them, formed the Federation of Trades Unions of Burma (FTUB), and are seeking moral and physical help from the international brother unions and trade secretariats. As no rights whatsoever can be asked for before a democratic Government is governing the country, the FTUB is supporting and working in coordination with the true elected Government to establish a democratic system in Burma.

In the Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, it is stated that the junta has not sent in reports on seven cases that the Committee has asked for. On behalf of the union members of Burma, in accordance with the procedures for other international and regional instruments, I would like to urge the International Labour Office to communicate to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, for transmission to the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the violations in Burma in respect of freedom of association and of religious and cultural rights so that the United Nations General Assembly can take appropriate action.

In Chapter 6, reports on ratified Conventions, under practical applications, paragraph 135, page 44 – the Committee of Experts has noted that "provisions concerning sanctions to secure observance of measures taken under the provisions of Conventions taken to ensure their application are often inadequate because the sanctions laid down do not have a sufficiently dissuasive effect, particularly where violations of basic human rights are concerned." The Committee "once again draws attention to the importance of establishing effective sanctions and of adopting monetary penalties, particularly in countries with high rates of inflation, in order to ensure that they exert an effective preventive influence against acts contrary to the guarantees laid down by international labour Conventions."

Allow me to mention the International Commission of Jurists (ICJ) which reported in a speech at the 48th Session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in their report to the Chairman, that "neither under the international law nor the constitutional law of Myanmar has the State Law and Order Restoration Council (SLORC) any right to hold power after the people has expressed their wishes in favour of a National League for Democracy (NLD) Government".

With regard to the situations that I have described and the reports on Burma by the Committee of Experts, their insistence for effective sanctions, and the report of the ICJ, and in order to help build a democratic government that will uphold the rights of its people, we would like to appeal to the Director-General to urge all member States to:

1. As reported by the International Commission of Jurists, no longer recognise the junta and instead to recognise the "Legitimate Elected Government".

2. As indicated by the Committee of Experts, to impose effective trade sanctions and monetary penalties on the junta until they transfer power to the Government elected by the people which will uphold the Conventions and ratifications.

Before I conclude I would like to appeal to the delegates attending this session of the Conference to take the Burma issue back to your respective governments, employers' associations and unions and to help the democratic movement in Burma as much as you can.

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. Solorzano Martinez) – I give the floor to Mr. Elgar, Government adviser, Israel, to exercise his right of reply to Mr. Khoury, Government delegate, Lebanon, and Mr. Dajani, Employers' delegate, Jordan.

You know that the right of reply can refer only to the point under discussion; that it should be brief, not exceeding two minutes, and not give rise to further remarks. It should be worded in correct and parliamentary language. I would also like to say that in order to avoid endless debates, it has been a practice of Presidents not to allow replies to a reply.

Mr. ELGAR (Government adviser, Israel) – I refrained from making points of order while the Government delegate of Lebanon and the Employers' delegate from Jordan were making a mockery of this debate in order not to interrupt the conduct of this Conference.

The accusations, however, cannot remain unanswered. I understand the dilemma of the Lebanese delegate and commiserate with a country that is under virtual occupation by its Arab neighbour. However, as long as the Lebanese authorities are unable or unwilling to keep terrorist activities from their territories aimed at Israel and other Lebanese people, Israel will reluctantly but decisively have to take the necessary steps to curb that activity.

The Lebanese delegates has turned this Conference into a United Nations General Assembly political debate and he should have been reminded by the Chair that this is a debate on the Director-General's Report, nothing else.

The gentleman from Jordan was spewing hatred on quite a few counts and was referring specifically to Zionism – the liberation movement of the Jewish people – as backward and racist. This is not even fashionable any more as even the United Nations General Assembly has rescinded by a vast majority its infamous "Zionism equals racism" resolution of 1975. I do not understand why the delegate was not censored after referring time and again to the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in Judea, Samaria and Gaza. This contravenes the Selection Committee's ruling and I quote: "The Selection Committee decided to convene a special sitting… it being understood that speakers would have to confine their remarks… to this Appendix", in other words the Director-General's Report on the situation of those workers.

RATIFICATION OF CONVENTIONS BY AUSTRALIA

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) – Before we start this morning's work, I should like to ask the Clerk of the Conference to inform you of the ratification of a number of international labour Conventions.

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have pleasure in informing the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification by Australia of the following international labour Conventions: the Minimum Age (Sea) Convention (Revised), 1936 (No. 58); the Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92); and the Accommodation of Crews (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1970 (No. 133). The total number of ratifications of the International Conventions now comes to 5,691.

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I should like to inform the Conference that the Workers' delegate of Belgium, Mr. Peirens, and the Workers' delegate of Guatemala, Mr. Pinzón Salazar, have officially lodged a complaint against the Government of Côte d'Ivoire in accordance with article 26, paragraph 4, of the Constitution, alleging that Côte d'Ivoire has not respected the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). In accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, this complaint will be submitted to the Governing Body for its consideration.

NINTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) – The first item on the agenda today is the Ninth Report of the Selection Committee which is found in Provisional Record No. 6H. This report has been given us by the Chairman of the Selection Committee and includes only some changes in the composition of the Committees. I put it to you for adoption.

(The report is adopted.)

SECOND REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) – The second item on the agenda is the Second Report of the Credentials Committee which appears in Provisional Record No. 16. I give the floor to Mr. Pérez del Castillo, Government delegate, Uruguay, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit the Second Report of his Committee.

Original – Spanish: Mr. PEREZ DEL CASTILLO (Government delegate, Uruguay; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the Second Report of the Credentials Committee which, in addition to bringing up to date the information contained in the First Report on the composition of the Conference, contains the decisions of the Committee on objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of El Salvador, on the objection concerning the nomination of one of the Workers' advisers of Malaysia, and on an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Nicaragua.

This Second Report also refers to certain communications. The first relates to the delegation of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; the second to the Government delegation of Haiti; a third communication has been sent by the *Conseil national du patronat tchadien (*the Chadian Employers' National Council) which is also dealt with in this report.

Since the report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, in accordance with Article 26, paragraph 5(b) of the Standing Orders, the Conference is called upon only to take note of it. It is published, as has been stated, in Provisional Record No. 16, starting on page 42 in the English version.

The Third Report will probably be adopted this afternoon, and will be submitted to the Conference shortly. There have been a considerable number of complaints but the Committee has been working hard and we hope to complete our work in the next few days.

Original — French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) — The Report of the Credentials Committee has been adopted unanimously by the Committeee and the Conference is simply called upon to take note of it.

(The report is noted.)

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERED) – We now take up the discussion on the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland) – I wish to congratulate the President and the Vice-Chairman on their election. I also wish to congratulate the Director-General on the choice of the theme of his Report, but I am less enthusiastic about its content. At this point in time, the case for ILO action must be based on solid and balanced arguments. This concerns particularly the role of the workers' and employers' organisations, their mutual relations and their relationship with the State.

In the first chapter of the Report, in the section entitled "Democracy", it is said that in the opinion of the countries in transition, "the free operation of supply and demand in markets open to international competition is alone capable of ensuring efficiently the production and distribution of goods and services".

Is this really the only way, without any qualifications? I have always thought that more is needed for the economy to work, and for it to work for the good of the people.

The Report goes on to talk about the function of the State as a regulator of economic activity. But it does not introduce here the importance of action by all components of a democratic society when they work together. It would be appropriate to make a strong statement on the need to have the policy approach and the institutions – tripartite, when necessary – which ensure a market economy with social justice, protection of the weak and respect of the obligation to achieve full employment.

The Report quite rightly focuses on fundamental human and trade union rights. There has been a large wave of democratisation, shaking and refreshing all continents. But there are still notable exceptions which we have on several occasions identified in the ILO – countries such as Malawi and Malaysia, which either resist democracy or interpret it in a distorted way.

According to the section "Transition towards the market economy", in Chapter 2 of the Report, the ILO's assistance will focus on the development of a network of mainly small and medium-sized enterprises. I sincerely hope that this will be read and fully understood in the context of a resolution on the role of enterprises in employment creation, which this Conference will be asked to adopt next week. We have to note that there is more to transition than enterprise creation, management training and redeployment programmes.

There is the whole issue of a social and legal infrastructure, investment and industrial policies, and the problem of ensuring that people do have confidence in a better, not bleaker, future in a foreseeable time-frame.

The section entitled "Enterprise creation" leads me into asking: should the ILO really see small business as the spearhead of democracy? I can agree with the importance of encouraging the creation and expansion of small and medium-sized enterprises. Almost all over the world, the stimulation of larg firms creates, relatively speaking, fewer new jobs directly, and we have come to limits beyond which it i difficult for any State physically to create new rea jobs.

But could we please focus our discussion a bi more on how the entrepreneurial approach and skill for enterprise development could be linked to innovation, involvement and joint efforts by managemen and workers – respecting international labour standards and making full use of collective bargaining There is more to success than only the entrepreneu and encouraging her or his activities and state o mind.

My problem with the section on tripartism is tha if we reduce its message to the bare essentials, it say something like this: firstly, employers' organisatio play a prominent role, are the driving force, stimulate individual initiative, improve managemen competence and provide vocational training; and secondly, trade unions continue to have problems even outright collision with the State, their reconstitution is on the agenda, they suffer extensive fragmentation, and they should find the way to us wisely their newly acquired liberties so that they d not upset stability.

Much of this is certainly true. Employers' organisations have to be promoted, and trade unions ar restructuring themselves. At the same time, this is patronising message which is not altogether helpful It leaves the State almost as omnipotent as before

In speaking on the role of the State, the Repor does say that it should take counsel with the socia partners, understand them, convince them, an hence negotiate with them. For countries which ar emerging from totalitarian systems, and where th attitudes formed by these systems have by no mean disappeared, one message could have been clearer the State must also respect the independence of th other actors, help them to become organised an stronger, and accept the limits to its power.

Speaking about collective bargaining, the Repor appears to take a straightforward position, endorsin almost full scale a particularly complicated concept the decentralisation of negotiations. When structure have been overcentralised, there is an understandable need to find a balance between all levels of bargaining: the central, the industry-wide and the loca levels, including the enterprise level. Decentralisation will be necessary, but we cannot say that it alon provides for successful adjustment. Other element and a right mix of policies will be needed for that Besides, the Report itself notes that in many countries the parties have as of yet no real experience o collective bargaining.

In conclusion, I wish to acknowledge the Repor as a significant input in the discussion on democratisation, but I am somewhat disappointed that its arguments rely so much on the automatic functioning o the markets. For instance, I would welcome mor discussion on something which is important for th success of the ILO's future activities: the relationshi between encouraging enterprise development an the development of employers' organisations. Th Report seems to take for granted that they go han in hand. I should think so, but I am not convince that this will automatically be the case if there is n corresponding development of tripartite and bipartite institutions and arrangements.

I have made these remarks in this general debate with the sincere hope that they can, for their part, contribute to the further discussions in this Organisation on the problems of democratisation, tripartism, the role of the social partners and structural adjustment.

Mr. BATUBARA (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia) – The choice of democratisation as the main topic of our deliberations is considered very timely in view of the unprecedented changes in the global political and economic environment. In the past few years the world witnessed blocs and bloc politics yielding to multipolarism and a growing trend towards democratisation and political pluralism, both within and among nations. In this regard, my delegation fully appreciates the Director-General's comprehensive Report, Democratisation and the ILO.

Such changes are giving an unprecedented impetus to the promotion of democratic societies all over the world, and are creating a more conducive environment for the community of nations to minimise international conflicts and to promote better cooperation among nations, although regretfully this has not always been the case in the past.

Democracy is not just about giving people the right to vote. Democracy is an interrelated political, economic and socio-cultural concept. In order to build strong democratic political institutions, we cannot ignore the need to strengthen the economic and socio-cultural infrastructures which are their foundation. Although, as an idea, democracy is cherished by all – men and women alike – its existence cannot be taken for granted. There should be a continuous and systematic effort to build and develop it and to make it a way of life. While it is widely recognised that democracy encompasses principles which are of a universal nature we shall not lose sight of the fact that the expression of democracy will vary from country to country in accordance with their respective political, socio-economic, cultural and historical backgrounds. It is also widely recognised that freedom constitutes one of the elements of democracy. However, we should not overemphasise its importance, because we believe that freedom without legitimate public order will bring about chaotic situations, and this eventually works against the promotion of democracy.

In that light we fully concur with the view expressed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations that if there is no development without democracy, there can also be no democracy without development. Democracy is an empty slogan if the people are hungry. The ability of a society to satisfy the basic needs of its population is important for the development of the democratic political process. Development is therefore a key to successful democratisation. In fact, development in its fullest sense incudes development of adequate political infrastructures and democratic institutions, in addition to economic, social and cultural aspects.

It is in the sense of this multidimensional development that we in Indonesia affirm the responsability of our nation to pursue democracy while also affirming its right to pursue development. Within this framework, we have been striving for this ideal for the past 25 years, through a succession of five-year development plans. While the emphasis is on economic growth, political development, however – including the development of democratic institutions – is indeed given serious attention. As in the case of many developing countries, the challenge we are facing is how to combine democracy with continued stability and economic growth. So far, the overall results are encouraging.

Only last week, over 117 million Indonesian voters exercised their right to vote in a periodical and free general election. What was seen by foreign observers as a peaceful, orderly and generally good-natured election in a country as large and diverse as Indonesia actually resulted from a long process and regular practice over the past 25 years. The holding of general elections is a part of our conscious effort to build a democratic culture, which is an essential element for the functioning of all democratic governments.

Based on our experience, there is a growing awareness that democracy can only be nurtured and function effectively if it is supported by an adequate information system. Its is therefore imperative that efforts should be made to establish a more equitable global information and communication order, so as to give access to information to the developing countries.

Human resources development as a vehicle to improve the capabilities of human resources is equally important for the promotion of democratisation. Our priority in the forthcoming people-centred development plans is to further expand human resources development programmes, together with the increased provision of facilities for public services in the areas of health, education, clean water and the basic needs of society, and these activities combined will eventually improve the quality of human beings.

The ideal proclaimed in the Declaration of Philadelphia that all human beings should have "the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity" remains the concern of all peoples, in the developed and developing countries. In fact, this resembles what is currently known as the right to development. It is really hard to imagine how a nation could counter the destructive forces impeding the promotion of democracy and the observance of human rights if a portion of humanity cannot free itself from the misery of poverty and underdevelopment.

The emphasis given by developing countries to the right to development reflects the priority of development to be pursued in order to implement basic human rights and fundamental freedoms, encompassing both civil and political rights, as well as economic, social and cultural rights, as embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other relevant international instruments. Although those rights are increasingly recognised as indivisible, we have, however, noted a persistent side-tracking of the economic, social and cultural aspects, while civil and political aspects of human rights were invoked as a conditionality for extending economic and social development assistance. These practices not only undermine the need for a balanced approach to human rights, but also weaken the positive correlation which exists between the various efforts towards democratisation, the promotion of human rights and development.

In an interdependent world such as we have today, the strenuous effort towards the promotion of democracy, the full observance of human rights and the promotion of development at the national level could not be isolated, and should event be supported by the process of establishing democratisation at the international level. Efforts should be galvanised in order to establish fairer and more equitable labour relations. New global partnerships between governments, employers and workers at international level should also be forged – a partnership in which rights and obligations are equitably shared by all, a global partnership based on a renewed and improved division of labour between governments, employers and workers and an equally improved sharing of benefits as well as efforts between them.

The promotion of democratisation at the international level also requires a more conducive global environment. We are seriously concerned at the increasingly difficult international external economic environment, mainly as the consequence of the negative economic policies and practices of some industrialised countries, obstructing economic development in the developing countries at a time when economic reforms and adjustments are being pursued. The developing countries are continuously crippled by debt burdens, strapped for development finance, denied access to developed countries' markets due to increased protectionism and impeded by the persistent decline of primary commodity prices. A more conducive global environment could only be created if the international community were able to reverse the above-mentioned trends. This will eventually assist the international community in promoting democratisation at the international level, and at the same time help member countries in realising their respective democratisation at the national level.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MARTINEZ NOVAL (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Spain) – Please allow me first of all to congratulate the President for his election and for his excellent leadership of our deliberations, and to express the satisfaction of my Government over the fact that the presidency should be held by a citizen of Portugal, a country with which we have special ties of friendship.

The Director-General in his Report proposes that we should give some thought to the process of democratisation which is taking place in many countries of the world, and on the role of the ILO in this process.

This context is defined by the opening of new democratic spaces on all the continents, restoring the ideals of freedom, justice and law in many countries.

The dismantling of physical and ideological walls, the redrawing of borders, the change of the political and economic regimes and the transformation of military structures and alliances are signs which encourage the hope for greater openness.

Though the world has never before been so deeply convinced of the need to implement these principles, there are still numerous obstacles to obtain their consolidation and preservation.

Ethnic tensions, economic crises, the resurgence of racism, the emergence of new forms of marginalisation or social exclusion are negative factors which make it necessary for us to give further thought to the means of attaining new balances which will match the advance of democracy, economic development and social progress.

This ambivalence is of course present in that part of Europe which has witnessed the rebirth of democracy, but which unfortunately is also experiencing fragmentation due to the reappearance of nationalistic excesses, accompanied by a violence which we thought had gone forever.

But at the same time and within our continent, the process of consolidation of the European Community which advances, not without some difficulties, and the recent creation of the European Economic Area are positive facts, complemented by the Maastricht Treaty and, in particular, its Protocol on social policy. The Spanish government firmly supports both of these instruments.

In the Ibero-American area, in a year which is so significant for us, we see that the process of democratisation is being consolidated, and that the countries of Latin America have not only recovered their democratic practices during the last few years but have started important processes of stabilisation and economic reform.

The same trend is also evident in Africa, where apartheid is being dismantled, and in Asia, where peace agreements have been concluded and where new horizons are opening up for democracy in the newly industrialised countries.

Hence the importance of the Report of the Director-General on the role of States and the role of the ILO on three main questions: basic social rights, the social dimension of the market economy and tripartism.

Please allow me to share with you a few thoughts on these three questions in the light of the experience of Spain.

As regards fundamental social rights, many of you know that my government has sent to the Spanish Parliament a Bill to regulate the right to strike and collective disputes, complementing the provisions of the Constitution of 1978 in the field of labour and development which promote freedom of association and collective bargaining.

While framing regulations on the exercise of the right to strike, we kept in mind the decisions of the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association. Thus, the Bill includes broad concepts and not a purely contractual approach to the right to strike, linking it with the safeguarding of the interests of workers. It recognises the right to strike of public servants, lays down administrative and judicial measures to protect its exercise, and promotes the establishment of self-regulation machinery for fixing limits to the right to strike, which ensure the maintenance of the essential services of the community.

In this connection I would like to point out that the powers which the Bill grants to the governing authorities in the field of minimum services are intended to provide a means of monitoring the suitability of what has been agreed by the parties or of rectifying the absence of such agreement. Therefore responsible exercise by the social partners of their negotiating powers regarding strikes in essential services will make it possible to decrease significantly the role which has been played in Spain so far by the government in this field.

I would also like to point out that this Bill incorporates the provisions of the Voluntary Conciliation and Arbitration Recommendation, 1951 (No 92). Along these lines the new text submitted to the Spanish Parliament with a view to contributing to rationalising labour disputes by giving greater powers to collective autonomy is not limited to regulating the time of the strike but makes available to the parties voluntary and non-jurisdictional channels for solutions based upon negotiations and the intervention of third parties.

The Report of the Director-General also deals with the role of social protection in the democratisation process, raising in other words the need to endow the market economy with the social dimension.

My understanding is that to achieve this aim it is not enough to have a firm political will or energetic social pressure. It is essential to have an efficient production system and a solid economy as well as a society which is sufficiently prepared to provide the necessary effort and solidarity, coupled with the need for a considerable capacity for political administrative management of the elements making up the social fabric.

My Government recently restructured the measures to promote employment and protection against unemployment by increasing the minimum duration of temporary contracts and steering public aid towards the promotion of contracts of indefinite duration.

The reform of the unemployment protection system, which will not effect the level of coverage and which is designed to achieve the financial balance of the system, modifies the amount of benefits and their duration, in order to ensure that such benefits do not discourage the search for employment.

The third question raised by the Director-General in his Report is the strengthening of tripartism and collective bargaining.

Those of us who in the recent past have had to go through processes of democratic transition, and at the same time economic reforms, know the importance of the social dialogue and tripartism in the success of this multiple and difficult exercise. Even though we know ourselves how impossible it is to transplant political institution experiences from one country to another, we still venture to assert the existence of close links between social tripartism and democratic consolidation.

The establishment of these links can also prove fruitful for the countries which have freely decided to transform their previous systems of planned economies and move towards new market-oriented structures. This, of course, is a radical challenge, which will certainly require new social structures as a consequence of freedom of association and of the existence of other fundamental social rights which are the unmistakable signs of a democratic identity.

In this connection it is up to the ILO to heed the requests for technical assistance by the new democracies and to coordinate the bilateral initiatives agreed upon by the Member countries in this field.

For tripartism to develop fully its role as a moderator and agent of reform it has to be assumed without any reservation by the social partners. Social consensus, which is the most complete expression of tripartism, is a firm support for democracy and an effective instrument to balance the functioning of the economy; its success, however, depends upon the existence in each of the parties participating in this process of a reciprocal spirit of mutual concession and preliminary consensus on the final objectives, which are those of an advanced democracy.

These criteria, applicable to a greater or lesser extent to all countries, will have to be especially taken into account by a European country such as Spain, which is facing the challenge of economic convergence and social cohesion, and whose Government wants this important and difficult task to be accomplished with a maximum degree of social consensus.

Finally, the analysis of the processes of democratisation proposed to us by the Director-General of the ILO is one further opportunity to think about the ways in which all nations can move towards sustained economic growth and the generalised improvement of the conditions of life and work of their citizens.

Mr. JONATHAN (Workers' delegate, Lesotho) – It gives me great pleasure to address the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the workers of Lesotho. Please allow me to congratulate the President, together with other Officers leading this session of the Conference, on the very mature manner which they have shown so far.

I would like to thank and congratulate the Director-General on his thought-provoking Report, Democratisation and the ILO. I am particularly happy when he admits that unions have often channelled the discontent of populations deprived of representative political parties. Trade unions are the social conscience of the State, even where there are political parties operating. I am pleased to inform you that after the military takeover in 1986, we are now promised fair and free general elections in November this year. The ILO and other organisations have a particularly vital role in the struggle for democracy.

I appreciate the Director-General's advice to the social partners that if they wish for democracy, the workers' organisations should be in a position to promote their members' interests vigorously; their action will be directed to employment-related interests of their members. The choice of policy, especially of an economic policy, affects the life of the workers. The trade unions, like employers, should therefore have a chance to express their opinions on their country's economic and social policy.

At this point, I should like to refer to international labour standards. Despite many warnings made by the ILO Committee of Experts, Lesotho has not repealed or amended those laws that run contrary to the ILO Conventions and Recommendations. For instance, as regards freedom of association, Lesotho has not reviewed the laws that hedge on the freedom of association, e.g. the Essential Services Arbitration Act, the Internal Security General Act as amended. With respect to equality of rights, the labour movement of Lesotho has participated in the regional workshops, seminars, etc., dealing with the question of discrimination. Furthermore, the draft Labour Code which was drawn up in conjunction with ILO experts in 1988 has not been enacted as a law, despite many promises made by the Lesotho Government. Finally, concerning employment and development, we are not in a position to report informatively on employment and development policies pursued by our Government, in the absence of information shared amongst the social partners.

Turning to structural adjustment and employment, we are aware that the Government has adopted the Economic Structural Adjustment Programme, but we know nothing about the nature of this package as no information was communicated to us during the adoption and implementation of the ESAP. The workers and other disadvantaged groups have witnessed the erosion of their wages, brought about by inflation through increasing prices of consumer goods.

As far as promotion in the rural and informal sectors is concerned, we are not aware of any policies and programmes intended to raise employment and incomes in these sectors. What we have witnessed are exorbitant fees levied on the informal sector.

What is more, due to the economic recession experienced by the mining industry of the Republic of South Africa, many Basotho mineworkers have been retrenched and repatriated to Lesotho. They have joined the ranks of the unemployed and the informal sector is growing at an alarming rate.

We recommend that the ILO migrant labour project should be reviewed. This exercise will be easier as we have one national labour centre at the moment.

As regards enterprises and cooperative development, Lesotho has inherited the outdated and outmoded cooperative laws from the former colonial power. The cooperatives are run more or less as departments of government ministries. We think it is high time that the laws dealing with cooperatives were revised. ILO could provide technical assistance in this regard.

My next subject is vocational training. The labour centre conducted an in-service training programme with the help of the Lerotholi Polytechnic up to last year, when the Technical and Vocational Division was formed within the Ministry of Education. The management board of the Technical and Vocational Division is tripartite in composition.

With respect to vocational rehabilitation, a number of non-governmental organisations have rehabilitation centres at which the disabled persons are trained in various skills.

We have also participated in various training programmes conducted by the International Training Centre of the ILO, Turin.

As regards industrial relations and labour administration, we participated last year in the regional tripartite seminar dealing with tripartism. We are still expecting ARLAC to hold a national seminar on tripartism in Lesotho, as promised last year.

As far as multinational enterprises are concerned, no progress has been made in the adoption of the ILO Declaration on Multinational Enterprises.

With respect to occupational safety and health, an ILO expert on occupational health and safety has been attached, as from last year, to the Department of Labour. A workshop has been held this year, and we hope to embark on a training programme later this year.

As far as hotels and tourism are concerned, Lesotho has not ratified the Working Conditions (Hotels and Restaurants) Convention, 1991 (No. 172), and its accompanying Recommendation No. 179. We hope that the technical advisory missions engaged in training surveys, and so on, will be sent to Lesotho.

Finally, as regards the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of the employer, we have experienced situations in which enterprises have simply vanished, leaving behind them numerous creditors, including employees whose claims have never been paid.

We therefore recommend that a Convention should be adopted to protect workers in the event of enterprises being declared bankrupt.

Mrs. OHRSVIK (representative of the Nordic Council) – As the representative of the Nordic Council, which is the parliamentary body of cooperation between the Parliaments and Governments of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, as well as the autonomous territories of Greenland, the Faroe Islands and the Ahvenmaa Islands, I wish to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report.

The board view the Report gives of the issues confronting us is a reminder of our international interdependence. The challenges have certainly not become easier since last year. Education and training policies related to employment and general development policies are promoted by many governments in order to maintain productivity and competitiveness.

The Report mentions a number of ILO activities aiming at vocational training for new technologies, as well as vocational rehabilitation, issues which have become even more important given the present situation on the labour market.

We are very pleased to read about the activities of the Eastern and Central European countries engaged in the transition to a market economy, and that their efforts to organise new labour markets and to implement an overall employment policy are guided by ILO standards on the social protection of workers and supported by technical cooperation, especially in the drafting of employment legislation and the organisation of employment services, in consultation with employers' and workers' organisations. This is a new area of cooperation for all of us.

In the Nordic Council, which consists of 87 members from the Nordic Parliaments, elected by the Parliaments in proportion to the strength of the party groups, we focus our interest on the areas closest to us.

At this year's session, the Council adopted a comprehensive Recommendation on "The Nordic region in the new Europe", based on a number of proposals from both the Governments and party groups to the Nordic Council of Ministers and the Governments.

As regards the Baltic Sea and the Baltic States, the Council urges the Governments to develop cooperation mainly relating to environmental issues, sustainable development and industrial policy, and to form part of a broader north European region.

The main body of the Recommendation concerns how cooperation within Norden as a region can best be adapted to take account of the current integration process in Europe, and thus to secure opportunities for the more vigorous and more ambitious development of regional Nordic cooperation.

The Council thus recommends the Governments to make a commitment to a Nordic industrial policy action plan, aimed at improving the economy and employment, including measures to coordinate and strengthen industrial policy, infrastructure, information and communications in our region.

A major part of our Recommendation deals with the same issues as the Director-General's Report. Thus, the Council urges the Governments to work towards the high-level harmonisation of European rules. We also recommend them to seek to develop and create understanding for and endorsement of what we call "the Nordic social model" in a broader European context, including important areas such as labour market policies aimed at full employment, equality between sexes, environmental standards, working environment regulations and social welfare arrangements.

This concept, "the Nordic social model", refers to both social policy and labour market policy and bears a resemblance to the tripartite structure of the ILO. It is also a strong support for the ILO principles relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining.

This year, the Council recommended an extension of the Nordic Working Environment Convention to include the right to training for skills and qualifications and workers participation.

It should also be pointed out that this "Nordic model", which includes social welfare in the broadest sense – in contrast to the European model which ties social benefits to association with the labour market – should be seen as an essential part of our comparative advantage compared to the rest of the world. This is so because the general system of social security and the well-developed and publically financed care for infants and the elderly make it possible for almost everybody to seek employment. It also creates stability on the labour market and makes any necessary structural adjustments easier to accomplish, as the labour force can move geographically or between professions without risking a loss of social security. A key element in the effectiveness of the "the Nordic model" is the high percentage of participation by the labour force in trade unions, and the national importance of collective bargaining. Our social traditions and our legislation support the binding force of centrally negotiated agreements between unions and management.

It is interesting that similar models are being discussed within the European Community, using arguments much like those in the Nordic debate. But our aims in the Nordic countries are set higher. Most important is our political will to maintain full employment.

Next week the Social Committee, of which I am the Chairman, will receive reports on the labour market situation and policies in the Nordic countries. We thus monitor the Governments' activities closely, especially as regards young people.

In conclusion, I wish to express my gratitude for this opportunity to present some Nordic views on some of the items before the Conference and wish the ILO continued success in its important work.

Mr. CAPELO (Deputy Minister of Labour, Canada) – My delegation would like to congratulate the Director-General for the very timely theme he has chosen for his Report to this Session of the Conference. We are living through an extraordinary moment in history characterised by a powerful worldwide movement towards democracy. We have watched in amazement as the ideas of freedom, individual rights and private enterprise have penetrated areas of the globe once thought to be impervious to such notions.

As the Director-General eloquently outlines in his Report, democracy is a dynamic and multifaceted process. It is based on the recognition that legitimate power is rooted in the will of people and the rule of law.

The ballot box is the most important symbol of democracy, but as a political philosopher, John Stuart Mill, warned more than a century ago, a political act to be done only once in a few years, and for which nothing in the daily habits of the citizen has prepared him, is not enough to create a real democratic culture.

Democracy means, not only freely-elected political institutions, but also widespread and effective participation in the economic and social life of the community. Democracy involves pluralism and the establishment of free institutions, such as a free press, free trade unions and employers' associations.

Democracy necessarily implies respect for human rights. This is a principle to which the Canadian government unreservedly subscribes.

In 1990 the Government of Canada set up the International Centre for Human rights and Democratic Development which has, as its function, the support of democracy and respect for human rights. This Centre sponsors research and conferences and has as its essential task to offer technical and financial assistance for democratisation.

(The speaker continues in English.)

The Government of Canada has also set up a task force on Eastern and Central Europe. Within the last two years the task force has undertaken over 80 projects worth some $8 million in support of democracy, of good government and respect for human rights. One of the projects sponsored by the task force has been the organisation by the ILO, last February, of a managerial training study tour for employers for a number of Central and Eastern European countries.

In his Report, the Director-General is seeking the views of the Conference on what the ILO can and should do to assist its member States which are engaged on the road towards democratisation. He also raises the question of how the ILO can adapt to current realities so as to ensure its continuing relevance.

These are important questions and my delegation welcomes the opportunity to participate in this debate.

We agree with the Director-General that to meet this new challenge, the ILO must reassess its means of action. In this regard we fully support the Director-General's proposal to use more integrated, multidisciplinary approaches and to decentralise ILO activities. This will increase the ability of the Organisation to respond more quickly and more effectively to the numerous requests for assistance from the new democracies.

(The speaker continues in French.)

We also point out that at this stage in its development the ILO should concentrate less on the enactment of new detailed international labour standards and focus more on promoting the implementation of the basic principles within existing Conventions.

(The speaker continues in English.)

Thanks to its unique tripartite structure, the ILO is a concrete example of pluralism and democracy in action. The ILO is thus in a position to make a very significant contribution to the process of democratisation. It can assist in the drafting of labour legislation, in the establishment of free trade unions and employers' organisations, in the implementation of systems of collective bargaining, in the design and delivery of management training programmes, and in the development of labour market policies.

In many of the countries involved, the transition to market economies will require major structural adjustment measures. As noted by the Director-General such measures can, at least in the beginning, increase poverty and create tension and this can threaten the process of democracy. We therefore welcome the intention of the ILO of increasing its collaboration with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank to seek ways of mitigating the negative effects of adjustment policies.

The ILO's efforts to promote tripartism can also assist in the development of the social cohesion which is needed to foster broad-based support for policies of economic and social development. The ILO should also encourage workers and employers to engage in national bipartite collaboration in the search for solutions to common problems.

In my country the government has for several years encouraged and facilitated the establishment of joint labour-management bodies to address issues of training, structural adjustment and technological change on an industry-wide basis. This has led to very active and effective bipartite structures in such diverse industries as steel, electronics, wood products, construction and maritime shipping. We would be prepared to share our experience.

One essential aspect of economic and social development is the effective utilisation of a nation's human resources. This presupposes workplaces which are free of discrimination. We strongly support the ILO's intention to promote implementation of the Convention on discrimination in employment and to put special emphasis on equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women workers. The promotion of women's equality is a prerequisite to the development of democratic societies. A society cannot be said to protect human rights if it does not respect fully the rights of half of its population.

The process of democratisation is complex, difficult and at times fragile. The ILO has done much in the past to promote and defend democratic values. The challenges it faces today are enormous, but I am confident that the ILO will continue to be equal to the task.

Mr. MUSA (Minister of Labour and Productivity, Nigeria) – I wish, on behalf of my delegation and the Government of the Federal Republic of Nigeria, to join earlier speakers in congratulating the President and his Officers on their election to direct the deliberation of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

There have been phenomenal socio-economic and political changes in all parts of the world since we gathered here for the 78th Session of this Conference in 1991. Many of these changes have had a great impact on the lives of peoples in different societies of the world. African countries in particular have continued to experience difficult economic conditions, with resultant adverse effects on working lives and the work environment on the continent. This grim situation notwithstanding, the leaders of Africa are showing greater determination in finding lasting solutions to the myriad socio-economic problems that presently bedevil our continent.

Allow me to comment on an aspect of the Director-General's Report which deals with the role of the ILO in the process of democratisation. It is noteworthy that the focus of the ILO is being expanded to include the promotion of democratic principles and ideals in member States. I recall that, since its founding, the ILO has doggedly taken upon itself the task of fighting unemployment, poverty, and unsatisfactory working conditions. Although I believe that significant achievements have been recorded in these areas, a great proportion of mankind continues to eye out an existence in the most pathetic conditions of material deprivation. In my view, the direction of resources to democratisation places the ILO in an eminent position to promote social concertation and a pluralistic environment for all segments of our various societies, so as to find solutions to the social and economic problems facing our various countries.

This focus is also welcomed in view of the close relationship between political instability (which thrives when democratic principles are not allowed to grow and develop naturally) and social inequalities. I hasten to add that this expansion of the ILO's work is complementary to the principles of tripartism which is characteristic of our Organisation. It is equally complementary to our longstanding promotion of democratic principles in trade unions and labour-management relations. Consequently, I have no doubt whatsoever that the pursuit of democratisation by the ILO will serve to further entrench the culture of consultation, dialogue and popular participation not only in industrial relations but also in society as a whole.

In Nigeria, we have drawn up a comprehensive transition programme aimed at achieving democratically elected government. This programme is currently being pursued vigorously by the present military administration and it is at its last lap, as we barely have six months before the hand-over of power to a democratically elected government. Our commitment to democratisation is predicated on the belief that the human rights of every citizen should be not only acknowledged but respected as well. This would seem inevitable if our collective energies, which are vital for promoting rapid economic recovery and sustained growth, are not to be dissipated on anti-government campaigns. In essence, the programme of transition to civilian rule embarked upon by my Government was largely informed by this experience. Some aspects of this transition programme might appear justifiably unique to Nigeria. This is so because our evolving democratic system has taken due account of the history, diverse culture and pluralistic political beliefs of our population. In addition, it is being pursued of our own volition without any external pressure.

At this juncture, permit me to highlight some aspects of Nigeria's programme of transition to civil rule. Based on our past experience, we have designed the transition programme to be gradual, purposeful and effective in order to lay a good foundation for a new set of values and for a political attitude and culture capable of enabling us to usher in a new social order. Consistent with this determination, the transition programme took off with the inauguration of a Political Bureau, which was charged with the task of monitoring debates on the problems of past attempts at democratic government in the country. Based on the report submitted by the Bureau, the Government set in motion the machinery for the implementation of the transition programme.

The democratisation process also involved a review of the country's Constitution, which becomes fully effective at the end of this year. It has provisions for the creation of new institutions that would lead us to the society of our dreams, where social justice and peace prevail. One of these institutions is the Directorate of Mass Mobilisation for Self-reliance, Social Justice and Economic Recovery, which aims at undertaking a planned and sustained campaign that will inculcate positive and desirable social and political values in our people. The campaign will also reduce, if not eliminate, destabilising factors in the nation's politics. Furthermore, my Government has also established a National Electoral Commission to organise, conduct and supervise the election of candidates of the two recognised political parties.

The structural organisation of the two-party system is based on grass-roots support for the emergence of political parties that will give equal rights and opportunities to participate in the political process without any hindrance to all Nigerians. It is gratifying to note that the National Electoral Commission, acting under its mandate, has recently and successfully conducted elections at the local and state government levels. Elections to the National Assembly and for the President are scheduled to be held before the end of this year.

My Government has also taken decisive steps in the field of political education. It has set up a Centre for Democratic Studies (CDS) to nurture a new political culture and new attitudes through sustained and regular training, workshops, seminars and conferences that will expose the political elite to the values and demands of democratic governance. Since the establishment of the Centre in 1989, it has made enormous contributions to the transition programme by organising workshops and seminars for political parties at various levels, as well as for local government chairmen and councillors, and the newly elected state governors and legislators. The training programme of the CDS is focused on the powers, functions and obligations of elected officials as well as the relationship between the three branches of government.

Nigeria is irrevocably committed to the survival of democratic norms and values. This commitment explains why various guidelines, laws and ideas have been adopted in order to start a new socio-political course that will enhance our development process. We realise the magnitude of the task we have set for ourselves, and we are encouraged by the support of the majority of Nigerians, who have demonstrated keen interest in all efforts to entrench democracy in the country.

As the ILO now intends to focus attention on the advancement of democracy in member States, it is my belief and hope that its programme of activities in this direction will be worked out cautiously to eliminate fear of undue interference in the internal affairs of member States. Nigeria, for its part, would welcome technical assistance provided through the Centre for Democratic Studies in the areas of manpower development for the newly elected legislators and political party officials. We also welcome logistic and material support for the electoral supervision body, as well as the strengthening of workers' education with the aim of sustaining the democratisation process.

Finally, I enjoin you to give full support to the bright initiative of the Director-General in making the advancement of democracy one of the ILO's future activities. It is a positive response to the dramatic democratic changes that our world is currently undergoing, and I hope that member States will give adequate support to the Organisation in this important area of concern.

Original – Arabic: Mr. RASHED (Workers' delegate, Egypt) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like, on behalf of the workers of Egypt and on my own behalf, to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, as well as the other Officers of the Conference. I hope that the work of the Conference will be crowned with success and that we shall achieve positive results, thus allowing us to realise the noble aims of the International Labour Organisation and build a world in which democracy, social justice and peace prevail.

I am extremely honoured, as President of the Egyptian Trade Union Federation – the largest trade union in my country – to be addressing this Conference for the first time. I was privileged to hold this position several months after the beginning of a new four-year period following trade union elections. These elections bear witness to the democratic nature of the trade union movement in Egypt and have proven that trade unions are capable of installing democracy in a Third World country. The State and social forces as a whole are attempting to apply democracy because they believe that freedom and democracy are prerequisites for human dignity and the social and economic development of the country. It is for this reason that we studied with great interest and respect the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO.

I should like first of all to congratulate the Director-General because his Report is most timely. First, the subject of the Report is one of the main concerns of the international community, at a time when many countries, both in the North and the South, are undergoing profound upheavals and opting for democracy after long periods during which their peoples had no true democratic rights.

Second, democracy has always been one of the ILO's major concerns. Indeed, the Organisation has always called upon its member States to establish democracy in their countries and encouraged the various parties to play the democratic game" – without which man cannot aspire to a decent life. The ILO, which has a tripartite structure based on dialogue – one of the cornerstones of democracy – is therefore the international organisation the most apt to play an important role in this respect.

We agree with the Director-General when he says in his Report: "I can perceive three broad areas in which the action of the Organisation could alter the situation in a country in the throes of transformation and in pursuit of stability: (1) respect for fundamental human rights, especially in employment...; (2) energetic action to encourage a market economy with a social dimension; (3) the strengthening of tripartism and collective bargaining", with all that this implies as support for organisations and institutions concerned by labour and the labour force.

The Report is indeed very ambitious because it tells member States how to take up the challenge of democracy. Moreover, we noted that the notion of democracy within the ILO itself was scarcely dealt with in the Report. It does not refer to the extension of the decision-making process or to any structural changes which should occur to allow countries in the Third World – who represent the majority of the member States of the Organisation – to play a greater role in making decisions directly concerning them. In this context, we should like to know what the situation is as regards the ratification of amendments to the Constitution concerning the structure of the ILO – and we hope that rapid progress will be made.

A number of geographical regions, especially in Europe, have undergone profound political changes resulting in the emergence of new independent countries. We believe that the problems linked to this development should be settled in the regions concerned so that they do not delay changes to the ILO structure and allow the Organisation to contribute towards strengthening democracy in the world.

In the context of economic reforms which were recently launched in Egypt, we have noted structural changes in this area – especially an opening up towards the market economy. This was necessary to bring about immediate economic and social development, it is in line with the political, economic and social changes occurring throughout the world today.

By means of a constructive dialogue, the trade union movement and the Government tried to involve the population in the drafting of policies and economic reforms, ensuring that these did not undermine social justice, the economic situation and attempts to combat unemployment.

It is relevant to point out that the new law on enterprises in the public sector, which is attempting to liberalise and modernise enterprises in line with new economic guidelines, has allowed trade unions to participate, together with the administration, in drawing up workers' regulations, especially in areas concerning wages, promotions and leave. This law meets the demands of the Egyptian trade unions and will allow them to play a much greater role in collective bargaining in the future. We therefore hope that the ILO will provide us with assistance in this field.

I should like to take this opportunity to express our gratitude to the Organisation for approving in principle a project to provide the parties concerned in Egypt with technical assistance to help them harmonise and modernise labour legislation, so as to facilitate its application and adjustment to our country's economic and social development.

We firmly agree with the ideas expressed by the Director-General in his Report, to the effect that: "the present climate of international détente should enable many countries to reduce their military expenditure, allowing public spending to be channelled towards measures designed to alleviate poverty and ease its intolerable effects on populations."

On behalf of Egyptian workers, I should like to express our satisfaction at the positive political developments in South Africa; indeed, this country is moving towards constitutional reform, which will allow the black majority to exercise its rights within a democratic system without racial discrimination. We sincerely hope that, in the near future, we shall witness the triumph of freedom and democracy in the South of the black continent and the consolidation of the principles of freedom, justice and peace.

In concluding, allow me to say – at a time when the world is particularly concerned by democracy and human rights – that the principles of human rights extend to all individuals and all peoples and that they should apply to each and every one without distinction of race or religion. These principles, which have been upheld in international charters and conventions, are intrinsic to man; and consequently they extend to the whole of mankind.

On behalf of the Egyptian workers, I urge the International Labour Organisation to ask its member States to guarantee equality of treatment – both economic and social – between national workers and migrant workers, especially with respect to wages, working time, social security and freedom of association.

And since we are speaking of the protection of migrant workers, I note that workers of various nationalities who were affected as a result of the Gulf War – including nearly half a million Egyptian workers – have still not received compensation for the damages they suffered because they were forced to return to their own countries. We therefore hope that the ILO will make the necessary contacts with the compensation fund of the Security Council, so that these workers might obtain the funds due to them which have been frozen by a number of States involved in the conflict.

Mr. MUKASA (Workers' delegate, Uganda) – Permit me on behalf of the National Organisation of Trade Unions of Uganda to congratulate the President and his deputies heartily on their election to the most high office of this year's Session of the International Labour Conference and on the excellent manner in which you have conducted the Conference's business up to now. I have no reason to doubt your ability to continue sucessfully in this way.

The Director-General was right to guide the Conference's attention to the importance of linking the growth of democracy to the use of tripartite institutions such as are embodied in the ILO system.

He was also correct to say that the essential link between the market economy and the tripartite system is social dialogue based on the state allowing workers and employers ample latitude and not deciding everything in advance.

May I add that, for tripartite bodies to work, they must consist of three equal partners, not one master and two subordinates.

The Director-General has often stressed the universal nature of international labour Conventions and Recommendations but, to our disappointment, we have heard from too many countries that the rules and values of the ILO are not relevant in their particular cases and are in conflict with the provision of their countries' constitutions.

Unfortunately, the majority of those which take the lead in denouncing important Conventions are highly developed countries and members of the EEC family.

One important Convention denounced by some countries is the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89) which concerns not only the recognition of women's social status but, most significantly, the protection of mother and child from the hazards of night work. That mother, who might have been the mother of one of us present in this great building in the past or before the ILO adopted Convention No. 89 which is now being denounced, might abandon that child which, again, could be any one of us present here, to go to the factory and attend night work until morning, when that child could then resume breast feeding. If those babies could talk and walk, they would be demonstrating today, around this building, against such denunciations, but unfortunately they cannot and they will not. Instead, those babies will tonight be left to babysitters until the following morning in those countries which have denounced this Convention.

One thing is certain, developments taking place in developed countries are bound to influence events in developing countries.

I do welcome internal investment. As Africa opens her heart and her mind to the democratisation process, so Africa must open her borders to foreign investment.

But let this take place on terms that respect the needs of local communities and people and, consequently, that respect fundamental human and trade union rights.

The right way to achieve this is to promote the right of workers to form trade unions and to understand that ILO values are universal and include these vital rights.

That is why I am so saddened to read in reports we are discussing at this Session of the Conference of the constant violation of international labour standards, unfortunately by respectable countries like Malaysia.

It is not only in this year's Conference reports but in those going back to the 1970s that serious statements have been made against the non-observance of international labour standards by this great country for not permitting electronics industry workers to form a trade union.

The right to form a trade union is a vital part of the democratisation process for developing and the already developed countries.

We prefer to seek and uphold ILO values because we agree with the Director-General that this is the best way forward. I appeal to all those concerned to observe and respect the ILO standards.

I hope that this question of Malaysia's electronics workers will not arise again and that this respectable country's authorities will have resolved it.

The ILO has constantly called the attention of member countries to the need to ratify the most important Convention, Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948 (No. 87), but with no heed on the part of some countries. I invite you to note that this is a fundamental convention in line with all basic human rights and international standards. Therefore only those countries which do not observe and respect human rights should not ratify it.

Finally, I would wish to address you briefly on the issue of an employment standard. It has been observed in ILO reports that several governments have continued to pursue their immediate aims by reducing the supply side at the cost of the objective of full employment. On this, I want to welcome the ILO observation that measures of labour market policy alone do not seem to achieve any lasting reduction in unemployment.

Now, permit me to make a serious statement for which I am alone liable, not my country, although maybe my organisation, which I have the honour to represent. The International Monetary Fund is guilty of having created unemployment everywhere, particularly in the Third World, by imposing its structural adjustments without any social dimension. It should be specifically asked to make reparation.

Yes, the IMF is also liable for the non-observance and non-ratification of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) by many countries. It should be tried and convicted for those capital offences.

Permit me lastly to extend a word of warm appreciation, on behalf of my organisation, NOTU, and its affiliates, to those friendly organisations which have, for a long time now, helped us in different ways, particularly in terms of training which, in my view, is the best and most meaningful way the democratisation process can be achieved and enhanced. While I cannot exhaustively list such organisations, inevitably the following few have to be mentioned. I will start with the ILO itself, which has helped us a lot in the field of education and training, the ICFTU, the Commonwealth Trade Union Council, the TUC, the Nordic countries, the OATUU, the Trade Union Confederation of China. Then the ITS which have also assisted us, like the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees, the International Metalworkers' Federation, the International Federation of Plantation, Agricultural and Allied Workers, the Public Services International, the Miners' International Federation, the International Federation of Building and Woodworkers, the International Federation of Trade Unions of Transport Workers and the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers Federation.

Original – French: Mgr. TABET (Apostolic Nuncio, Permanent Observer of the Holy See in Geneva) – I am very happy to be able to join the distinguished delegates who have preceded me in contratulating the President on his election to this office and to congratulate him on the way in which he is leading this Conference.

At a time when deep changes are reshaping our world, it is significant that the Director-General of the ILO has suggested democratisation as a topic for discussion at this session. For people who aspire to a better life the International Labour Organisation offers a surer way to build solid foundations for economic and social life.

The democratic method is in fact the best guarantee for the protection of human beings. However, it is realistic only if it puts the dignity of the human being at the centre of its concerns, and promotes all human values, particularly freedom. On this point, the social teaching of the Catholic church fully coincides with the ILO's perspective.

The Report of the Director-General stresses that democracy is a dynamic process which enables each man and all men to participate in the building of a more just and solidary society. Democracy recognises the basic equality of all members of society, and makes them responsible for the life and the destiny of the political community. To this end it requires the necessary conditions for the material and spiritual fulfilment of individuals, and especially the provision of education and training to all.

Pope John Paul II, when he recently gave an audience to the Chairman of the governing body of the International Labour Office, congratulated the ILO for putting social dialogue and tripartite cooperation at the forefront of its considerations.

The structures and the instruments that the ILO proposes to countries to organise the world of work are all aimed at enabling all parties involved to come together, in a spirit of mutual respect, in order to work together for the common good. In so far as this philosophy of tripartism is implemented, not only does it build democracy and transform society by making it more participative, but it also educates people by teaching them to defend their individual or group interests in fruitful cooperation with society as a whole.

This is the most appropriate way of ensuring that economic, political and social restructuring, brought about by liberalisation of markets, is accomplished for the good of all.

In this spririt, the delegation of the Holy See wonders whether it would not be more appropriate to put greater emphasis on democratisation at the grass-roots level, or in other words, to focus on an approach which more directly touches the daily life of workers.

Specifically, we consider that the ILO should strive to promote greater democratisation and greater participation at the work place. Human beings who are engaged in work, even and especially in precarious situations, should have a say as regards their own future, so that with the cooperation of political representatives and employers, they are able to achieve decent standards of living.

On the other hand, taking into account not only economic, but also the cultural and racial discrimination which affects numerous groups and individuals, is in our opinion the necessary corollary to this approach. The ideal of social justice which animates the ILO should prompt it to take more effective action to fight against discrimination. Discrimination exists everywhere but special attention should be given to developing countries and to those which are carrying out the unprecedented transition from a centralised system to market economy and, at the same time, to political democracy.

In both cases, human beings must be neither forgotten nor sacrificed. The Holy See is pleased to note that the action undertaken by the ILO in the sphere of structural adjustment policies is beginning to create a general acceptance of the importance of social objectives. Vocational training, which instills a greater sense of work for and with others, remains, to our way of thinking, the most effective way of enabling everyone to participate in the building of a democratic society. We are convinced that the development of the world of work requires education which opens minds to the concept of responsibility. This is what we mean by "democracy in the field."

In the encyclical Centesimus Annus, Pope John Paul II stated: "Following the collapse of Communist totalitarianism and of many other totalitarian and "national security" regimes, today we are witnessing a predominance, not without signs of opposition, of the democratic ideal, together with lively attention to and concern for human rights. But for this very reason it is necessary for peoples in the process of reforming their systems to give democracy an authentic and solid foundation through the explicit recognition of those rights."

When the Holy See advocates a grass-roots democratisation and the elimination of discrimination, its wish is that the human rights of each and every man be respected in a very concrete and pragmatic way. The fulfilment of these rights is the aim of ILO action. But is not the first of these rights, for every man and woman, to be, through his or her work, a protagonist in the society to which they contribute and from which they receive in return the necessary means to meet their basic needs, as emphasised so aptly in the Declaration of Philadelphia?

The democratic method is, in this sense, that which provides each individual and each group with the best possibility of working together to identify, recognise, respect, protect and exercise these essential rights and these duties.

Original – Arabic: Mr. JILANI (Employers' delegate, Tunisia) In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! May I first of all congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues most sincerely on his election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him every success in his task of conducting the business of this session of the Conference, which is of the utmost importance to us.

I should also like to thank the Director-General for the excellent choice of topics he prepared for this session. He considered various aspects of these topics which reflect our concerns and our aspirations.

On behalf of Tunisian employers and on my own behalf I would like to repeat how satisfied we are with all the subjects dealt with before this international assembly. This session is being held at a time when democratisation is affecting the major part of the world. The theories and regimes that history has shown to be demagogic and disastrous have now disappeared and have made way for the free-market economy and for personal initiative.

In Tunisia we have always truly believed that global development and economic efficiency cannot be achieved without democracy. Each of us in his own sphere, employers, workers, and the Government, have worked towards consolidating democracy in all aspects of our daily lives in general, and within economic institutions in particular, to allow it to become a living organism where interests complement rather than contradict one another. These efforts have resulted in an improvement in our balance of payments, which is the logical result of the structural reforms that have been applied as part of President Ben Ali's democratic regime.

I cannot fail to mention here the assistance that we have received from the International Labour Organisation and from its Office which is responsible for employers, activities, and also from the International Organisation of Employers which is doing everything possible to further free enterprise and the market economy.

In this connection I should like to thank this Organisation once again for having chosen Tunis for the international meeting on the informal sector, and also for its extensive assistance in helping us to ensure the success of this important meeting. We also thank the ILO for its continuous efforts in organising numerous technical events in other countries, and in particular in Africa which continues to have an urgent need for such events and for assistance of all kinds, to allow its economy to be strengthened so that it is in a position to keep pace with the developed countries and to provide the economic and political equilibrium we all desire.

The tide of democracy that is advancing all over the world, the free-economy system which is spreading day by day, and the enormous changes taking place in the former Soviet block, are certainly in need of reinforcement and guidance. In effect, in spite of the disappearance of socialist regimes in the political sense, their after-effects are still very much present in a large number of social laws in many regions around the world. The market economy and free enterprise, which certainly do not conflict with the social balance or the well-being of workers, are still being negatively influenced by left-over rigid socialist thinking which is completely out of touch with the needs of personal initiative and the abilities of modern enterprises with regards to ensuring production, competitiveness, and rapid adjustment to market forces.

The International Organisation of Employers, the International Labour Office and all employers' organisations and associations throughout the free world are requested to make increasing efforts to clearly define social concepts within the enterprise itself and to do away with the remains of a demogogic socialist way of thinking that proved to be a failure.

The market economy implies great challenges for enterprises in areas such as competition and the quality-price ratio. To take up these challenges on the one hand and to keep up with the latest technological advances on the other make vocational training and the development of human resources the corner-stone of progress, of rather ot the survival of any enterprise.

Whilst it is difficult to achieve this situation in developed countries which have well-established institutions and traditions in this area, developing countries that have just begun the industrialisation process are largely reliant on the efforts of the international organisations and institutions to provide them with the necessary assistance to enable them to draw up training rules and procedures that will meet the real needs of enterprises.

Aware of the importance of training in improving the skills of workers and developing enterprises, we have, within the Tunisian Union of Industry and Trade, endeavoured to ensure that the supervisory structure of this important sector should be coordinated completely and permanently with the economic institutions. The political authorities have realised the importance of this sector and have entrusted the Ministry of Vocational Training and Labour with its organisation and development.

While paying homage to the ILO for the constant efforts which it makes to provide training and retraining programmes in many countries, we hope that it will strengthen its efforts in this sphere.

The world of today, which has seen the collapse of the ideological contradictions which divides it, witnessing the emergence of new groups and areas characterised by the convergence of joint economic interests. Tunisia, by virtue of its determination to remain open to the outside world, its noble traditions as a crossroads of trade and encounter, as well as its specific geographical position, is experiencing these changes in complete harmony with the needs of its Arab, African and Mediterranean environment.

As employers grouped together in the Tunisian Union of Industry and Trade, we are working in all structures and in all spheres towards the achievement of a Maghreb economic area which will enable our enterprises to meet the challenge of fair competition at the world level.

In this same sphere, we have contributed to the creation of many specialised occupational structures in the Maghreb countries and we have organised the first meeting of Maghreb employers with a view to the establishment of free enterprise and a market economy.

We hope that the Pan-African Employers' Confederation will serve the economic interests of Africa and will play its role alongside international institutions and through the intermediary of the International Organisation of Employers in consolidating the free market.

Furthermore, we are working with objectivity and optimism towards strengthening and developing our traditional relations with the European Community, in a spirit of adaptation to the changes being experienced by the Community which accounts for a large part of out trade.

The Tunisian Union of Industry and Trade, through the joint chambers which it has created with a large number of counterpart organisations in friendly and fraternal countries, and through international organisations of which it is a member, is working towards the establishment of world economic equilibrium and a reduction of the differences which continue to broaden the gap between North and South. Security and peace in the world cannot be achieved within a new world order as long as nations continue to suffer from famine and as long as peoples remain deprived of their basic rights to self-determination and freedom.

An encouraging sign is the initiation of peace talks between the various peoples of the Middle East and which, despite some obstacles which have slowed down the pace of progress, have been in our view very positive development and which will help resolve four decades of bloody conflict and give the Palestinian people its rights as a free and independent State.

The same is true concerning the determination of the Government of South Africa to eliminate the remains of racial discrimination which our Black continent has suffered for many years and which we have condemned on so many occasions from this rostrum.

Once again, I should like to thank all the officials and services of this Organisation and all those who have through it contributed to the development of the economy and the peace of the world.

May the peace, pity and grace of the Almighty be with you.

Mr. LEATHER (representative of Public Services International) – I add my congratulations to those of other speakers for the President's election to office and that of the Vice-Presidents. I have the pleasure of addressing this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of Public Services International (PSI). PSI is the largest international grouping of independent public sector unions, uniting 14 ½ million workers.

I should like to start by congratulating the Director-General on his reports to the Conference, in particular the Report entitled Democratisation and the ILO. As the report makes plain, it is one thing to attain democracy and another to keep it alive. Democracy means that the principles of liberty and equality are given practical meaning and that there is freedom from hunger and freedom from fear.

While agreeing with the Director-General's views on the reform of the State, we feel that is is dangerous to talk too vaguely about reducing the public service to "manageable proportions". Such statements offer ammunition to those who globally attack the State without understanding its vital regulatory role in both the economic and social spheres.

In the all too recent past, many governments, with international support, argued that democracy was a developed country luxury. Now, however, encouragement is being given to countries – rightly in our view – to create democratic institutions and processes. Where they have succeeded, it has often been as the result of a long hard struggle by people's organisations, especially trade unions which dared to challenge military and one-party dictatorships. This struggle is still going on in a number of countries, and the international community must continue to give its moral and practical support.

In this process of welcome change, many newly elected democratic governments have little chance of surviving in the current world economic climate. The situation in many countries, especially Africa, considerably worsened in the course of the 1980s – partly because of the unfair terms of world trade and escalating indebtedness, and partly because of the measures imposed by multilateral financial institutions.

The International Monetary Fund and the World Bank are monopolistic decision-makers. In some cases they have undermined the role of United Nations agencies, as the ILO knows only too well.

Both the process and content of these institutions' decisions pose a major threat to emerging democracies. The way in which economic solutions are imposed precludes discussion with representatives of the workforce and the community, although these are the people who are going to be directly affected. Fundamental consultation and collective bargaining rights, recognised by the ILO, are swept away as a result of decision taken by these unelected bodies.

The conditions which are laid down under stabilisation and structural adjustment programmes are driven by ideological free market theories. These theorists do not themselves live with the consequences of the measures they impose on others, nor do they practise these measures at home. The United States is not only the world's greatest debtor nation but it has a highly protected and regulated market. The liberalisation of the world food market is a single measure which could bring enormous benefits to 0the exporters of foodstuffs.

The privatisation mania continues unrestrained in many parts of the world, particularly of course in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, fuelled by the multinational consultants. In counterbalance to the unilateralism of the consultants, the ILO should step up its support for the establishment of the principles of tripartism, for labour legislation based on freedom of association and for education and training which would help put these principles into practice.

The ILO itself drew attention to the gravity of the economic situation in an article on labour adjustment in the public sector in the International Labour Review in 1990. In the public sector in many African and Latin American countries there have been widespread job cuts made without thought or planning for the social and economic consequences. Over the 1980s real wages in the public sector fell by some 30 to 40 per cent in Africa and 20 per cent in Latin America, so a family with two wages in Ghana can now only pay for 30 per cent of its basic nutritional needs.

At the same time, as wages have fallen and unemployment has risen, essential services have been cut. Indicators such as child mortality and maternal deaths show a reversal of gains made previously as health services expanded and improved. The relatively high proportion of women in the public sector workforce, and the fact that women are both important users of or substitutes for community services, means that the burden of debt and structural adjustment is being disproportionately borne by women.

These cuts in health and social services come just at the moment when the extent of the threat from AIDS is a last beginning to be acknowledged. Not only will health services be increasingly overstretched but the depredation of the workforce and the undermining of national capacity-building efforts will be devastating across the world. We urge the ILO to play a prominent part both in joint prevention efforts and in helping to assess and respond to the social and economic consequences of the pandemic.

We are not opposed to structural adjustment or structural change. On the contrary, we recognise that tough choices have to be made. Our concern is with the process by which these choices are made, which excludes trade unions; the analysis of the problem, which persistently puts the blame on the public sector; and the solutions put forward, which inevitably impose huge cuts on public services and public employment.

The cost accountants' view means that the very machinery required to bring about democratic change is no longer able to function. The essential services required to help the mass of the population through a difficult transitional period will not be in place.

However, recent reports from both the World Bank and the OECD have contained substantive statements which analyse and affirm the vital role of the State and the public sector.

According to a 1991 OECD publication on serving the economy better, the effectiveness of the public sector largely conditions economic development and sustains political and social cohesion. It influences national economic efficiency, the rate of technological and organisational innovation, the direction and speed of structural adjustment, and the cost to users of unpriced resources such as the environment.

The document also acknowledges that the public sector cannot be run using narrow economic criteria as the sole determinant of policy.

Note the strong support for the public sector given by the World Bank in its 1991 World Development Report: "...Markets cannot operate in a vacuum – they require a legal and regulatory framework that only governments can provide. And, at many other tasks, markets sometimes prove inadequate or fail altogether. That is why governments must, for example, invest in infrastructure and provide essential services to the poor. It is not a question of State or market: each has a large and irreplaceable role."

The World Bank puts its finger on a fundamental problem of the pure market economy. What happens to the victims and the losers? The market can be a very effective means of creating wealth in society but it is neither neutral nor indeed benign. When left unrestrained, the market can be ruthless and destructive.

Democratic structures are necessary checks on the market. Trade unions and the political labour movement have historically been the main instruments for restraint and have in most developed countries achieved important gains for workers and the oppressed. At the same time, the public sector takes overall responsibility for implementing social and economic balance. This is a creative and vital role to play in society.

Unfortunately, the ILO does not seem to have sufficiently taken on board these revised views. Its activities poorly reflect the size of the public sector workforce in many countries or their legitimate concerns. We welcome the assurances of the Director-General that he would like to see this change and call on governments and employers to support him. It is important that a number of departments within the ILO and all its Regional Offices take responsibility for issues relating to the public sector.

When we look at what is happening in the world around us, we come to the conclusion that the ILO and all that it stands for is now needed more than ever before. Our affiliates in the public sector are facing increasing barriers to exercising their basic trade union rights. There are still too many countries which do not recognise the right of public sector workers to form a trade union, in particular Indonesia, Thailand and Turkey. There are numerous others which restrict trade union freedom for all or part of the public sector; these include Japan, much of South-East Asia, Guatemala, Zimbabwe, South Africa, the United Kingdom, much of the Middle East and certain states in the United States.

It is necessary once again to make special mention of the situation in Thailand where the military authorities and their appointed Government do not recognise basic trade union and human rights in state enterprise despite the findings of the ILO Freedom of Association Committee. We also draw your attention to the outstanding case of Brother Thanong who disappeared nearly a year ago.

In Turkey, our affiliate Genel-Is (Municipal Workers' Union) from the Trade Union Centre DISK still has completely unacceptable restrictions on its right to organise and bargain. We welcome the fact that the Republic of Korea is attending the ILO Conference for the first time. It is unfortunate that in practice it subscribes to virtually none of the basic ILO principles and one questions what purpose its membership is supposed to serve.

Finally, we welcome the Report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association concerning the Republic of South Africa and urge that its recommendations be put into practice.

In conclusion, the struggle to achieve democracy will depend in part on the revitalisation of the State and the positive contribution it can make.

Original – English: Mr. BRETT (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I join with earlier speakers in congratulating Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election and on the skilled manner in which he has presided over the Conference in the past two weeks. It has not always been easy, but that was not unexpected, given the nature of the subject of the Report. The Director-General was somewhat courageous in choosing the topic of extending democracy – because democracy means all sorts of different things to different people and it means a lot to nearly everyone here.

In the trade union movement I think we tend to have a wider concept of democracy than the ones most current at present in other circles. Stated simply, I think that we would say that extending democracy means ensuring that all people should have a say in the decision that affect them. At one level, perhaps the most important, all adults should have a vote and a choice in the election of those who should be responsible for national and local government. But almost everywhere such choices are exercised only at intervals of years. Universal suffrage does not in itself guarantee participation on a continuous basis in decision-making. It provides an element of accountability but not a sharing of responsibility essential to human dignity.

The trade unions exist because working people established them to fulfil that need – to make good a democratic deficit. And it is perhaps well for us to be reminded that in my country – and in several others – the mass of people achieve democratic influence through trade unions a good many years before they had a vote and a genuine choice in political elections. The Director-General might have referred in his Report to the outstanding and initiating role which the trade union movement has played in bringing political democracy to regions as diverse as South America, Central Europe and southern Africa.

On the other hand, I would certainly question the equation in the Report of free, democratic development with the opening of free markets. There are regions around the world, even today, where there are no restrictions on market forces but every kind of ban on freedom of association and other democratic rights. People have the right to buy anything they like but they are not allowed to organise in order to raise their wages to provide the means of buying. The ideology of the market and the slavish attitude towards it in some countries are developing the philosophy which treats human beings only as consumers and producers; and in their role as producers in many countries they are treated as mere commodities and denied inherent human dignity.

It is the trade union view that the market and the society in which we live should serve the people and that people should not be servants of the market.

The ILO was founded at a time when the world was acutely aware of the appalling consequences of such an approach. It received a new mandate, after the second great conflagration of this century, which heralded the introduction of key human rights conventions. All delegates should read the appalling accounts of bonded and child labour in the documents before this Conference. They should reflect on the position of millions of people in cities of both developing and industrialised countries, without work or vote, whose human dignity is not recognised in any real sense. I think at this Conference we should reflect on this record and consider whether we are losing sight of the lessons of the past. There are many human needs for which the market does not cater. If those needs are neglected by those in power, then social justice is denied and peace and democratic freedom are at risk. The workers in the Gdansk shipyard in August 1980, Frederick Chiluba for most of the 1980s and the members of COSATU and NACTU in South Africa today were not fighting for the introduction of a free market. As trade unionists they were – and still are – fighting for full human dignity and freedom. That requires that all working people should have their basic need for decent lives for themselves and their families met.

What should the ILO do to assist in these endeavours? It is right that the ILO should in its appeals to the IMF and the World Bank, call for a social dimension in financial policies towards developing countries. It is a matter for the deepest regret that millions have suffered grievously because the international community has failed until recently to heed that call. This illustrates one of the most grievous shortcomings of the free operation of market forces and I do not apologise for saying that public intervention is needed and should be supported to ensure and enable basic needs to be met. The single economic and social objective which should be accepted by all governments is the achievement of high and stable levels of employment.

The ILO has given a lead in the past. The World Employment Programme, launched in the late 1960s, gave a lead which was not followed at the time when the governments of industrialised countries were all committed to full employment. In practice, those countries have since abandoned the objective and in all countries the rate of unemployment is two or three times higher than it was then. In my view, there can be no greater service that the ILO could provide to working people, wherever they are, than to analyse the reasons for this disastrous increase in unemployment with all its attendant social evils, and to bring together ILO constituents in committed efforts to find a way of securing productive, freely chosen jobs for all.

Secondly the ILO has a duty to educate. If people knew how the faces of the poor were being ground into the earth, if they knew about the net outflow of financial resources from the developing world, if they were sensitive to the increased disparities of living conditions between the rich and the poor, they would not tolerate them. They would be committed to the struggle for social justice. The ILO should work to sensitise consciences. If we take that duty seriously in the ILO, we will run into controversy and indeed opposition within our own constituencies, but that, in my view, is what is necessary if the ILO is to fulfil its responsibilities in this unjust and unstable world of today. I hope that the Director-General and the Governing Body will take up these challenges. If they do, they will have the support of the trade union movement and the world will be a better place for that effort.

Original – Russian: Mrs. KASUMOVA (Government delegate, Azerbaijan) – On behalf of the delegation of Azerbaijan I would like warmly to congratulate the President on his election, and I wish him every success.

For the first time in this room we are hearing the voice of Azerbaijan, therefore I would like to thank you most sincerely for this. I would also like you for the first time to hear an Azerbaijani speech, and I would like to speak in my own language.

(The speaker continues in Azerbaijani.)

For the first time you are hearing the voice of the sovereign State of the Republic of Azerbaijan. for more than 70 years the Republic was under the yoke of a totalitarian regime. While enjoying unique conditions and, a wealth of resources and industrious citizens, the Azeri people have lived significantly below its capacity. Today we are building a new State, and we must try to overcome the consequences of a totalitarian regime and a command-type administration.

We see the future Azerbaijan as a democratic, peace-loving State, adhering to the principles of human civilisation. In its governmental policies, Azerbaijan will adhere to the idea of an interdependent world and work to achieve the common goals of all mankind.

We would like to express our readiness to build our relations with all countries on the basis of the principles of peaceful co-existence and good neighbourliness.

Our Republic is gaining international recognition. It is becoming integrated into international political and economic structures. More than 100 countries of the world have recognised the independence of Azerbaijan and are establishing diplomatic relations with us.

Our aim is to build a dynamic market economy, open to the outside world, making it possible to exploit the unique natural wealth of Azerbaijan, which possesses enormous fuel resources and other raw materials:

We produce oil, oil-based products, chemicals, iodine, rubber, iron ore, alumina, and aluminium, equipment for the oil industry, electrical equipment, refrigerators, air conditioners. This is not a complete list of what is produced in Azerbaijan. We are engaged in cotton cutivation, wine growing, horticulture, tobacco and silk production – the traditional occupations of rural workers in the Republic.

We have adopted laws providing for the development of and guarantees for private property, favourable fiscal terms to attract and protect foreign investment. In the Republic we have liberalised prices and begun the process of privatisation and destatisation. We are reorganising management systems and adopting them to market conditions. We have already started the process of active cooperation in different areas between Azerbaijan and many other States of the world, with leading companies in Italy, Austria, Turkey, USA, Great Britain, Iran, France, Germany and other countries. We are creating a predictable and secure climate for investment.

We are being guided by the firm conviction that democracy, human rights and the supremacy of the law are the necessary prerequisites for the development of society. We guarantee all citizens of our Republic, equal and effective protection from all forms of discrimination, be it on national or religious grounds.

This is already the fifth year of military aggression perpetrated on my people by the neighbouring Republic of Armenia. Open war is being waged. People are dying and the rights of Azeris are being flouted. There is a daily escalation of violence that has led to many victims amongst the non-combatant population, and infringements of the rights and freedoms of our citizens.

The military aggression by Armenia has led to an enormous number of refugees. The single-minded and large-scale deportation of Azeris in Armenia, and forceable expulsion of the last 200,000 in 1988, created the first refugees in peacetime. They are deprived of the constitutional right to work, or social protection in areas where they have legitimately lived for centuries.

As a result of the relentless military action of the Armenian irregular militia, over the last four months alone more than 60 settlements have been burnt and wiped from the face of the earth, and the tragedies of Khodzhalin and Agdaban took place, in which more than 1,000 civilians, including, women, children and the elderly died.

Not content with what they have done, the Armenian aggressors have begun a singleminded attempt to expel Azeris from the territory of Azerbaijan itself, from the mountainous area of Karabakh, where there is not one Azeri settlement left (there used to be 56), and also from adjacent areas. A hundred thousand people have become refugees in their own homeland.

In flagrant breach of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, its dignity and honour, freedom and equality, for the first time ever, in 1988, Azerbaijani workers were prevented from going to work in enterprises in the town of Khakend, formarly Stepanakert. For the simple reason they were ethnic Azeris, Armenian extremists drove them out of their jobs, refused to sell bread to them, insulted and threatened them, and prohibited them from using public transport.

All these acts of violence were organised by the Armenian leaders, who as self-proclaimed democrats fighting for the self-determination of the Armenian population of Nagorno-Karabakh have deprived the other part of the population, the Azeris living in their native land, of any and all rights.

As a result of ethnic discrimination, all the Azeris have been dismissed from enterprises located in the mountainous areas of Karabakh. Tens of thousands have been deprived of their right to personal integrity. They have been refused payment of wages; their employment records, passports and savings have been withheld from them and they have even been refused emergency assistance.

In their struggle for self-determination, the Armenian nationalist extremists and those who instigate them ideologically have carried out a world-wide disinformation campaign aimed at portraying Azeri as aggressors. The Azeris are a peace-loving people who have never encroached upon anyone else's land. Unfortunately, however, the voice of the Azeris people has not always able to carry their pain and suffering to the world public, muted as it has been by certain forces.

For us, international legal standards have enormous importance and we are intent on taking concrete steps to bring our national legislation into line with international standards.

Over 1.2 million people live in Azerbaijan, representing 80 nationalities and practising several religions. In our country there is thus a kind of religious mosaic of many colours, each reflecting a host of beliefs which command respect.

We need the ILO's experience now, and we are now expecting assistance and support from each of the ILO's members. The very fact that our delegation has come to this Conference at such a critical time for our Republic bears witness to Azerbaijan's sincere desire to cooperate in all fields.

Mr. MPANGALA (Workers' delegate, United Republic of Tanzania) – On behalf of the workers of Tanzania, I take this opportunity to congratulate the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference on his election. His long experience and outstanding contribution in the field of labour will undoubtedly assist the deliberations of this Conference. My delegation want to assure him of its maximum support and cooperation.

I also would like at this juncture to pay profound tribute to the Director-General for his untiring efforts to steer the ILO in its activities and, together with his staff, for the good and well-research papers which have been placed before this Conference and which form the basis of our deliberations at this important Session of the Conference.

The Report of the Director-General this year could not have picked a better topic. Part I of the Report deals thoroughly with the subject of democratisation and the role of the ILO in this field. The word "democracy" has now become household vocabulary in all countries, including those which are not Members of the ILO. Democracy has become a concept which is acceptable to all self-respecting countries. Democracy, as a concept, is now widely acceptable even in those countries which once upon a time did not believe in it. Democracy, as a concept, is now taken seriously in all developing countries including countries in Africa, and Tanzania is one of those countries. This concept has ushered in a climate of understanding among nations and the people of the world and with the ending of the cold war, tolerance and understanding between nations has grown and will continue to grow, thanks to the workers, some employers, some governments and the UN agencies, including the ILO, who have constantly promoted this concept for all to understand and emulate. The dismantling of dictatorship and misguided totalitarism and authoritarian regimes has brought a ray of hope and inspiration.

Continued violence, ethnic and racial tensions, military coups, religious strife and apartheid and other forms of discrimination are but by-products of unfair and unjust societies and these can cause a threat to law and order culminating in complete social disintegration.

Hence the need for the ILO and other United Nations agencies to continue with vigour to press forward with democratic changes and the consolidation wherever these changes have taken place or are taking place.

The workers of Tanzania know only too well the values of democracy. It was the workers of Tanzania who spearheaded reforms in the political system of that country and in the trade union movement. Their idea of democracy was inspired by their desire to participate in the formulation of the economic and social policies to be applied in Tanzania. Their idea of democracy was to give the people the right to participate fully in the formulation and implementation of socio-economic policies. To the workers of Tanzania democracy is not necessarily synonymous with multipartism. For what benefits a people to have 20 or 40 parties if, at the end of the day, they die of hunger and disease? That is why the workers of Tanzania agree with the Director-General when he says in his Report (and I quote): "No economic system can expect to endure unless it is capable of satisfying the basic needs of its population. This is a challenge that faces the democracies also."

The workers in Tanzania believe that the level of democraty must be measured in terms of satisfying the basic needs of the people, an objective ardently upheld by the ILO. To borrow the words of the UNDP, "the basic objective of human development is to enlarge the range of people's choices to make development more democratic and participatory. These choices should include access to income and employment opportunities, education and health, and a clean and safe physical environment. Such individuals should also have an opportunity to participate fully in community decisions and to enjoy human, economic and political freedom."

The Conference, through its committees, is deliberating on a range of very important and vital issues for mankind. The agenda item on human resources and its issues relating to structural adjustment and employment opportunities are key issues for Africa, including my country. Many economies in Africa have been run down, owing to mistakes made by omission or commission, including mismanagement. It is also true to say that remedial measures need not be pleasant, but can be harsh and brutal.

Yet, while Africa prepares herself for the processes of true democracy, together with the deterioration of the fabrics required for meaningful economic recovery we have to swallow the bitter pill of economic recession following recommendations to implement structural adjustment made by the IMF and the World Bank. It is for this reason that we call upon the ILO to work closely with the IMF and the World Bank to cushion the effects which will be felt by our people in terms of massive retrenchment, devaluation of currency, rising prices and, especially, in the provision of essential goods and services, including education and health. This situation is not only unhealthy but also dangerous and is likely to cause chaos and endless conflicts in our societies and thus jeopardise the very essence of democracy.

I would therefore appeal to the ILO to assume its important role to assist in particular the vulnerable and poor countries of the world in training and retraining programmes and in tackling the issues which surround the informal sector. The ILO should also prevail on the developed countries to have a change of heart, and especially to strive to correct the economic imbalances in the world, including the debt issue, so as to allow the poor countries to reap a fair share from their labour.

I would concede that, to achieve any tangible development, governments in poor countries must, as a matter of necessity, involve and consult all the social partners in the spirit of tripartism. This kind of cooperation in Africa is most essential, especially now, to avoid suspicion and mistrust.

I would like to conclude by saying that the ILO has an important role to play in the democratisation process, but its biggest and most formidable task will be in the area of employment promotion, the fight against unemployment, softening the adverse social impact of structural policies, and the many related issues. I am sure the ILO will live up to our expectations.

Original – French: Mr. STETCU (Workers' delegate, Romania) – Please allow me to start by congratulating Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the Presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, for his excellent Report, as well as all those who took part in the preparation of the present Conference.

Indeed, the work of the Conference starts in a period of serious tensions, during which innocent blood is being shed in many regions of the planet, and when the conscience of the entire world is haunted by the spectre of death which is gnawing away at humanity.

Famine, disease and psychological disorders – the latter being more difficult to detect, such as hatred, nationalism, xenophobia, fundamentalism of all kinds – can generate a chain reaction with unforeseeable consequences.

Romanian unions look with great concern at the evolution of the inter-ethnic conflicts which are emerging from an imaginary Euro-Asian line, all along the chain of the Alps/Carpathians/Balkans and Himalayas.

While I am speaking, the Romanian trade unions are suffering from the full force of the effects of war as a result of the blockade of the Danube. As a matter of fact, thousands of Danube boatmen and workers in the chemical, wood and transport industries are at risk from massive job losses.

The Romanian workers, whom I represent here, consider that the wave of disorder in the countries formerly in the communist sphere of influence is threatening (for reasons beyond our control) the stable and prosperous region of Western Europe.

We believe that this instability can be attenuated through a wise and balanced policy, provided that those who hold responsibility for the destiny of peoples have a strategic and tactical vision which can bring about social stability based upon a dynamic economic equilibrium. For reasons difficult for us, the unions, to accept, such strategy and tactics have been slow to show themselves.

We also consider that these changes must be made rapidly and in keeping with the dynamics of international realities, also within international organisations like the ILO. We are fully aware of the workings of the mechanisms of this Organisation. Therefore, the Romanian trade unions have particular difficulty in accepting that the representative of the Russian Federation still speaks today on behalf of all the Eastern countries, in other words, implicitly in our name. We hope that in future, and bearing in mind the tripartite nature of the ILO, we shall be consulted as an equal partner in arrangements of this kind, which remind us of a period when Europe and the world were divided into zones of influence, which was against the wishes of the Romanian people.

In fact, we consider that the time has come to call upon the objectivity of that immense force represented by the mass media. Since they deal, among other things, with the political health of peoples, it would perhaps be desirable for those who work in this area to pronounce an oath, similar to the Hippocratic oath for doctors. This would be useful because, from our own experience, we have learned that certain serious conflicts have blown up or spread as a result of the presentation or exaggeration by the mass media of certain fundamentalist, chauvinistic, xenophobic, nationalist policies, and this has reached the limits of primary, "animal", instincts.

At present it may be said that in Romania the trade unions are the most progressive organisations in the achievement of reforms and changes, thus proving that the Romanian people have finally understood that what they want above anything else is to break with the past. Our greatest wish remains the establishment of a market economy with a social dimension within a welfare State respecting the rule of law.

In spite of all kinds of obstructions the Romanian trade union movement has matured more rapidly than we had thought, thus avoiding the dangers of distintegration. According to Law No. 54 on the trade unions, for instance, it is sufficient to have 60 members to create a confederation.

To put a stop to the danger of trade union anarchy last October between the Confederation of Independent Unions, "Fratia", a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and the Trade Union Cartel "Alpha", a member of the World Confederation of Labour, negotiations took place leading to the creation of the National Advisory Council of Romanian Trade Unions, which is still open to the accession of any other representative confederation.

While maintaining our identity, which is a guarantee of trade union pluralism, we must all negotiate and sign with the employers the first collective labour agreement at the national level in the history of trade unionism in Romania, and avoid the danger of confiscation by the executive of the property authorities of the former communist unions. In this connection, the management of movable and non-movable property is the object of negotiations between unions.

I would like to say a few words about the difficulties raised by the trade union struggle in my country: the ratification of the new international labour Conventions; the drawing up, and the guarantee by free negotiations with the employers, of a system of minimum wages; the establishment of a tripartite system where the unions and the employers are no longer subject to political power; the strict adherence by government officials to the Constitution and the instruments of the ILO; the cessation of attempts at crushing the trade union movement by the executive; the need to make internal legislation concerning unions compatible with ILO instruments, particularly the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); the application of the collective labour agreement as a basis of social protection to the extent to which the National Advisory Council took account of the ILO Convention on the subject; constant pressure upon employers' and government organisations for the creation of new jobs, a decrease in unemployment, and the struggle against a market economy of a Mafioso type; and last but not least, special social protection for women, young people and pensioners.

To conclude, we, the Romanian trade unions, launch an appeal from this prestigious tribune, to the ILO, to other international and national organisations and to governments, to come to the aid of the Romanian people during this difficult period of transition. Let us not forget that our planet is a living organism and, that according to the domino principle, while helping us you help yourselves.

Our hope is to allow you to understand that you may no longer confuse the whole Romanian people with a few individuals. We would like to point out that, in spite of numerous difficulties, Romania remains a stable country with a skilled labour force which can also easily acquire new skills.

We need, first and foremost, your assistance, your know-how, your productive investment, your programmes for vocational training and for reintegration, and we have less need of humanitarian aid which always comes when the irreparable has already occurred.

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DE COSTERD) – I give the floor to U Myat Tha Tun, Government adviser, Myanmar, to reply to the statement made by Mr. Maung, representative of the International Union of Food and Allied Workers' Associations.

U. TUN (Government adviser, Myanmar) – My delegation finds it most regrettable that the so-called representative of the International Union of Food and Allied Workers' Associations was allowed to take the floor and level unfounded and malicious allegations against my Government.

I also wish to state most emphatically that the so-called representative has spoken about a subject which is totally extraneous to the subject under discussion. The State Law and Order Restoration Council is making serious efforts to build a democratic state at a pace and in a manner best suited to the conditions of the country and the aspirations of the people.

The State Law and Order Restoration Council will be meeting the representatives elect of the Pyithu Hluttaw on the 23rd of this month. Together they will coordinate the convening of a national convention to draft a new constitution establishing a multiparty democratic system, based on democratic principles.

Human rights in Myanmar are protected not only by a comprehensive and well-developed legal system, but also by an age-old tradition of the cultural values of the people. Myanmar's culture is known for its gentleness, compassion and tolerance. Fundamental rights are respected in our daily lives.

My delegation categorically rejects the unfounded allegations made against my Government. These allegations mainly emanate from outside sources who are in league with the terrorist groups operating in the remote areas of Myanmar, committing acts of terrorism, atrocities and other crimes against the people of Myanmar.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Credentials

Third Report of the Credentials Committee

Objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde

1. The Committee had before it objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde submitted by the "Uniao Nacional dos Trabalhadores de Cabo Verde Central Sindical" (UNTC-CS), and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

2. According to the UNTC-CS, the Government, without previous consultation and in a unilateral manner, had nominated a body called the Coordinating Council of Free Trade Unions (CCSL), which did not have official existence in accordance with the trade union law to represent the workers of Cape Verde. The Conference should not recognise the Workers' delegate nominated in this way.

3. The ICFTU pointed out that the "Communications and Tourism Workers' Union" represented by the Workers' delegate, Mr. José Silva Ferreira, was not the most representative organisation in Cape Verde. That union only had 907 members whereas the UNTC-CS grouped together 10 affiliated unions and had 14,000 members. The credentials of the Workers' delegate should, therefore, be rejected since he had been nominated in violation of article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution of the ILO.

4. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Claudio Henriques Veiga, Secretary of State for Employment and Head of the delegation of Cape Verde to the Conference, stated that there were two groups of trade unions in Cape Verde, one uniting under the UNTC-CS and the other uniting in the CCSL which grouped together 872 and 909 members respectively. Since trade union pluralism in Cape Verde is recent, the question of which organisation was more representative was not clear. The Government had consulted both organisations in search of a compromise in the direction of rotation until the question of representativity had been clarified. The UNTC-CS did not communicate the name of its representative. In these circumstances, the Government nominated as Workers' delegate of Cape Verde, Mr. José Silva Ferreira, President of the Transport, Communications and Tourism Workers' Union, which after the Teachers Trade Union (both of which are affiliated to the CCSL) was the most representative trade union in the country (with 350 members).

5. The reply added that in November 1991, a law on freedom of association had been adopted which was in conformity with the standards of the ILO and it was only as of that date that the two existing trade union organisations, the UNTC-CS and the CCSL, had deposited their registration documents containing the numbers of their members. It was, therefore, unrealistic for the UNTC-CS to claim that its membership had increased from 872 to 14,000 in the space of a few months.

6. The Committee noted the efforts undertaken to arrive at a compromise on the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde. In this respect, the Committee recalled that a system of rotation should not be imposed by the Government but should be the result of an agreement among the most representative workers' organisation in the country. The Committee also took note of the information provided by the Government concerning the trade union pluralism which came about following the recent law on freedom of association.

7. The Committee noted the great difference between the statistics submitted by the objecting organisations and the Government. It considered that, in the present circumstances it should refrain from any conclusion on the representative character of the organisations concerned. The Committee stressed the need, in future, for the parties to provide reliable data in this connection.

8. In the light of the above considerations, and despite the doubts expressed within the Committee on the representative character of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Myanmar

9. The Committee had before it an objection concerning the Employers' delegate of Myanmar submitted by the Employers' Group of the International Labour Conference.

10. The Employers' Group pointed out that the provisional list of delegates published on 3 June 1992 contained the name of U Tin Shein, Deputy Director, Office of the Auditor-General, as Employers' delegate of Myanmar to the Conference. According to his title, U Tin Shein was a Government official, as was last year's Employers' delegate. The Employers' Group questioned the validity of the information then presented by the Government denying the existence of any representative Employers' organisation. In spite of the difficulties prevailing in the country, the Union of Myanmar Chamber of Commerce and Industry represented the interests of employers of that country and should have been consulted. For these reasons, the credentials of U Tin Shein were not in conformity with Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution, and should be rejected by the Conference.

11. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, U Tin Kyaw Hlaing, Ambassador and Head of the delegation of Myanmar to the Conference, indicated that U Tin Shein had been nominated as Employers' delegate to the Conference as the most suitable person to represent Employers in Myanmar. The Union of Myanmar Chamber of Commerce and Industry did in fact exist but had only been formed recently and was at the moment fully preoccupied with other matters. A National Convention had been convened which would lay down the basic principles for a new constitution which would establish a multi-party democratic system with a market-oriented economy. In view of the reforms taking place, the Union of Myanmar Chamber of Commerce and Industry would in the very near future establish itself and accordingly would be able to send its representatives to future Conferences in line with the tripartite principles of the ILO.

12. The Committee expressed regret that, like last year, the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Myanmar had fallen to a public official whose functions could not be qualified as corresponding to that of an employer. Although no improvement had taken place since last year in the process of constitutional changes, the Committee took note of the reforms that had been announced and, in the exercise of its discretionary power, decided not to propose invalidation. At the same time, it trusted that, according to the indications given by the Government, the Employers' delegate to future Conferences would be nominated in agreement with the representative Employers' organisation in the country.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of the Republic of Korea

13. The Committee had before it two objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of the Republic of Korea submitted by the Korea Trade Union Congress (KTUC) and the Korea Congress of Independent Industrial Federations. One of the communications was signed by the President of the KTUC claiming to represent 150,000 trade union members, while the other was signed by the President of the KTUC and the Chairman of the Korea Congress of Independent Federations referring to a total membership of 400,000.

14. The objecting organisations maintained that the nomination procedure of the Government did not correspond to Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution. Requests made by them for consultations had not been answered on the ground that the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) was the only Government-recognised workers' organisation under the current Trade Union Law. In the opinion of the objecting organisations, since all first level trade unions or industrial federations could not lawfully exist unless they were affiliated to the FKTU, the FKTU could not be considered on the basis of membership data as the most representative Workers' organisation. The objecting organisations also expressed regret for not having been allowed to participate in the Conference even as advisers.

15. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Soo Gil Park, Ambassador and Alternate Head of Delegation of the Republic of Korea, stated that the objecting organisations were the second and third largest of the three trade unions in his country and were presumed to have together about 100,000 members. The largest trade union was the FKTU, whose membership, according to the most recent available data, comprised 1,886,000 out of the approximately two million unionised workers. The Government considered that it had fulfilled the requirements of Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution by consulting the FKTU.

16. The Committee noted that the Government had consulted the FKTU, which appeared to be by far the largest of the trade union organisations in the country. Nevertheless, while the sizes of the objecting organisations were disputed, the Government had stated that they were the next largest in the country. The Committee considered that the Government should endeavour to include them in its consultations, bearing in mind that all the most representative Workers' organisations, whether officially recognised or not, should be consulted when proceeding to the nomination of the Workers' delegate and his advisers to the Conference.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Nepal

17. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Nepal submitted by the General Federation of Nepalese Trade Unions (GEFONT).

18. The objecting organisation stated that the organisation to which the Workers' delegate belonged, the Nepalese Trade Union Congress (NTUC), was a "yellow" trade union bringing together employers and managers which had the support of the party in power. The objecting organisation indicated that it was the most representative Workers' organisation of Nepal and had requested the Ministry of Labour to nominate it for the delegation but it had received no reply.

19. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. S. N. Shrivastava, Government delegate of Nepal to the Conference, pointed out that when the trade union law of Nepal, which was in preparation, was adopted, it would then be possible to determine the relative importance of each of the different organisations. The Workers' delegate nominated by the Government was President of the NTUC, which had a long history in the field of trade unionism. Furthermore, since Nepal belonged to the group of least developed countries, the Government was only able to nominate an Employers' and a Workers' delegate to the Conference.

20. The Committee pointed out that the objection did not provide any evidence that GEFONT was more representative of the Workers than NTUC, to which the Workers' delegate nominated by the Government belonged – although the information provided by the Government was not conclusive — and decided not to uphold the objection. At the same time it recalled the obligation of governments to consult the most representative Workers' organisations in the country and it expressed the hope that the adoption of the new trade union law in preparation would remove any doubts in the future concerning the representative character of the Workers' delegate of Nepal to the Conference.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Romania

21. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Romania submitted by the National Employers' Association of Romania.

22. The objecting organisation stated that it enjoyed legal recognition and that the organisations represented in the Employers' delegation nominated by the Government did not have legal status and were not representative of the Employers of Romania. It proposed an alternative list of seven names which, in its opinion, should have constituted the Employers' delegation of Romania.

23. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Dan Mircea Popescu, Minister of Labour and Social Welfare and Head of the delegation of Romania to the Conference, gave a list of the organisations consulted concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Romania. The consultations had taken place in May. The Employers' delegate had been elected by secret ballot as President of the National Confederation of Employers of Romania. Two members of the delegation represented State enterprises or mixed capital and the two others private enterprise.

24. The Committee pointed out that according to the explanations of the Government, consultations had taken place and the Employers' delegation had been nominated in agreement with the most representative Employers' organisations of Romania in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution and decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Czechoslovakia

25. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Czechoslovakia submitted by the Trade Union Association of Bohemia, Moravia and Slovakia (OSCMS).

26. The objecting organisation maintained that the Government did not reply to its letter of 3 March in which it had called attention to Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution. Without consulting the OSCMS, which had more than 300,000 members, the Government had arbitrarily nominated a Workers' delegation composed of a single trade union organisation, the Czech and Slovak Confederation of Trade Unions (CS KOS), ignoring trade union pluralism existing in the country.

27. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Petr Miller, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs and Head of the delegation of Czechoslakia to the Conference, stated that the Government had consulted the organisations considered as most representative who were represented in tripartite national consultative bodies. These were the CS KOS, which brought together two central organisations with a membership of 4,300,000 and 2,100,000 respectively, and the Confedertion of Art and Culture (KUK), which had a membership of 100,000.

28. Other trade unions including those represented by the objecting organisation (which according to the information provided by the government had a membership of about 150,000) had requested from Government representation in the Council of Economic and Social Agreement in the second half of 1991. The Government, conscious of trade union pluralism existing in the country, was studying the incorporation of the OSCMS in the said Council in consultation with the other organisations. If the result of the investigations proved positive, so far as the representative character of the OSCMS is concerned, the Government would take the participation of that organisation into consideration in future Conferences of the ILO.

29. The committee noted that the Government had undertaken consultations with the organisations represented in the tripartite national bodies and had nominated a Workers' delegation in agreement with the CS KOS, which according to the information available was the most representative Workers' organisation in Czechoslovakia and decided not to uphold the objection. At the same time the Committee also noted the intention expressed by the Government to examine the representative character of other organisations which wanted to be included in the national consultation machinery, and if the result of this examination proved positive in the case of the OSCMS, the latter would be taken into consideration in the future.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Togo

30. The committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Togo, Mr. A. Tevi-Mensah, submitted by the "Confédération Nationale des Travailleurs du Togo" (CNTT). The objection was signed by Mr. E. H. Tchindé, who was Secretary-General of that Confederation and who was accredited as adviser to the Workers' delegate of Togo.

31. Having noted Article 26, paragraph 4(c), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, under which an objection is not receivable "if the author of the objection is serving as adviser to the delegate to whose nomination objection is taken", the Committee concluded that the objection was not receivable.

Late objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Myanmar

32. On June 1992, the Committee received an objection from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) concerning the workers' delegate of Myanmar. The name of the Workers' delegate of Myanmar appeared in the Provisional List of Delegations, published as a supplement to the Provisional Record of 3 June 1992. This objection was, therefore, received after the end of the 72-hour time limit provided for in Article 26, paragraph 4(a) of the Conference Standing Orders.

33. The Committee accordingly considered that the objection was not receivable in accordance with the above-mentioned provision.

34. The Committee noted that Article 26, paragraph 4(a) authorised it to extend the time limit in the case of an objection to the nomination of a delegate or adviser from a distant country and considered the arguments of the ICFTU in favour of such an extension, which referred to a delay by the authorities in issuing a visa to the person who had to provide the necessary information pertaining to the objection.

35. The Committee, however, decided not to invoke that provision, considering that the prescribed time limit could have been observed especially as the objecting organisation was present in Geneva. In this respect, the Committee reminded organisations which intended to present objections in the future of the possibility of presenting a formal objection within the prescribed time limit and later submitting information in support of the objection.

36. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Geneva, 16 June 1992.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL ON THE SITUATION OF WORKERS OF THE OCCUPIED ARAB TERRITORIES: DISCUSSION

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We are now going to start the special sitting to discuss the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Before I give the floor to the first speaker, I should like to remind you of what was stated this morning, that is to say that the speeches will be limited to seven minutes – and, I repeat, seven minutes maximum – except for persons speaking on behalf of a group of countries or of delegates. These will have the right to ten minutes.

I therefore request you to respect these time-limits and also to respect the Standing Orders and the decisions of the Conference so that this debate will take place in a suitably dignified atmosphere.

I should also like to remind you that, if there are any requests for the right to reply, these may be exercised at the end of the sitting and only for two minutes.

Once again I remind the representatives of non-governmental organisations who have requested the floor that they may speak at the end of the sitting.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ISMAIL KHALIL (representative of Palestine) – On behalf of the State of Palestine and the Palestine Liberation Organisation, allow me to salute you and to express to you our thanks for this special sitting. This sitting is a true expression of your solidarity with the people and workers of Palestine. They have been suffering the worst forms of harassment and oppression as well as hateful occupation and violation of basic human rights for more than half a century. The Palestinian problem has now become the problem and the cause of every free being in the world.

In the light of the important role played by the International Labour Organisation, and in the light of the events that took place over the past year, our Palestinian people in all categories and situations, have responded with all our efforts to achieve a fair and lasting peace. We have participated in all conferences aimed at achieving peace, in spite of all the obstacles which were placed in our way by the Israeli occupation authorities, who continue a systematic policy to violate the basic human rights of the Palestinians. The continued Israeli aggression against our people and workers in southern Lebanon and the results of this aggression in the form of death, distruction and displacement, show that Israel does not wish to comply with United Nations resolutions or those adopted by this Organisation.

It is impossible for me in the brief time allowed to fully review all the violations of human rights by the Israeli authorities against our Palestinian people and workers. I shall simply quote a few excerpts from the Report submitted by the Director-General to the present session of the Conference without any comments or analysis. The report "is based on the findings of a mission sent by the Director-General to Palestine and the occupied Arab territories" to follow up on recent developments.

1. First of all, the continued occupation of the territories makes it difficult to respect the various criteria and principles found in the International Labour Organisation's Constitution and Conventions.

2. Secondly, in addition to the continued threats against trade unionists and unions, Israel refuses to register new trade unions.

3. The forceful displacement of a number of Palestinian workers constitutes discrimination, which extends also to wages, in terms of the failure to respect minimum wage guarantees, the exploitation of Palestinian workers and discrimination against them as regards social security; there are also attempts to enslave labour. I would like to refer to what is happening these days in the occupied territories, especially as regards repressive policies against workers in the occupied Gaza Strip. The suffering of our people and workers and the negative impact on our economy in the occupied Gaza Strip have led to the complete deterioration of the economic situation. Thirty thousand workers have been deprived of their livelihood and thus cannot provide proper food or care for their children and families. The estimates of the loss to the national economy in the Gaza Strip is estimated at about $30 million up until now. The continued harassment of the Israeli occupation forces against our people and workers has led to the division of the Gaza Strip in three sectors. I believe that you all know that the Gaza Strip cannot be divided.

4. There has been an increase in the number of cases of the expulsion of Palestinians, with thousands of cases of arrests and imprisonment, the destruction of homes in reprisal for alleged acts of violence, and the confiscation of property.

5. Economic difficulties are growing and arbitrary and discriminatory practices are also on the rise.

You will recall that this distinguished Conference adopted in 1974 a resolution condemning racism and the violation of basic freedoms and trade union rights in Palestine. The Conference also adopted another resolution in 1980 on the effects of settlements on the situation of Arab workers. Other recommendations and conclusions were adopted by the International Labour Organisation's missions which have visited Israel and Palestine every year since 1978. On this occasion, we wonder as to the response given by the occupation authorities to these resolutions and recommendations. We here reaffirm that those authorities have continued to defy such resolutions and recommendations, which is a continued defiance of international legality. This has led to a deterioration of the living conditions of our people and nations. Conditions have deteriorated to such a degree that we demand an immediate response by the international community, as this is a threat to the principles and purposes and future of the United Nations and international agencies.

Confronted with this tragic situation where all our Palestinian Arab people suffer, we call upon this Conference, which enjoys a high moral influence, to assume its role and to break this wall of silence in respect of a Member of this Organisation, as it did in the past when it adopted decisive measures against a similar regime in South Africa. We are convinced that the organs and bodies of this Organisation, its Governing Body and the International Labour Office, with their farsightedness and sound analysis, are capable of drawing up suitable programmes to remedy the dangerous situation in which the workers and people of Palestine are struggling. We therefore suggest the drawing up of practical measures or some form of permanent machinery which would enable the International Labour Office to follow more closely the situation of Palestinian workers and to produce programmes to put an end to their suffering and strengthen their resistance to the Israeli occupation. Amongst our proposals are:

1. The recommendations contained in the reports of the missions sent in the past two years;

2. The appointment of a permanent representative of the International Labour Organisation to observe and monitor the situation of our workers in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories;

3. The establishment of a special unit within the framework of the International Labour Organisation to monitor new developments and to take initiatives on the spot;

4. The establishment of a permanent committee of the Conference to examine the Director-General's Report and to submit recommendations to the Conference.

5. The organisation of specialised conferences like the Tripartite International Conference that was held in Harare last May...

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – I am very sorry but you have gone beyond your seven minutes. I am afraid we must abide by this rule. I regret it is impossible for you to continue.

Mr. DA SILVA (Government delegate, Portugal, speaking on behalf of the European Community) – I have the honour to speak at this special sitting of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, on behalf of the European Community and its member States.

I would like first of all to thank the representatives of the Director-General for the excellent Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

The European Community and its member States acknowledge the fact that the Israeli authorities have afforded the Director-General's representatives all the necessary facilities to carry out their task and also that they could count on the full participation of all the personalities and the organisations concerned, both Israeli and Palestinian.

The situation of the occupied Arab territories is central to the Middle East peace process. The European Community and its member States were and remain encouraged by the convening of the Madrid Peace Conference in which they participated as well as by the following rounds of bilateral and multilateral negotiations. We welcome these developments and the positive effects that they should have on the situation in the occupied Arab territories, their population and, indeed, on all the issues dealt with in the present Report.

Unfortunately, the continued military occupation of the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights, prevents the full respect for the standards enshrined in the instruments of the ILO.

The Report before us stresses the very difficult situation of Palestinian workers who seek to earn their living in the occupied territories or in Israel and equality of treatment between Israeli and Palestinian workers. Freedom of employment, of association, of movement and of expression continue to be severely restricted, not only as a result of occupation, but also because of the economic difficulties which the workers have to endure.

The European Community and its member States consider that freedom of association is a fundamental human right. We believe, together with the ILO, that a true dialogue between the Histadrut and the trade unions in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip would prove extremely useful both to the workers in the occupied Arab territories and to the improvement of relations between the Arab population in the territories and the Israeli population.

The major obstacles to economic and social development in the occupied territories are equally clear from the Report, whether these arise from administrative or security measures adopted by the occupying power.

Another issue which the European Community and its member States consider of the utmost importance and to which the Director-General draws attention, is the illegal policy of settlements carried out by the Israeli Government in violation of international legal instruments, among them the Fourth Geneva Convention. We thus share in the concerns expressed in the report in this respect and I quote: "The policy of establishing or extending settlements in the occupied Arab territories has long been considered by the ILO as one which has severely detrimental effects on the territories and the Arab populations of the territories. For this, and other reasons, the international community has strongly denounced this policy, which over the past year, has been pursued more relentlessly than at any time since the occupation began."

The consequences of this policy, the arbitrary uprooting of trees and vines, the confiscation of land needed for the construction of settlements and roads leading to them, restrictions on access to water, can only increase the tension among the two communities and jeopardise the basic social and economic rights of the population of the occupied Arab territories.

The European Community and its member States have on different occasions deplored the policy of settlements pursued by Israel. Recently they have appealed to all parties involved in the peace process to abstain from any action which would impede the establishment of a climate of confidence, including the continuation of the policy of settlements.

The European Community and its member States believe that the improvement of the economic situation of the occupied Arab territories can contribute in a decisive manner to the improvement of the situation of the workers. In this connection we recall our commitment to continue to increase our economic aid to the occupied Arab territories. According to the principles and priorities previously established, we attach special importance to the creation of employment and to the sectors of health and education.

On 30 April 1992 it was decided to commit an additional sum of 12 million ECU to technical, educational and health assistance to the territories.

Before I finish, I would like to note that the Director-General's Report underlines the efforts made by the Israeli authorities and the administration responsible for the territories to relieve the situation and I quote: "Measures have been taken to afford a number of tax concessions; licences for new enterprises have been granted more liberally; restrictions on the inflow of foreign capital have been lifted; and some additional banking facilities are being made available." Other positive signs include "the material improvements made in labour exchange to facilitate and accelerate the processing of work permit applications, the payment of benefits and the provision to workers of information about their rights." But the report goes on to say: "Important as these measures are, it is, nevertheless, difficult to conclude that they will have any major impact on the ailing economy of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip – at least in the short term."

Since it has been one of our grave concerns, we would like to welcome the reopening of the universities and the steps taken by the Israeli authorities to improve existing vocational training facilities available in the territories.

However, as the Director-General's Report points out, much remains to be done to eliminate the harassment and discrimination to which the workers of the occupied Arab territories are exposed.

The European Community and its member States express the hope that the positive signs indicated in the present Report will very soon develop into concrete measures and that other positive decisions will be taken in Corder to allow an improvement in the situation of the Arab population in the occupied territories.

We urge the Director-General to continue to promote the technical cooperation activities of the ILO for the benefit of the workers who are the focus of our discussion today as part of the effort to which we are all committed, that is the success of the Middle East peace process.

The European Community and its member States look forward to the next Report of the mission of the International Labour Organisation which we sincerely hope will reflect an improvement in the situation in the occupied Arab territories.

Original – Chinese: Mr. FU (Workers' adviser, China) – I would like to thank you for having given me the floor. Since last year when we discussed the Palestinian problem in this august Conference, considerable changes have occurred in the situation in the Middle East. Thanks to the joint efforts undertaken by the parties concerned and the international community, a breakthrough was achieved in the peace process in the Middle East, and the Arab-Israeli negotiations have provided a hope of peace for the different countries in this region. However, we must recognise that peacemaking in the Middle East will be a lengthy process, particularly since negotiations between the Arab States and Israel have not yet led to substantial results.

In such circumstances the efforts of all of us are still essential.

The Palestinian question lies at the heart of the problem of the Middle East. This matter, which for many years has remained unresolved, not only stands in the way of peace and development in this region but also affects peace and stability throughout the world.

Millions of Palestinians, a people who have neither home nor hearth and have suffered tremendous losses both materially and in human lives, still live in the greatest poverty. For over 40 years the Palestinian people and workers have undertaken, under extremely difficult conditions, a long and heroic struggle to restore their legitimate national rights. Their travails deserve our deepest sympathy and their struggle is worthy of our energetic support. We wish to express our high esteem to the Palestinian people and workers.

The Chinese workers and trade unions have always supported the Palestinian people and workers in their just struggle to restore their legitimate rights. We feel that the Palestinian problem must be resolved in a just and rational manner, in accordance with the relevant resolutions adopted by the United Nations, and particularly resolutions 242 and 338 of the Security Council. The legitimate national rights of the Palestinian people must be restored and the occupied Arab territories must be returned. At the same time, the sovereignty and security of Israel must be respected and guaranteed. In our opinion, Israel must first put an end to the construction of settlement colonies in the occupied territories and to the expulsion of Palestinian civilians. It must enable those who have been driven out to go back to their homeland in order to create an atmosphere of reconciliation allowing us gradually to find a just and rational solution to the Palestinian problem. We hope that the ILO too will be able to devote efforts to this, for example by convening more often this type of conference and organising vocational training courses for young people in the occupied territories.

We sincerely hope that the international community, ILO member States and all the parties concerned will be able to make a contribution to the just and rational final settlement of the Palestinian and Middle East problems. As in the past, Chinese workers and trade unions will continue their steadfast efforts to achieve peace and stability in the Middle East.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JARWAN (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is my pleasure at the outset to place on record my appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO for having sent a mission to Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. The sending of this mission is in application of the resolutions adopted at the 59th and 66th Sessions of the International Labour Conference (1974 and 1980) respectively, denouncing the Israeli authorities for practising a policy of discrimination, racism and violation of trade union freedoms and rights and the implantation of Israeli settlements in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories.

I should also like to commend the report of the ILO mission this year for its clarity and objectivity; it also contains useful information and recommendations.

The mission of this year is the 15th in a series of missions which have examined and assessed the living, workers and workers in the other occupied Arab territories. The mission reports, submitted to successive International Labour Conferences, always disclosed the truth about the deteriorating living and working conditions of the Arab workers in these occupied territories and the violation of their freedoms. Moreover, the Conference demonstrated its objectivity, justice and fairness by adopting the two aforementioned resolutions. These resolutions call for a continuation of these missions in order to monitor Israeli practices in the occupied Arab territories. In spite of the seriousness of the mission reports and the fairness of its recommendations, the Israeli authorities have, unfortunately, failed to respond to them and cooperate; on the contrary, they still maintain an intransigent attitude and flout international legitimacy. Consequently, the conditions of Arab workers have continued to deteriorate year after year; Palestinian civilians are deported; workers are arrested, as soon as they go to work; and toxic gases are used against citizens, thus contributing to the pollution of the environment. What is more, settlements have expanded in all the occupied Arab territories, including Jerusalem and the Golan.

This special sitting is not an end in itself: it constitutes a forum at which the views and proposals of delegations may be voiced. The experience of the past two sittings failed to live up to our expectations; indeed, the Director-General did not reach any clear-cut conclusions on the work of those two sessions, which is tantamount to saying that their work is of little benefit. This emphasises the need to set up a well-defined machinery which would implement the conclusions and follow up discussions at the Conference on the subject.

Given the attitude adopted by the international community and world public opinion, and the resolutions adopted by various regional and international forums on the unjust practices of the Israeli occupation authorities – and in accordance with the conclusions and the recommendations of the annual ILO mission and the ILO's mandate to defend the rights of workers – we believe that the ILO should adopt effective measures. We therefore propose the setting up a special committee which would meet annually within the framework of the Conference to consider the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. This committee would follow up the Report of the Director-General, thus constituting a practical base for the adoption of resolutions and appropriate measures to put an end to the practices perpetrated by Israeli occupation authorities and to support the steadfastness of Arab workers and provide them with moral support in their daily suffering.

The setting up of the committee, as proposed in the Director-General's Report, is fully in keeping with the Standing Orders of the Conference. Indeed, the Conference has already set a precedent by establishing similar committees such as the Committee on Structure and the Committee on Apartheid.

We know full well that the rights of Palestinian Arab workers will not be respected unless there is an end to the Israeli occupation of all occupied Arab territories and the recognition of the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and the establishment of an independent State on its national territory. Until this is achieved, the international community, as represented by this Conference, is called upon to condemn and denounce Israeli policies territories and to protect their rights. We are confident that the efforts of this Conference will contribute to the international efforts made to find a solution to the Middle East problem and to achieve peace in the region.

Mr. MELAS (Government delegate, Austria) – Once again the Report of the Director-General clearly describes the result of an ILO mission to Israel and the occupied territories. I wish to thank the participants and all parties, including the Government of Israel, for making it possible to carry out the mission's mandate.

My delegation has already pointed out in the general discussion tha' a state of permanent insecurity and violence cannot foster the principles and standards of the ILO. Today, in the 25th year of military occupation, we are still confronted with the same tragic reality but by admitting the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention, the occupying power could demonstrate its goodwill and send a sign of confidence to the population of the territories as well as to the international community. However, Israel's obligation towards the Palestinians in the occupied territories should not be confined to the Fourth Geneva Convention. Austria has repeatedly expressed its great concern about the policy of extending settlements in the occupied territories. We fully share the views expressed in the Report regarding the specific implications of the Israeli settlement policy such as the legal and social double standard which is bound to increase discrimination and to create further tensions and arbitrary measures.

My delegation has noted with satisfaction the encouraging references to certain measures taken by the civil administration responsible for the territories, among them the reopening of all the universities, the improvement of existing vocational training facilities and other attempts to meet the needs of the economy in the territories. Apart from these specific elements, our concerns remain unchanged as regards the continuing restriction on exercising basic human rights, among them freedom of association. Trade unions and their members continue to be subject to reprisals by the occupying power, including unwarranted detention and other severe measures. We therefore fully share the view expressed in the Report that considerable advantages could be gained by entering into a substantial dialogue between the trade unions of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and the Histadrut. Furthermore, I believe that similar dialogues with the Israeli authorities could only benefit both sides.

Much has been said during our general discussion about the mutual effects of peace, political stability and social justice. It is my firm conviction that solving the social problems in the occupied territories goes hand in hand with a comprehensive, just and lasting solution of the Middle East issue.

Since the last session of the International Labour Conference, a process has started which may provide an opportunity to achieve such a solution. I wish to assure you of Austria's willingness to support the ongoing endeavours and I would like to express my sincere hope that they will lead to the restoration of the full social rights of the population in the occupied territories.

Original – Arabic: Mr. BOZO (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – Allow me to congratulate once again the President of this session of the Conference on his election.

The Report of the Director-General that is submitted to the International Labour Conference this year considers the details of Israeli racist practices and the arbitrary and expansionist measures taken against the Arab workers and the inhabitants of Palestine. This shows that Israel is still resorting to repression and to harsh measures against all the strata of the population and that Israel still imposes on the people collective sanctions such as expulsion, deportation and prison sentences, destroying houses at the slightest pretext, as well as assassinations, beatings, the closing down of universities and schools, whilst at the same time giving free rein to the extremes of the Zionist movement and of the Jewish settlers who terrorise Arab nationals. All this occurs despite the recommendations and resolutions of the international organisations in their effort to halt the establishment of Israeli settlements and do away with the existing settlements. Israel continues to work openly on the building of more settlements in these lands. We have seen these settlements are changing the Arab nature of the region.

There are hundreds of thousands of new settlers, around 400,000, who have come to the occupied Arab territories. The authorities settle these people, provide houses for them at the expense of the true inhabitants, the real inhabitants. But despite of the resolutions taken by the various international organisation and despite the fact that these people have no ties to the land, Israel is preventing the Arab inhabitants from exercising their rights, according to international laws and Conventions. Although we appreciate the information contained in the Report of the international mission to the occupied Arab territories, we would like to say the following: We believe that the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories should have a different title.

We believe that the mission listened far more to the Israeli authorities than to sources from Arab countries and Arab organisations.

The Reports continue but so do the violations. There are no proposals to put to a stop to these violations and to these practices that have been going on for a long time;

Paragraph 111 of the Director-General's Report states that the situation of the inhabitants in the Golan is a special one because their citizenship is not clearly defined. It is indeed surprising that the International Labour Organisation should say that their nationality is not clearly defined, thus implying that the attempts of Syria to regain the Golan are both null and void. It is not a legitimate battle.

The people of that region have refused any other nationality but the nationality they have always had, the Syrian one. They are Syrian Arabs, therefore, we would like to ask the International Labour Organisation to work with other international organisations to implement resolution No. IX of 1974 and No. II of 1980.

We would like to see Israel obliged to stop building settlements, to destroy the existing settlements and to put a stop to further immigration, to halt its practice of expelling Arab workers and trade unionists, seizing their land and property and discriminating against them and violating their trade union rights and basic human freedoms. We would like to see the granting of technical and financial assistance, support for economic and industrial enterprises as well as agricultural projects, training and retraining programmes for workers in accordance with their actual economic needs. We would also like to call for the setting up of a special committee at the Conference to consider the Report of the Director-General and the implementation of resolution No. IX of 1974 and resolution No. II of 1980 of the ILO.

The Syrian Arab Republic, makes an appeal for an equitable and lasting peace based on Security Council resolutions Nos. 242 and 338, on the principle of the exchange of land for peace and the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the occupied Arab territories.

We will continue to take part in the peace talks despite Israeli terrorisation and despite Israel's provocation and refusal to enter into the heart of the matter and despite its brutal aggression against southern Lebanon.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – It gives me great honour to speak on behalf of the working class of Pakistan and to associate myself with other distinguished speakers who have taken the rostrum before me in welcoming the decision of the Governing Body to hold a special sitting of this Session of the Conference on the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories and in expressing appreciation of the Report.

The Director-General's Report once again highlights the suffering and plight of the Arab workers in the occupied territories in terms of denial of their trade union and human rights. They are being treated as foreigners in their own land. It also reflects how they are being subjected to discrimination in wages, employment, social security and economic security in terms of income.

May I take this opportunity to invite the attention of this august forum to pages 48 and 49 of the Report where it is said that Israeli authorities are continuing the establishment of settlements in occupied Arab territories and almost 200,000 people were settled during 1990 and the same number in 1991. And three times the amount spent during any other year in the territories since 1967 was spent in the year 1991 – 1,500 million shekels. This shows how much violation is taking place of Security Council resolutions 446 and 465 which prohibit such settlements in occupied Arab territories, while Arab workers are becoming homeless.

Similarly, in the case of denial of trade union rights, in the Director-General's Report on page 51, paragraph 121, it is stated that the Country report on human rights practices for 1990 of the United States Department of State reports that both Muslims and Christians "are treated less favourably than Israeli settlers on a broad range of issues, including equality before the law, the right to residence, freedom of movement, sale of crops and goods, land and water use, and access to health and social services", which also illustrates the suffering of Arab workers in their own land.

Also, on page 29, paragraph 72, the Director-General's Report reflects how they are being discriminated against in terms of social security. It states that, although the employer who employs Arab workers contributes, and although the Arab workers also contribute in the same way as other workers to social security, Arab workers are not entitled to benefit as they are residents of the occupied Arab territories and not of Israel. They are subjected to denial of their rights to their own savings.

On page 19, paragraph 44, the Report reflects how Arab workers are subjected to unemployment in their own land: only one in four of the Palestinian labour force works for wages in the territories, 37 per cent are self-employed in the territories, while 35 per cent work for wages in Israel and 3 per cent are unemployed. This also shows the suffering, in both economic and social terms, of the Arab workers and their families.

I need not go into details, but just to point out paragraph 23, page 9, we see that the per capita income on the West Bank amounts to US$2,290 whereas in the Gaza Strip it is US$10,332.

We in Pakistan and other freedom-loving countries believe that such suffering should be abolished and that the ILO should continue to extend support to Arab workers so that they may improve their social and economic status.

We also believe that this is a vestige of colonialism, as it is for the people of South Africa, and we fully support their right of self-determination, their right of independence, and we share with other speakers the opinion that a special committee should be set up in order to give more relief to this important human problem.

While the violations of Security Council resolutions continue, we also look to the United States. Freedom loving peoples, including that of Pakistan, expect that the United States, which has taken the initiative to sponsor a peace conference, will bring a positive result. But no conclusion has yet been achieved and the people of Palestine are still suffering.

We fully support their right to self-determination and appeal to all freedom-loving people to extend support so that they may achieve independence which is the basic right of all human beings.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-KABARITI (Minister of Labour, Jordan) – I would like to express on behalf of my country's delegation my thanks for convening this special session and for examining the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

This Report is an integral part of the work of the Conference. This special sitting has a special importance and sensitivity on account of the humanitarian problem raised by the situation of Arab workers and the Palestinian cause. It helps to increase the awareness of this tragedy on the part of the international community. My country's delegation wishes once again to draw attention to a sad concerning the disparity between the application of the law and international justice.

Here I would like to recall what was said last year by my colleague Khurshid Ahmed when he reminded us of the resolution adopted by the International Labour Organisation which said that no trade union rights can exist without civil rights and no civil rights can be achieved without independence and freedom.

Indeed, the question of the close relationship between the purposes and aims of this Organisation and national and international practices needs no proof. International labour standards are part of an international body of law, and social justice cannot be achieved in the absence of democracy, human rights, freedom and independence. The conclusions of the Director-General's Report are fully in accordance with the periodic reports drawn up by the International Labour Organisation (15 in all) which show us the reality of the tragic situation of Palestinian workers and employers in the Golan Heights and Lebanon. These reports confirm the continued violation by the occupation authorities of the provisions of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, of human rights and of international covenants and agreements.

It goes without saying that we all condemn forcibly the occupation of the territories of other countries by force and that we all support the right to self-determination of all nations. Furthermore, we all condemn inhuman practices which undermine the principles of social justice.

On the same basis, we may add that the settlement plans, expansionist aims and aggression are also a violation of human rights and that any violation of legitimate rights can only lead to a unified stand whereby it is condemned and rejected so that justice may be upheld and legality prevail.

Here I would like to refer with all admiration and respect to the attitude and stand of the European Community which last year condemned the serious violations suffered by the Arab workers in these territories, as well as the discriminatory treatment they endured such as lack of education and other facilities. It also condemned the occupation and settlement policies as a threat to peace in the region and in the world.

Allow me to sum up the contents of the periodic reports drafted by the International Labour Organisation over the years on arbitrary measures and practices:

- Depriving Arab workers of their lawful right to employment;
- Confiscating Arab lands, property, production and crops;
- The continuing policy of confiscating land, and the intensification of Israeli settlement;

- Raising obstacles to development and preventing employers from administering their enterprises;
- Imposing high taxes on workers, employers and production enterprises, driving them to the brink of bankruptcy;
- Restricting freedom of trade and movement;
- Destroying agricultural wealth, including the cutting down of trees, and preventing Arab citizens from working their land, and confiscating their crops and their property;
- Restricting the freedom of workers and employers with regard to trade union action, closing down trade union headquarters, arresting trade unionists, confiscating union property, destroying their files and forbidding them from meeting;
- Collective detentions and arbitrary administrative detentions;
- Imposing curfews, banning travel and closing down trading establishments;
- House arrest for trade unionists, workers and employers;
- Banishing trade unionists and other citizens;
- Destroying homes and confiscating private property;
- Closing down educational institutions and preventing Arab citizens from practising their religion in their places of worship.

This is in addition to the use of live ammunition against innocent women, children and elderly people, resulting in hundreds of deaths and thousands of injuries.

Since we highly value the credibility and effectiveness of the ILO, whose fundamental principles of law and justice we hold in high esteem, we request the Organisation and all its member States to take all measures in their power to support the legitimate rights of the people of the occupied territories. The arbitrary acts of the Israeli occupation authorities must be halted. These authorities, ignoring the resolutions of the United Nations and other international organisations, constantly violate international law and the Geneva and the Hague Conventions, flouting human rights in Palestine and the other occupied territories, in Lebanon and the Golan Heights.

We believe that the observance of United Nations resolutions, the implementation of the resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference, respect for the rules of international law and for human rights in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories would be an essential step towards recognition of the legitimate national rights of the Palestinian people and of its desire for freedom, justice and equality. If the occupation authorities committed themselves to abide by these resolutions it would be an important step toward the establishment of a just and lasting peace in our region. The international community is undertaking great efforts to see this process through.

(Speaker continues in English.)

In conclusion, I should like to recall that the Israelis cannot have the territories and peace at the same time. In other words, they cannot have their cake, eat it and sit on it at the same time.

Mr. ZELLHOFFER (Workers' adviser, United States) – I would like to thank the President for giving me this opportunity to address the third, and what I am hopeful will be the last, special sitting. There are indeed reasons for optimism. Since the last special sitting there have been dramatic and positive developments which give rise to renewed hopes for a comprehensive, just and peaceful settlement of this complex situation. Importantly, for the first time the parties involved have sat together, a dialogue has started, and an attempt to tackle the wide range of problems has begun. The peace conference process which began last October in Madrid is an important development, which gives rise to renewed optimism, not euphoria, but optimism that the difficulties can be overcome.

We have in our hands today during this Special Sitting two Reports of the Director-General. One is the Appendices (vol. 2), entitled "Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories", and if I recall correctly, the 15th annual Report by the Director-General on this subject. It was helpful to see mentioned in the Report the support of the workers in Israel through their national union, the Histadrut, to continue their efforts to provide services and assistance to Palestinian workers regarding their rights. The Report mentions over 400 cases having been dealt with. It should be noted also that the Histadrut provides legal services in Arabic, often through mobile service units to make them more accessible to the workers concerned. The situation of the Palestinian workers is indeed serious and it must be addressed in a broader sense.

More importantly, the second Report we have before us today is the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO. This Report is very relevant to the topic being discussed today, especially as it is so applicable to the entire region. Democracy, the Report notes, "institutionalises the settlement of disputes by enlisting the participation of the various interest groups in constant, constructive negotiation leading to solutions that are acceptable to all".

It is more than just unfortunate, it is a profound tragedy that democracy has not been allowed to develop in so many countries in the greater region. Human dignity and thus human potential had been held in check by so many regimes through the suppression of fundamental rights including one of its cornerstones, freedom of association. The practice of democracy, the building of institutions and mechanisms which underpin respect for freedom and social equity, with very, very few exceptions is severely limited in the region.

In all too many States in the area, when trade unionists attempt to exercise the rights of freedom of association, they are subject to arbitary detention, loss of their jobs or worse. In five States, unions are banned outright. In another five States, no collective bargaining is permitted. In one State, organising a strike is punishable by death. In another States, trade unions are subject to government control including the appointment of union officials, supervision of union finances and membership qualification. In 11 States, Palestinian and other foreign workers face more stringent restrictions on their freedoms and rights than local workers.

Indeed the Director-General's Report Democratisation and the ILO is most timely for this region. The challenge to carry forth the ILO's mission – to secure respect for human rights through the application of its standards, to secure economic justice and social equity, to promote the full and equal participation of the social partners through its unique tripartite approach – is immense. It is certainly an appropriate time to underscore the ILO's competence and the obligation of member States in the region to undertake a determined and unrelenting effort to advance human dignity through social and economic democratisation: an effort that we should all know vitally involves the full participation of free and independent trade unions and employers' organisations.

So what will this third special sitting accomplish? I expect it will achieve very little, other than costing around US$ 50,000 and, like the other two previous special sittings, this represents an expenditure that could have been far more wisely made. Other than serving to politicise this unique and specialised United Nations agency, these special sittings weaken the respect and credibility of the ILO's technical competence and authority, and it erodes its long-established and well-regarded supervisory machinery.

To politicise the work of the ILO would be tantamount to destroying this Organisation. Unfortunately there are some, in various parts of the world, who would not mind seeing the ILO weakened or worse, but hopefully the vast majority of the ILO's constituents view its authority and competence as anchored in its unique mandate and that mandate is not political.

What can we learn from this exercise today? A great deal, if wisdom and compassion have anything to do with it. We do not need special sittings and we do not need to see the other work of the Conference politicised. Arising out of the normal procedures, including the supervisory machinery of this Organisation over the years, is a sufficient and authoritative body of documentation that clearly tells us that the problems, and they are severe ones, are far wider and deeper, involving an entire region and that the ILO must, within its area of competence, undertake a far more visible and active role to promote the development of democracy and social and economic justice.

In closing, I would like to quote from the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO. Before I do so, I would like to add that I disagree with the pace which the refers to. That pace, I believe, must be speeded up. Now I leave you with the words of the Director-General. "It matters little that the pace at which democratisation is proceeding varies according to the socio-economic development or the culture of the countries or regions concerned; what matters is that it is advancing, for together with social justice democracy is the sole guarantee of peace in the world".

Original – Arabic: Mr. SMAOUI (Minister of Social Affairs, Tunisia, speaking on behalf of the Arab Maghreb Union) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is my pleasure to express in my own name and on behalf of my colleagues, the Ministers of Labour and Social Affairs in the countries of the Arab Maghreb, our gratitude and appreciation to the ILO Director-General for his continued following-up of the situation of the Arab workers in Palestine and other occupied territories, which reflects the denunciation by the international conscience of the policy of racism and racial discrimination, and the violation of other trade union rights and freedoms, and the policy of settlement perpetrated by the Israeli occupation authorities against the people and workers of Palestine.

The Director-General's Report, and his monitoring of this subject for the third successive year, is in keeping with the spirit and philosophy of this Organisation, which calls for the establishment of social justice and peace on the basis of the respect for basic human rights, as established by international Labour Conventions and Recommendations which reject all manifestations of occupation, repression and the violation of freedoms and rights.

We observe today the continuation of the Israeli entity, of its arbitrary practices and the aggressive acts against Palestinian workers, since it continues to confiscate land and holdings and to impose restrictions on the utilisation of these lands by their lawful owners, and to establish settlements. We observe that the occupation authorities violate fundamental trade union rights and deprive Palestinian workers of all protection and impose punitive measures on Palestinian workers preventing them from performing their duties, which has increased unemployment among Palestinians.

This deteriorating situation of the Palestinian workers calls for the intervention of the ILO in support of a people suffering from a grave military occupation within the framework of which the most atrocious of crimes are being committed.

This special sitting is held at a time when the international community as a whole is witnessing the ushering in of radical changes in international relations, based on freedom and democracy as well as cooperation and the safeguard of human rights.

Yet we believe firmly that the international effort and results to which we aspire will not be accomplished so long as the Palestinian people continue to suffer the deprivation of their rights to self-determination and the establishment of their independent State, so long as every effort is made to frustrate the heroic struggle of the Palestinian people and the intifada.

Here I should like to reconfirm the position of the countries of the Arab Maghreb in support of their just Palestinian cause, as led by the Palestine Liberation Organisation, the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. We believe firmly that the establishment of a permanent peace in the Middle East requires a comprehensive and just settlement of the Palestinian problem on the basis of international legality.

Before the intransigence of Israel we cannot but call upon the major powers, which are the permanent members of the Security Council, to exert greater efforts in making Israel comply with the international will and the respect of international attempts to achieve a peaceful settlement of the Middle East problem. The settlement of this dispute will usher in a comprehensive and permanent peace and a period of revival and prosperity for all countries of the region.

I propose that the International Labour Organisation – as a contribution towards making a success of the peace process – should send a permanent mission responsible for monitoring the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied territories, along the lines of the Committee on Apartheid in South Africa. The establishment of the proposed Committee would crown the efforts exerted within the framework of the deliberations which have lasted for three successive sessions. I am certain that this Organisation will take into consideration our proposal, in accordance with the lasting principles with which it seeks to work.

The last Conference of Labour Ministers of Non-Aligned and Other Developing Countries, held in Tunisia in November 1990, adopted similar resolutions to those of the ILO in compliance with International law and the Constitution of our organisation.

Mr. LIOR (Government delegate, Israel) – We are gathered here because of politicisation imposed on the Conference by a minority of States. What we are witnessing here is only the tip of the iceberg. The debate here epitomises the ongoing warfare which these countries are waging against the State of Israel by political, military, economic and other means. A process of negotiation has begun. New opportunities have been created for a gradual rapprochement, but the habit of vilifying Israel is stronger and more persistent. It has almost become a ritual. The litany of useless rhetoric and vain resolutions only serves to galvanise the emotions at a time when reconciliation is so sorely needed.

Thus, we once again protest against the blatant singling out of the State of Israel as the object of a special debate. The very mandate of the Director-General's mission constitutes a prejudgement of the situation. It is only in the interest of maintaining good relations with the ILO that we receive the delegation and give them free access to our country and the people that they wish to meet.

However, I would like to make it clear that attempts to further politicise the ILO's attitude towards the subject can only jeopardise whatever involvement the Organisation already has in the territories. Such attempts are being made in this debate.

The Report of the Director-General's mission this year displays a greater appreciation of the realities in the territories than have previous Reports. Credit is finally given to the efforts of the Israeli civil administration to promote economic development and provide educational services. These efforts are carried out in spite of the frequent acts of blind terrorism committed against Israelis and Palestinians alike. Credit is also given to the Histadrut for its work in educating the working population concerning its social rights. The role of Palestinian violence as a major factor contributing to the disruption of the economy is at long last recognised.

Nevertheless, the broad framework of the Report continues to suffer from a tendency to judge the situation according to the norms of democracy common to the western world. The Report also fails to place current events in their proper historical perspective. It is obviously misleading to take as a point of departure the fact that the territories are under military occupation without mentioning why this situation came about, namely the military attack against Israel in 1967, which endangered its very existence.

My delegation must take issue with the claims of the Director-General's Report that the trade unions in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza district have of late begun to become involved more in bona fide labour matters. The Israeli Government's detailed remarks to the ILO on this issue were somehow deleted from the final Report.

In fact, the trade unions in the territories continue to devote relatively little time to workers and labour affairs, while maintaining a deep involvement in terrorist activities. Evidence of this can be found in the fliers, manifestos and proclamations widely distributed by the unions in recent years, but obviously not made available by them to the Director-General's mission.

We regret the allusion in the Report to the difficulties standing in the way of increased technical assistance programmes in the territories. At a meeting with the Director-General on 9 January 1992, I myself proposed intensified ILO technical assistance, suggesting that this could be a more meaningful response to Palestinian needs than the annual mission and its Report. In our opinion, the Organisation should change its priorities. It should place more emphasis on its practical assistance, and deal less with political matters. It is only as a professional organisation that the ILO can make its contribution.

In general, employment in Israel does not suffice to solve the economic difficulties in the territories. What is really needed is an ongoing investment in productive enterprise there, and of this there has been little indeed.

In addition, terrorism obviously does not create an atmosphere conducive to healthy economic activity. To illustrate again the violent provocation coming from the territories at a time when a solution is being sought, I would just mention that since the beginning of 1988 an incredible number of Palestinians (almost 700) have been murdered by hit squads from their own community.

Another reason for the economic malaise in the territories is the fact that the well-off Arab countries, including a number of those participating in this debate, are clearly not ready to put their money where their mouth is, and never have been. In past years, the availability of work in the Gulf, together with Arab hidden transfers to the terrorist groups in the territories, maintained the economy at an artificially high level. Little of this money went to productive investment. When the flow dried up in the aftermath of the Gulf War, the Palestinian economy was exposed in all its artificiality.

Here lies the heart of the problem: not in the fragile possibilities of employment in Israel, but in the lack of means to create a viable and sustainable economic base.

Finally, Israel has tried since its independence to create the necessary climate for peace that would bring economic prosperity to our region. The attainment of this goal requires, however, that the Palestinian population turns away from negative external influences and seeks its own destiny through the path of coexistence and negotiation. In doing so, it will find a willing partner in the State of Israel.

Original – Arabic: Mr. NASR (Employers' delegate, Lebanon) – The Strindberg trilogy contains a passage in which a woman asks a man "Why are you looking through the garbage?" The man answers "I am looking for the key to happiness and it is lost". She says "I see that you are picking up cigarette butts". The man answers "I will do so, until I find the missing key".

In Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories the missing key to happiness is freedom, a decent life and tranquillity about today and about tomorrow. All these are things that a comprehensive and lasting peace will bring – this peace that the Director-General mentioned in paragraph 115 of his Report to the Conference last year. Until we find this lost key, what can the International Labour Organisation do.

Firstly, the Director-General can continue sending the annual mission to the territories so that it will be able to study, in depth, the status of the Arab population in the Gaza Strip, in Jerusalem, in the Golan Heights and in southern Lebanon. And he can, as he did this year, prepare a Report to the Conference – a Report that is clear and audacious, as this year's is – and we, indeed thank him for it.

Secondly, the Director-General can prepare along with this Report a strategy or a plan of action including the possible sources of funding.

Thirdly, he can, through the discussion of his Report in the Special Sitting, initiate a special action that will be endorsed by the Governing Body.

The International Labour Office can try to provide special funding for this programme over and above what can be provided through the regular budget.

This programme could include the following: sending a multidisciplinary team to study the needs which the mission has uncovered, especially relating to employment and the organisation of employment, to help the trade unions, the Chambers of Commerce and Industry, to organise and to train the necessary personnel and to see to it that they have full freedom of action and that they truly help in remedying the deteriorating economic situation that the Director-General has mentioned in his Report; helping in setting up a comprehensive training programme that will lead to all sorts of programmes that meet the new needs as they arise, such as the return of certain emigrants.

I will not go so far as to say that the International Labour Office will find the key to happiness. However, I hope that through all these means it will be able to drill holes in the closed door whose key we have lost, if only to let in a little light and fresh air.

Original – Chinese: Mr. ZHANG (Government adviser, China) – The Director-General has submitted to this session of the International Labour Conference a Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. This is an issue which is of the greatest concern to the member States of the International Labour Organisation. In recent years the ILO has made constructive efforts to increase recognition of the legitimate rights of workers in the occupied territories. The Government and people of China would like to express their support and thanks for these efforts.

When the Middle East peace talks first started last October in Madrid, a period of one year was set for reaching an agreement. Today, more than six months have elapsed and the peace process in the Middle East has still not made any substantial progress. The uncompromising attitude of non-recognition adopted by Israel towards the Palestine Liberation Organisation makes it even more difficult to find a solution to this problem and the situation of the workers in the occupied territories has not noticeably improved.

The people of China are permanently concerned about the position of the workers in the occupied Arab territories and express the sincere wish that their rights and legitimate interests be guaranteed. Moreover this is a problem which can only be solved within the context of a global, just and reasonable solution to the Middle East problem. The Chinese Government holds that a political settlement of the Middle East problem must be sought on the basis of relevant resolutions adopted by the United Nations, and in particular resolutions 242 and 338 adopted by the Security Council. The occupied Arab territories must be returned, the Palestinian people must see their legitimate national rights restored and at the same time the sovereignty and security of all the countries in the Middle East, including Israel, must be respected and guaranteed.

We hope that all parties involved in the Arab-Israeli conflict, out of a sincere wish to find a solution to this problem, will adopt a flexible and realistic attitude in order to find, as soon as possible, a peacefully negotiated solution, a global, just and reasonable solution to the Middle East problem.

Mr. BATUBARA (Minister of Manpower, Indonesia) – My delegation appreciates the initiative of concerning this special sitting on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. It could not be convened at a better time in view of the gravity of the situation in the territories which has deteriorated rather than improved. Disregarding the concern of the international community, the Israeli Government continues totally to ignore legal norms and procedures in the territories at every level, resulting in the violation of the most fundamental international legal standards and norms of justice, which deleteriously affected the daily lives of Palestinian people.

Since the end of the Gulf War, the plight of the Palestinians, already severely restricted and constrained by the occupying authorities, has been compounded by the crippled economy. Efforts and appeals from the international community have gone unheeded and have not led to any improvement in the living conditions of these people, including the working conditions of the workers. As the Director-General stated in his Report to this Session of the Conference (Appendices [vol. 2]) "the continuing state of military occupation… renders impossible a situation in which the standards and principles enunciated in ILO instruments can be fully respected", and that the occupation and the economic conditions that the Palestinians are obliged to endure resulted in "serious repercussions for the workers of the territories, and their freedom of employment choice, of association, of movement and of expression continue to be severely limited".

In addition to the severe economic conditions, the Palestinian people have to endure the discriminatory practices of the occupying authorities in almost every aspect. The Director-General himself acknowledged this and called upon the Israeli Government to cease the harassment of thousands of Palestinian workers, and ensure appropriate and effective protection against all types of discrimination. In my delegation's view, this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference should voice the same appeal.

From year to year, Israel has been urged to end its expansionist policy of building Jewish settlements in the occupied territories and to dismantle those that have already been built. However, much to the indignation of many, instead of heeding the wide international appeals, including that of the United Nations and the ILO, Israel continues to build new settlements, not only in contravention of international law. This practice has detrimental effects on the territories, as well as the Arab population. In this regard, my delegation is in full agreement with the Director-General that the policy of extending the settlements and its consequences to the local population are matters of grave concern. We should, therefore, once again on this occasion deplore this policy and repeat our call to the Israeli Government to put an end to these practices immediately.

My delegation noted with dismay that the number of cases of expulsion of Palestinians, thousands of arrests, collective punishment and harassment of trade unions and their leaders, as well as other violations of the rights of Palestinians are still occurring in the occupied territories. I should also draw the attention of the Conference to the findings whereby the economic situation in the occupied territories is largely influenced by political events not of the making of the Palestinians. Indeed, at the core of the Palestinian issue is the fact that these people have persistently been prevented from enjoying their rights, in defiance of the principles of international law, United Nations resolutions and the will of the international community.

While my delegation is in full agreement with the Director-General that in the field of labour, a more direct dialogue between the parties involved could now be considered and established under the auspices of the ILO. In our view the overall socio-economic conditions of the Palestinian people depend largely on the comprehensive and durable political solution of the core issue. As we all know, efforts to that end have been conducted and the Middle East Peace Conference held in Madrid could be regarded as a step forward that could pave the way to a United Nations sponsored peace conference. So far, however, Israel refuses to modify its persistent stance and the Palestinian people are still faced with a situation where the climate of fear, violence and repression characterises their day-to-day life. This special sitting, therefore, should reiterate its call to the Israeli Government to ensure the protection of the Palestinians in enjoying their fundamental rights.

Original – French: Mr. VERONESE (Workers' delegate, France) – Once again, we have to demonstrate the solidarity we feel for the workers and the Palestinian people.

This 79th Session is being held under rather particular circumstances. Much hope has been deposited in what has been known as the Madrid Conference.

However, so far, in spite of the wishes stated by qualified representatives of the Palestinian people to arrive at a just and lasting peace based on the application of all the resolutions of the UN on the part of the Israelis, we are constantly faced with this refusal to apply the UN resolutions concerning the right of return of Palestinian refugees, the refusal to evacuate the Arab territories occupied since 1967 and the refusal to recognise a Palestinian Arab State. Thus, for a number of decades, the UN resolution of November 1947, which provided for the establishment of a Palestinian State in Palestine, has never been applied.

But the Israeli political leaders have not merely refused. They have encouraged and increased repression in the occupied territories in Gaza and in the West Bank. Not only armed repression, which every day sees a larger number of Palestinian victims, but also economic repression aimed at reducing the population to despair, to the renunciation of its identity, its dignity, or to exile.

Thus, 33 per cent of the active population has been deprived of work; the rest work under very precarious conditions and many are compelled to wait for work in places which are known in Israel and in occupied Palestine, as slave markets. These workers do not enjoy the benefits of any social schemes.

The Israeli military authorities thwart under various pretexts the free exercise of trade union rights. To achieve their goals, the authorities use all kinds of measures, from house arrest to imprisonment or the prohibition on free movement or the occupation of union premises and the destruction of material and files.

There is the closing down of schools, universities, school buildings, which in many cases are used for barracks by the occupying army, as for example the proposed requisitioning by the army of a socio-cultural centre in the town of Ramallah which is used exclusively by small children.

It is obvious that Israel is pursuing its plan for annexation, and this is confirmed daily by the setting up of settlements of new migrant populations in the territories.

Thus, the suffering of the Palestinian people and their children continues and the UN resolutions are blatantly ignored, which is extremely harmful to all the efforts for peace.

A prisoner of its own logic, Israel can without impunity bomb Lebanon and Tunis and send its commandoes to kill Palestinian leaders.

For how much longer will Israel continue to defy the international community?

Before and during the Gulf War, not an hour passed without reference to the need the respect and application of international law by Iraq.

We must therefore and more forcefully ask the question of why should Israel be allowed to act outside the sphere of application of international law? There cannot be two yardsticks.

The notion of international law cannot be left to the interpretation of a superpower in accordance with its interests or its protégés. This would be to deprive of all meaning and scope the concept of international law, with all the dangers that this would bring for peace in the world.

Israel must urgently and unreservedly apply the UN resolutions and proceed to evacuating all Arab territories occupied since 1967. This will be in the interest of all peoples and all States in the region, including those of the State of Israel.

Peace in the Middle East can be truly achieved only by doing justice to the Palestinian people by recognising its inalienable right to establish a free and independent State.

It would therefore be desirable for an international trade union initiative to be taken to achieve this aim.

Once again we take this opportunity provided for us by the annual Session of the International Labour Conference to reiterate our solidarity with the Palestinian people and workers, to pay a brotherly tribute to trade unionists and Israeli democrats and pacifists who, under particularly difficult circumstances, are also engaged in the struggle for the recognition of Palestinian national rights and for the establishment of a Palestinian State alongside that of Israel.

Mr. FREEMAN (Government delegate, United States) – Frankly speaking, my Government sees little utility in holding a special sitting.

The Arab-Israeli conflict will not be solved by either gratuitous resolutions or sterile special sittings in bodies which are incompetent to solve political issues. If we truly wish to contribute to reaching a political settlement of a political conflict, then we should all put greater effort into supporting the peace process. But that is a process which is taking place outside the jurisdiction of the ILO. It cannot be accomplished in the ILO. It is, however, the responsibility of the ILO to enhance workers' rights.

If we wish to enhance the rights of Palestinian workers, then we should use the regular workers' rights supervisory machinery of the ILO. The supervisory machinery is the heart and guts of the ILO and we should not be afraid to use that machinery, with its due process guarantees, to address the question of Palestinian workers' rights – or Arab workers' rights in general for that matter. We find no convincing argument that the supervisory machinery cannot be used to enhance the rights of the Palestinian workers.

The due process supervisory machinery and technical assistance are the vehicles whereby the ILO can make a positive contribution to the peace process – not by an increasingly sterile debate in this plenary or by the idea which has surfaced today of setting up a new ad hoc committee.

My Government is asked to find 25 per cent of the costs of this sitting. But we see no practical benefit to Arab or Palestinian workers. It would be better to use the money on technical assistance projects in the occupied territories or on improving relations between Israeli and Palestinian workers; and I can assure you that we will spare no effort to avoid wasting United States taxpayers' money on the establishment of an equally purposeless but much more costly ad hoc committee.

We therefore oppose this special sitting because we think it is a "cul de sac"; it is a debate going nowhere, which does not advance the rights of Palestinian workers. I wish I could promise you that this will be the last special sitting. What I can do is congratulate you, Mr. President, on presiding over the last special sitting in which the United States Government will participate.

Mr. KAZMI (Government delegate, Pakistan) – I am happy to have the floor and the opportunity to address this Special Sitting on the situation of workers of the occupied territories. It is my sincere hope that this Special Sitting will contribute towards alleviating the conditions of the workers in the occupied territories, whose rights are daily being grossly violated as a result of the illegal occupation for the past 25 years.

We have carefully studied the Report of the Director-General on this subject. The report provides ample testimony to the continuation of inhuman Israeli practices and gross violations of human rights. The picture emerging from the Report depicts deteriorating economic conditions, the absence of religious, educational and other social rights, the denial of trade union rights and freedom of association and the enforcement of partisan employment policies. In other words the normal living conditions and the entire social fabric of the Palestinian population stand utterly destroyed.

The illegal Israeli occupation of the Arab territories has pushed the Palestinian people to the point where they now face the worst possible conditions. The brutal steps taken by the Israeli Government to crush the popular uprising (intifada) has increased the sufferings of the people even further. The Israeli authorities have embarked upon a systematic policy aimed at breaking the will of the Palestinian people from continuing with their just struggle to achieve their inalienable right to self-determination.

The post-Gulf War era has witnessed an upsurge of the Israeli atrocities in the occupied territories. Recent reports of the imposition of military blockade and of curfews in the Gaza Strip and in various other camps, which the Israeli occupation authorities consider as "closed military areas", is yet another example of increased Israeli atrocities. The blockade threatens to give rise to the catastrophe of starvation and the cutting off of the livelihood of the workers living in these areas. Moreover, the move is intended to force emigration of the Palestinian citizens from their cherished homeland and to pave the way for more settlements.

It is regrettable to note that in total disregard of the United Nations Charter and its resolutions and in defiance of international law and the world public opinion, the Israelis are continuing with their policies of making more settlements in the occupied territories, by liquidating and expelling the Palestinian population and confiscating their lands for transfer to settlers. Temporary measures for improving the conditions of the Palestinian workers are not likely to bear any significant change in the status of the Palestinian population, unless and until the occupation of their territories is ended.

Pakistan had welcomed the convening of the first round of Middle East Peace Conference in the hope that the Conference would pave the way for a lasting peace in the region. However, we are disappointed with the results of that conference so far. Moreover, we are deeply concerned to note the Israeli unwillingness to deal with the core issues, such as withdrawal from the occupied territories, the cessation of all settlement activities and allowing the Palestinian people to freely exercise their right to self-determination.

I would like to take this opportunity to express Pakistan's total and abiding support to the struggle of the people of Palestine under the leadership of PLO, their sole legitimate representative, to establish a State on their own homeland. We strongly feel that for any peace initiative to succeed, it must address this central issue. In our view an end to the occupation of the occupied Arab territories will create the favourable condition of peace and security necessary to allow for improvements in the condition of the workers.

Original – Arabic: Mr. MOHAMED (Government delegate, Sudan) – In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! My delegation is very happy to see the President lead the deliberations of this special Session on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. This is a very important issue for my country in this and in other international forms because it relates to a very important cause that is dear to us – the Palestinian cause.

The Palestinian people have suffered so much under Israeli occupation and are still struggling and fighting in most difficult conditions to realise their legitimate aspirations to self-determination, freedom, and dignity under the leadership of the PLO.

We commend the efforts made by the Director-General of the International Labour Office to ensure constant inquiries into the fact of the tragic situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories. This is shown in the Report of the Director-General which is the subject of the special sitting. My delegation would like to make the following points.

Firstly, the Report before us is the 15th in a series of annual reports, but we have noted no improvement in the manner in which the problems of the Palestinian workers in the occupied territories are dealt with, which is evidence of a real crisis in the approach to this phenomenon.

Secondly, this Report states, quite truthfully that the situation of these workers is deteriorating day by day. This means that the ILO must rise to this challenge and tackle the problem in a realistic and effective way without hesitation of beating about the bush.

Thirdly, the situation in the occupied Arab territories has become catastrophic, given the persecution and oppression of Arabs and Arab workers. My delegation believes that the protection of Arabs and Palestinians in these territories requires an exceptional effort within the framework of the United Nations, and especially on the part of those organisations that deal with human rights – an immediate and effective effort, because the Israeli authorities are engaging in a savage and deliberate repression and persecution, flouting human rights and the will of the international community. It is high time to halt this entity that will live by no established rule or practice.

Fourthly, we request the ILO to consider the possibility of setting up a special committee with responsibility for the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, along the lines of the Committee on Apartheid, inasmuch as we have noted the effectiveness with which the said committee has dealt with that important question. It is clear that the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories is no less tragic than that of our brothers in South Africa. Given the positive results obtained by the Committee on Apartheid, we would hope that a special committee for the occupied Arab territories might obtain the same positive results until the liberation of these territories.

If we are unable to achieve this objective, the ILO will fall into a vicious circle of special sittings, and we will miss the chance to turn our energies into the productive efforts of a special committee.

In closing, we salute the struggle of the Palestinian and Arab people in the occupied territories, and pledge to remain at the forefront of the defenders of the rights of our brothers until the occupation of the Arab territories comes to an end, and until the Palestinian people is able to exercise its right to self-determination under the banner of the PLO.

Original – French: Mr. NORDMANN (Government delegate, Switzerland) – This year, for the third time, a special sitting of the International Labour Conference is being held on the situation of workers in the ocupied Arab territories. Switzerland, notwithstanding its reservations of principle regarding the institutionalisation of this sort of meeting, reiterates its hope that this discussion will contribute to an improvement in the situation and in particular in the working conditions of the Palestinian population. This is a matter of considerable concern to the Swiss Government.

At the outset I would like to congratulate the Director-General on the Report that he drew up on this subject and which demonstrates a deep concern for precision, impartiality and objectivity. It is a working document of considerable value and its authors deserve our full gratitude. Its contents, however, are scarcely encouraging and indicate that a great deal remains to be done. The military occupation of the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights, has now been going on for 25 years. With increasing tension, violence and insecurity since the intifada began, this regime has become still more strict, introducing many security measures such as curfews and restrictions on movements. In the Gaza Strip, there has recently been an enormous urge of violence, prompting the Israeli authorities to declare a total curfew and to close the main roads. In such an environment, the relevant standards of international law, and particularly those of the Fourth Geneva Convention on the protection of civilians in time of war, are not applied and neither are the principles, standards and resolutions of the International Labour Organisation. The establishment and extension of settlements in the occupied territories further increase tensions and inequalities between the Israeli and Arab populations and strengthen the dual nature of the legal and social systems.

The already precarious economic situation in the occupied territories seriously worsened after the Gulf War and considerably increased the dependency of the Palestinian economy on Israel. In particular, the 45-day curfew decreed by the Israeli authorities led to numerous dismissals of Palestinian workers in Israel. Today they are either unemployed or employed on daily contracts. Thus, it is now imperative to promote the creation of new jobs and enterprises and to facilitate trade between the occupied territories and Israel.

In this context, the efforts by the Israeli authorities and the civilian administration of the territories to create jobs by granting tax breaks or easing certain formalities are particularly promising signs. However, they are still insufficient to guarantee self-supporting development of the economy of the territories. Another positive sign is the reopening of the universities and certain measures taken to develop vocational training.

My delegation hopes that the Israeli authorities and the civilian administration will continue in this direction by introducing still further measures in these two areas and in others, especially the fields of social protection for Palestinian workers in Israel and their trade union rights. It is clear that the constant harassment of the trade unions, such as the restrictions on freedom of movement, prevent the free exercise of trade union activities and the development of true dialogue.

Against this backdrop, which is cause for considerable concern, we fully support the conclusions and recommendations made by the Director-General of the ILO. Therefore, we hope that they will be fully applied without reserve and in all the fields under discussion. The cooperation of the Israeli authorities and of the civilian administration with the ILO, we feel, is of vital importance in this process, which should finally lead to an improvement in the situation of Palestinian workers.

Original – French: Mr. NIASSE (Workers' adviser, Senegal) – I would like to thank you for the opportunity you have given me to address this august assembly, to bring to our Palestinian brothers and to their sympathisers the militant greetings of the Senegalese people, particularly of the workers affiliated to the CNTS and the CSA. I would also like to associated myself to the congratulations expressed to the Director-General for his exhaustive and highly relevant Report.

My country, since the very beginning of the hostilities, and in spite of its modest diplomatic stature, has strongly supported the Palestinian people's cause, that Israel is spending its time occupying the Palestinian's ancestral lands by force.

International opinion had an attitude of compassion towards the Jewish people, in view of the many persecutions that the Jewish people had suffered, throughout history. The situation of the Jewish people during the Second World War had made all human beings shudder, and this is what, in 1948, brought the great powers to implement the United Nations resolutions of 1947 and 1948 so as to enable this wandering people to find a new homeland.

Now that the Israelis feel strong and powerfully armed, and forgetting the past or wanting rather to seek revenge for all they have endured on someone who is weaker than them, Israel is not content with occupying the Arab territories, and is constantly violating basic human rights by imprisoning Palestinians for the most fallacious reasons, by killing women and children who have nothing but stones as a weapon.

At a time when the whole world is seeking to implement a peace policy, at a time when the Arab peoples generally, under the leadership of the PLO in particular, accept recognising Israel as a State with all the rights that implies, at a time when all people of goodwill wish to make the Madrid negotiations be successful, Israel is obstinately provoking the Palestinian peoples and the neighbouring Arab territories by not respecting any United Nations resolutions, not even the requests of its friends who have upheld Israel in many circumstances. Therefore, it is pressing that the great powers who have particular responsibilities in safeguarding international security show more firmness so as to maintain peace in that part of the world.

My country, Senegal, wishes to firmly support and echo the United Nations and ILO resolutions and, as workers, we would like to ask this august assembly to vote for a motion asking the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO to spare no effort to ensure the application of resolutions adopted by the 59th Session in 1974, and the 66th Session in June 1980.

In any case, Senegal, despite its very limited means, has always upheld the brave struggle of the Palestinian people and its leadership, the PLO, and will continue to uphold them everywhere and always, and asks Israel to demonstrate moderation and good faith so as to make the Madrid negotiations reach a successful conclusion, and in this way help to lasting peace in the region and peaceful coexistence amongst civilised nations. Long live free Palestine, under the Leadership of the PLO.

Original – Arabic: Mr. DAHLAN (Employers' delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

It is indeed a source of honour for me to address this special sitting which is considering an important subject which falls within the competence of the International Labour Organisation, namely the usurped rights of workers and the violation of democracy in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. It is indeed regrettable and painful for us, who live in this region and are accustomed to freedoms for peoples and for States, where workers' and employers' rights are respected, where we seek to fight against environmental pollution, to witness systematic the violation of human rights. I wish to recall what was said at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development.

God created this planet and sent his messengers and prophets to earth in order to spread the message of peace. He sent his messengers in order to safeguard man and the earth on which he lives, defend peace and liberty and to fight oppression. All creeds and religions have sought to uphold this ideal. All States and governments have pursued the same ideal, and the ILO was established for this purpose. What has it done? The ILO has sought to safeguard these rights everywhere, even in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. It has prepared the Report under consideration at this Conference on the situation of workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories. This Report refers to the flagrant violation of the Palestinian and Arab workers' rights, to discriminations in wages and treatment, and to the denial of the basic rights of workers, including vocational training.

Where is the security and stability to which the Palestinian and Arab workers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories are entitled? Israel practises all forms of oppression and persecution in violation of international instruments and ILO Conventions.

Peoples were not created to be oppressed or enslaved. The freedom and liberty of men must be respected. That is this natural order of things and nations should safeguard these freedoms and liberties. How can peace be established with all these violations of rights?

This is the third Special Sitting called to discuss the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories, and we all hope a that a programme for technical cooperation will be prepared on the basis of the Report of the special mission, including technical assistance for the handicapped and the training of workers to achieve further skills. We should seek to liberate the Palestine economy from dependence on Israel.

We sincerely hope that these three special sittings will enable us to approve the proposal to establish an ad hoc committee to follow up the proposals which have been previously adopted. By virtue of the very existence of our planet, and by virtue of the messengers and prophets God has sent, may God help us to liberate and safeguard these rights from the oppressions of Israel.

May God help us in our struggle for peace.

Original – Russian: Mr. KANAIEV (Workers' adviser, Russian Federation) – For a number of years now the attention of our Organisation has been focused on this burning issue of the world today.

For practically a quarter of a century more than a million and a half Arabs, mostly Palestinians, have been living under circumstances of harsh military occupation, deprived of the most elementary human rights. We cannot but agree with the conclusions of the ILO mission that, and I quote: "In carrying out its mandate, however, the ILO cannot ignore the consequences for the free exercise of workers' rights and the principle of non-discrimination in employment of the prevailing political situation affecting the territories…".

During the past year, as the ILO mission records, the position of the Palestinian workers has become even more difficult than in the past, following the military action in the Persian Gulf and the introduction of curfews and other constraints.

Driven to the limits of their endurance, the Palestinian workers, are now, for the fourth year, waging a popular uprising (intifada) for their rights and first and foremost for the right to their own statehood.

The report of the mission it quite rightly states that in the occupied Arab territories there is a "massive military presence" and in this connection these have been numerous deaths and serious injuries – mainly among Palestinian. Thousands of people, including trade union members, are arrested without charge, banished or deported, and deprived of their rights to housing and work. The army seizes trade union premises, demolishes houses and confiscates and destroys property.

The position is made more complex because of the large-scale distribution of new Israeli settlements in the occupied territories, and unemployment has reached threatening levels.

The Israeli policy of settlements in the occupied territories has been condemned by the United Nations. In 1980 the International Labour Conference demanded an end to this process and the dismantling of all existing settlements. However, the Governement of Israel remains deaf to the demands made by the world community. Furthermore, at present this policy is being intensified particularly due to the increase in the number of Jewish immigrants from the CIS and Eastern Europe.

In these conditions, one obviously cannot place on the same footing the armed suppresion of all elementary rights by the Israeli army, the existing economic constraints and the just fight of the Arab population for its rights and freedoms.

We fully support the legitimate efforts by the Arab Palestinian people to obtain its sovereign State and to enjoy all elementary human rights.

The sole and most reliable way of achieving this is through peaceful negotiations and dialogue. Therefore, we fully support the attempts made at international level to find a peaceful settlement to these problems.

Our delegation fully agrees with the conclusion of the report regarding the value and need for broad constructive dialogue between the Histadrut and the Palestinian trade unions, and the view of the ILO "the Histadrut could play a more influential role in promoting and ensuring for the Palestinian unions a greater measure of respect for their trade union rights and freedoms, the guarantee of which is the responsibility of the State of Israel in accordance with international obligations which it is bound to respect".

We welcome the efforts of the ILO to grant the necessary organisational, technical and other assistance to achieve such dialogue and we express the hope that with joint efforts even the most difficult problems can be successfully resolved.

Mr. CANKOREL (Government adviser, Turkey) – As I am taking the floor for the first time, allow me to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on the efficient way in which he is presiding over this session of the International Labour Conference.

This year, we take up the 15th annual Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. We are pleased to see that this mission has been carried out with the full cooperation of the Israeli authorities and the full participation of all individuals and institutions, both Israeli and Palestinian. We note the cooperation extended by Israeli authorities to the ILO mission as a demonstration of their constructive spirit.

Nevertheless, we understand from the Report that there has been no alleviation in the conditions of the Arab workers of the occupied territories. It is made clear in the Report that the grave situation faced by the workers continues to be characterised by the state of military occupation which now is in its 24th year. The Report indicates, furthermore, that much remains to be done to eliminate the discrimination that these workers are exposed to.

The question of Palestine lies at the heart of the chronic Arab-Israeli conflict. In contrast to the expectations of the international community, Israel has not yet taken an attitude conducive to the improvement of the situation in the occupied territories and eventually to the solution of the question. This is disappointing in that it denies peace and stability both to the region and to the world.

Turkey, due both to its geographical proximity to and its historical ties with the region, is deeply concerned about the continuation of the Arab-Israeli conflict. We earnestly hope for an early and lasting solution to it.

Recently, we have been witnessing significant activity aimed at resolving the complex problems related to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Last year marked the turning point in this regard. Madrid, Washington and Moscow conferences for peace in the Middle East constituted major steps towards a lasting solution. We hope that the parties will not miss this historic opportunity and will continue the dialogue with perseverance. All parties to the conflict should exercise restraint and caution during the peace process. As in all conflict resolution processes, success depends on the unswerving determination of the parties to overcome inevitable difficulties arising along the way.

One dark shadow looming over peace efforts is the Israeli policy of establishing settlements in the occupied territories, in contravention of the Fourth Geneva Convention.

Despite the vigorous opposition of the international community, Israel resorted to a variety of harsh coercive measures to suppress the intifada – this is another setback. We call for an immediate end to violence directed against Palestinian civilians.

Recently violence and consequent tension in the occupied territories have demonstrated the need for Israel to comply with the provisions of humanitarian law as well as those of Security Council resolutions 673 and 681. In this context, I wish to reiterate that Israel should bring to an end its policy of establishing new settlements in order to sustain the present dialogue among the parties to the conflict.

We took note of the recommendations contained on pages 58, 59 and 60 of the Report of the Director-General. Cooperation by the Israeli authorities should aim to alleviate not only the difficulties of the workers of the occupied territories, but should also be conducive to introducing remedies to the tragic circumstances of the population living in the region. I should underline, however, that measures to be taken for the occupied territories cannot really replace the political solution to the problem. They can only be effective if coupled with convincing political steps towards peace. The ultimate remedy to the problems of the workers and their families lies therefore in a lasting solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict. We hope that Israel will engage without further delay in a process of reconciliation with the Palestinian side whose legitimate aspirations have the full support of Turkey.

Mr. KARA (Workers' delegate, Israel) – The peace agreement with Egypt indicated the right direction we should go. Conflicts between peoples should be solved only by peaceful, political means. This year, we have witnessed a breakthrough marking the beginning of long and complicated peace negotiations between Israel, its neighbouring Arab countries and the Palestinians. Many mutual concession were required of all the parties in order to reach the negotiating table, proving that compromise is the only way to achieve a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

It is only within the context of a comprehensive peace that solutions will be found for all problems prevailing in the present situation, including that of the workers in the territories administered by Israel since 1967, when Israel had to fight a defensive war against those who threatened to throw its inhabitants into the sea.

Until this longed-for peace is achieved, however, Histadrut – the General Federation of Labour in Israel – feels that much can be done to improve the situation. As the organisation representing Israeli workers, Histadrut is proud to say that 14 per cent of its total membership are Israeli Arabs, constituting in fact the largest free Arab trade union in the area.

Both Israeli and international laws stipulate that Histadrut cannot organise the Palestinians working in the West Bank and Gaza, but we do extend trade union protection to commuting workers from the territories who are legally employed in Israel. During 1991, some 98,000 people from the territories found work in Israel, constituting 34 per cent of the total workforce of the West Bank and Gaza.

As far back as 1969, Histadrut ensured that every person employed in an organised workplace in Israel – Jew, Arab or Palestinian from the territories – was covered by the same labour contract. The problem was that some two-thirds of the commuting Palestinian workers were unregistered, which made it very difficult to supervise the implementation of this principle. However, since last year there has been a dramatic drop in the number of unregistered workers, owing to security regulations introduced during the Gulf War, which made it very difficult for unregistered workers from the territories to enter Israel. Thus, at present, two-thirds of the commuting workers from the territories are registered, enabling them to benefit from the provisions of the labour contract and putting the Histadrut in a better position to protect their wages and working conditions. To receive this protection the workers from the territories – just as their Jewish and Arab Israeli colleagues who are not Histadrut members – pay one per cent organisation dues, as against more than four per cent that full Histadrut members pay.

As in the past, the Histadrut continues to keep workers from the territories informed of their rights, by means of Arab language publications, Arab versions of the labour contracts, study days and radio programmes. Also, since last year, the Histadrut opened two legal bureaus in areas where workers from the territories are concentrated, staffed by two Arab lawyers in order to provide these workers with legal advice in their own language. The fact that over 1,000 people have resorted to these lawyers' help over the last year proves that it was a timely and positive Histadrut initiative.

Furthermore, at a recent Executive Bureau meeting, the Histadrut Secretary-General, Israel Kessar, called for the establishment of a joint Histadrut-Government-Employers' Committee to supervise the wages and working conditions of the workers from the territories. Such a committee would facilitate Histadrut's activities on behalf of these workers and ensure that outstanding problems would be dealt with more quickly and efficiently.

Although unable to organise Arab workers in the territories, the Histadrut is keenly interested in the unionisation of the West Bank and Gaza workers that will enable them to enjoy dignity, fair wages and social benefits. We are willing to cooperate with them and extend any assistance to achieve these goals.

At its last Convention in 1990, the Histadrut adopted a resolution expressing readiness to enter into dialogue with any trade union in the West Bank and Gaza that does not engage in subversive, terrorist activities, in order to promote the mutual interest of the workers. It is our sincere hope that in the coming months contracts will take place between Histadrut and West Bank and Gaza trade union representatives leading to fruitful cooperation and building bridges of understanding between us – as an important and vital part of the peace process in our region.

May next year's Session of the International Labour Conference witness a dramatic change in our region and permit me to turn to all of you to join me in prayer and call for peace.

Now I want to add some words in my native language, in Arabic.

(The speaker continues in Arabic.)

I would like to address the Palestinians in the territories. I should like to tell them to refrain from violence and enter into a constructive dialogue. It is time to move away from hate and extremism. It is time to think rationally because of the future of our children. Let us cooperate in order to transform our beloved Middle East. Let us develop our economy and our industry and work for the dignity of man – for peace for everybody. This peace, I hope, will be upon us all. Let us help one another and work tog[illegible]er in order to arrive at this peace.

Original – Arabic: Mr. TIZMAGHZ (Government adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Those who appeal to God for his strength and support are told to trust in the Almighty. At the outset allow me to express my prayers to those martyrs praying for the upholding of the divine social justice. The day they are born, the day they die and the day they rise from the dead are holy days. I pay a special tribute to the heroes of the Palestinian intifada and wish them success in their valiant struggle against Zionism and imperialism.

As the Director-General said in his Report, the situation in Palestine is extremely serious. Inhuman Israeli practices and the repressive treatment of the inhabitants, as well as terrorist activities by the Zionist occupation authorities, continue. Workers and their organisations are undergoing a profound social, economic and political crisis. Human rights are constantly violated and workers' rights are never respected. Arrests, imprisonment and collective punishment, the seizure of land and the killing of hundreds of young people throwing stones, are all evidence of the Zionist policies.

The felling of trees, the cutting off of water resources and the implantation of settlements in the occupied Arab territories are the main features of this expansionist policy, adopted with total disregard to international law. My delegation wishes to condemn fully these practices.

The Palestinian intifada, now in its fourth year, is struggling valiantly against this hateful occupation. We have witnessed no support by any international organisation. The Zionist entity has not undergone any legitimate pressure by any international body or authority. We therefore call on this Organisation to adopt measures to put an end to these violations and to urge Israel to respect international law.

I wonder how we can speak of democracy, freedom and basic rights while Zionism continues to stifle any voices calling for freedom and independence. New political initiatives have recently been taken. The usurping regime has gone even further in its policies. It has attacked southern Lebanon and killed several innocent persons, including Abbas Mussawi and his wife and young child, the leader of Hezbollah in southern Lebanon. As a repetition of these violations an Iranian reporter was killed by the invading Zionist attackers in southern Lebanon. As the Koran says, these martyrs will never die but remain alive with their Lord God.

Missions have been sent to Palestine for 15 years, and this is the third Special Sitting to examine the situation in the occupied Arab territories. I do not believe we can simply express our concern. We shall never achieve any palpable results in improving the situation of the workers in Palestine and the occupied territories. Today we must take a clear stand to ensure that these nations and people will retrieve their full human rights. We stand by the oppressed against the oppressor.

The Islamic Republic of Iran, in the implementation of its basic principles, convened an international meeting to support the Palestinian intifada. This meeting was held at the end of 1991.

The Iranian Parliament has decided to establish a special office to follow up the developments of the Palestinian intifada and provide it with all the necessary support.

My delegation wishes to endorse the proposal to set up an ad hoc commitee to examine the follow-up to the Director-General's Report. We find that the only way to solve the Middle East crisis and to restore peace to that area is to establish an independent Palestinian State in Palestine and in the occupied territories and allow the Palestinian people to determine their own future for themselves.

Original – Spanish: Mr. GARCIA LARA (Government delegate, Cuba) – Regarding Palestine and the occupied illegally Arab territories, including Jerusalem, the possibilities for a peaceful settlement are still distant and full of pitfalls which will be difficult to negotiate. The parties to the conflict have not been able to eliminate the exceptional measures established by Israel, the brutal reprisals to which the Palestinian patriots and all those who challenge the efforts of the oppressor are subjected.

Since the beginning of the intifada, the social and economic conditions in the Arab occupied territories have deteriorated constantly. In addition to the shortage of supplies, especially when there are curfews, there is the growth of unemployment, the increase in the use of magnetic green cards designed to reduce the number of Arab workers in Israel and confine its holders in practice to specific zones of the occupied territories.

The assistance of two standards of medical care, one for Israel and the other for the occupied Arab territories, and the exceptional circumstances governing the treatment in Israel of cases from these territories highlights the exclusivist nature, discriminatory nature of this policy. Palestine workers do not have a right to life nor social security, medical insurance, which is not the case with the Israeli workers.

In addition to everything that I have just outlined we can add the analysis of the situation of the workers of these Arab occupied terrtories which is set forth in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, paragraphs 136 to 149 of which present conclusions and recommendations which require our attention if we are to contribute in a significant manner to resolving this enormous problem which violates the most essential human rights and basic freedoms of the Palestinian people.

The situation of the workers in these occupied Arab territories is set forth clearly and precisely in paragraphs 137, 138, 141, 142, 145 and 146. In particular, and I quote: " The continuing state of military occupation – now in its 25th year – of the West Bank (including East Jerusalem), the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights renders impossible a situation in which the standards and principles enunciated in ILO instruments can be fully respected. "

For the Government of the Republic of Cuba there cannot be a lasting or just settlement to this conflict if we do not take into account the Palestinians' claims, from being represented at the negotiating table right up to the establishment of their independent State.

This logically entails the withdrawal of Israel from all the territories occupied since 1967, including Jerusalem, which must receive a special status which takes into account the religious importance which this city has both for Jews, Muslims and Christians.

Such an arrangement must provide guarantees for the existence, development and peaceful coexistence of all the States of the region and promote the creation of a zone free of arms of mass extermination in the Middle East.

Today more than ever it is essential to restore the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people. The respect of the full dignity of man and the right of peoples to govern their States freely, free from outside interference, which is something which we do not accept and will never accept.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-AMAWI (representative of the Arab Labour Organisation) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! The Arab Labour Organisation, which I have the honour to represent at this special sitting, would like to express to the Director-General of the ILO its deep appreciation for his efforts and for the interest he has shown by holding this sitting in order to afford the opportunity to Conference delegations to express their views concerning the Palestinian problem from the perspective of the ILO, that of labour questions. The first resolution on the situation of workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories was adopted in 1974.

The report under consideration, the 15th in the series of reports presented since 1978, reconfirms once more that there has been no change and no improvement in the living and working conditions of the workers. There is not the slightest human dignity under military occupation and colonialist settlement.

Naturally I shall not go into detail regarding everything contained in this year's report, a report which has recorded in all objectivity and neutrality several cases of the violation of human rights within the mandate of the ILO.

I shall limit myself to summing up this tragic situation by quoting one single line included in paragraph 90 of the Director-General's report, which says that: "the conditions of employment of Palestinians, in particular those from Gaza, are a violation of the dignity of workers and respect for the individual."

I need not remind you of a resolution adopted by this Conference 20 years ago which includes one paragraph that declares that without political freedom, without independence, trade union freedom cannot possibly be practised by workers on a true and comprehensive basis. I should also like to quote from paragraph 137 of this year's report, where the Director-General says that "the continuing state of military occupation... of the West Bank (including East Jerusalem), the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights renders impossible a situation in which the standards and principles enunciated in ILO instruments can be fully respected". In short, the Director-General has left us nothing to add to this report that is so objective and close to reality!

It becomes clear that the solution to the problem of the Palestinian people does not lie in improving their living conditions or in institutionalising the occupation. The real solution lies in the eradication of occupation and the end of illegal settlement, so that these people, ancient in their culture and civilisation, and well known for their wisdom and tolerance, may enjoy the full rights that have been denied them over 25 years without any crime having been committed. No matter how long the occupation may last, it will eventualy be eradicated and the will of the people will eventually triumph.

Within the limits of the remaining time I should like to submit a number of proposals which I hope might help the ILO in its future direction with regard to handling the Palestinian problem from its social, labour and human aspects.

Firstly, we fully support the proposal of the delegation of the State of Palestine regarding the appointment of a permanent representative of the ILO in the Palestinian territories and other occupied territories in order to follow the situation of Arab workers there and in order to propose and implement appropriate programmes and activities. And we call for the establishment of a specialised committee within the framework of the ILO to follow up and monitor the implementation of conclusions contained in the report under discussion.

Secondly, we call upon the ILO to sum up the deliberations that will take place in this important sitting for the benefit of workers and employers, particularly the proposals made by various delegations, and to submit its conclusions to the Governing Body in its forthcoming session next November, along the same lines as the Apartheid Committee. Serious consideration should be given to following up the situation of Arab workers in the occupied territories in application of the standards and principles concerning equal treatment of peoples, regardless of colour, creed or race.

Thirdly, it is time for the Governing Body of the ILO to recommend, in its forthcoming session, that the Conference set up a committee, among its numerous committees which are set up every year, to examine the Director-General's report on the situation of workers of the Occupied Arab territories, which constitutes an important item on the Conference agenda. I should like to remind you that numerous delegations to the Governing Body have submitted proposals to this effect. These proposals are based on solid legal foundations backed up by the need to apply certain principles.

Finally, we look forward to the forthcoming report of the ILO in the hope that it will crystallise its conclusions and recommendations within the framework of a comprehensive programme of technical cooperation for Palestinian workers, and others workers in the occupied territories, and that this programme would fully support the steadfastness of those workers who are confronting military occupation and colonialist settlement, and pave the way for the evacuation of all occupation forces.

Original – Russian: Mr. BORCHEVSKY (Government delegate, Russian Federation) – Today, in this hall of the United Nations, the International Labour Conference is once again discussing the tragedy of the long-suffering land of Palestine. Once again it is with hope and fear that we are studying the pages of the Director-General's report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. And once again, as in the past, we can only note that in spite of all the efforts that have been made an entire people is still awaiting legitimacy and justice.

To understand the situation as it stands it is sufficient to read paragraph 137 of the conclusions and recommendations of the report, which says that the ILO's mission was carried out against a background of continuing occupation by the armed forces of Israel of the Arab lands and a continuation of the insurrection of the Palestinians against that occupation. The continuing confrontation is characterised by a disconcerting litany of arrests, new illegal settlements on the occupied lands, widespread violations of human rights and trade union freedoms, and more and more human victims on both sides.

The Russian Federation, as co-chairman of the peace conference on the Middle East, is actively pursuing efforts to make peace between the Arabs and Israel based on mutual consideration of one another's legitimate concerns. We are convinced that dialogue is the only reasonable path that will lead to a settlement of the conflict, and we fully support the peace process which started to organise multilateral negotiations on the Middle East at the Madrid Conference and continued at the meetings in Moscow and Washington. That work gives us hope that in the final analysis it will be possible to have a settlement on the basis of equal rights and equal security for all the States and peoples of the region, both Arab and Israeli.

Russia firmly advocates the solution of the Palestinian question on the basis of the right of peoples to self-determination, as enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations. This is an inalienable right of the Palestinian people. We are categorically opposed to the policy of repression and the violation of human rights in the occupied Arab territories, and are opposed to the continued construction of Israeli settlements on those territories. The material in the report that we are considering today contains convincing arguments in favour of a more realistic policy, and leaves no doubt that arbitrary and unlawful action leads directly to a deadlock and further victims on both sides.

Certain concessions made by the Israeli authorities in the fields of employment, taxation, the entry of foreign capital, the development of a banking structure in the occupied territories and the reopening of the universities may be able to reduce tensions for a time. But they most obviously cannot remove the root cause for the sufferings of the workers of the occupied territories.

We support the main conclusions and recommendations of the Director-General's report and consider that the ILO, within the context of its field of competence, must continue to make its positive contribution to the peace process in the Middle East.

Original – French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – I rise to speak from this rostrum as a French Employers' delegate, but I also express the feelings of the International Organisation of Employers, whose President I have the honour of being.

I did not take part in the previous debates on the issue which is on our agenda this afternoon. This year, however, new events have occurred which at long last allow us to hope for an end to this long conflict, which is the root cause of the problems raised in the part of the Director-General's report devoted to the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. It is abundantly clear that only once peace is re-established amongst all the peoples in the region will it be possible to find a solution to the situation outlined in the report.

This year, we have reason to hope that we can look forward to an end to this long and painful conflict. Negotiations have been entered into and peace no longer appears a utopia. We are living through quite an extraordinary time, when the pace of history is being accelerated. Just a few years ago, we would never have dared to imagine the radical change which has taken place, for example, in the eastern part of Europe and in the southern part of Africa.

And, why shouldn't the sceptics and pessimists be just as wrong with regard to this part of the world? How can we possibly remain silent in the face of this prospect of peace? How could we refrain from coming to this rostrum to proclaim our solidarity and our sympathy with all the men and women who live on this historic and tragic soil? How can we not share the hopes of all those who suffer from violence and lack of security?

As employers, we know that enterprises need peace in order to be able to grow and create employment. And, even though in its title the report refers to the situation of workers, the situation of employers should also be a subject of our concern, both as far as they themselves are concerned, and as regards the workers whom they employ or whom they could employ under normal circumstances.

We know full well that the peace process is going to be long and laborious. The path will be difficult and that is a further reason for assuring all those who are now embarking upon this process and all those who look forward to a positive result – as I said, it is a reason for assuring them that they can count on our solicitude and the solidarity of the employers' community throughout the world.

Original – Arabic: Mr. SAHBANI (Workers' delegate, Tunisia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Once again, we are meeting to discuss the report of the Director-General on the situation of Arab workers in the Arab occupied territories and the violations on the part of Israel of the most elemental human rights. Once again, we have noted that the situation of Arab workers has deteriorated because of Israel's intransigence. Israel is continuing to occupy by force the territories of others.

I am particularly happy to extend my heartfelt thanks to the Director-General and his staff, who went to the occupied Arab territories for the preparation fo this invaluable report, which is an impartial, political testimony of the sufferings of more than a million Palestinians living under military occupation.

We feel that this subject, although complex and despite the dovetailing of numerous elements, does not call for any special philosophy. Southern Lebanon and Gaza are territories occupied by military force and consequently the only solution to this problem is the withdrawal of the occupier in order to enable Arab citizens to regain access to their right to live.

The Palestinian people in Gaza and on the West Bank have organised a massive popular uprising, the intifada, which has gone on for over 55 months. This intifada is not terrorist action, as claimed by Israel, but an activity which has shown the world that this people (which has suffered over 25 years of occupation) is only aspiring to a peaceful life on its own territory.

As we hold this special sitting, we know 50,000 workers in Gaza have been deprived for over three weeks of their fundamental right to work and the occupying authorities have blocked off this area to isolate it from the rest of the world. What is going on is merely a sample of Israeli practices, a sample of all of the sufferings of the Palestinian people on a daily basis. This policy is aimed at expelling them and replacing them with new immigrants. This, despite all the international Conventions, in particular the Fourth Geneva, Convention, and international labour Convention No. 87.

What we are asking our Organisation is the following: in view of Israel's policy and its intransigent attitude, we would like the ILO to intensify its activities to ensure compliance by Israel with international Conventions. And we would like to see this Organisation, which is a United Nations specialised agency, promote compliance with international law. We would like to see the setting up of a special ILO commission or committee which would be responsible for the situation fo the Palestinian people and the Palestinian workers, similar to the Committee on Apartheid.

We also know that in Tel-Aviv there is a slave market which meets every day, where employers come along to hire Arab labour. What is happening today is a tragedy and a disgrace for humanity as a whole.

Until the Palestinian people is able to regain its independence and restore an independent State on its own territory, under the leadership of its sole legitimate leader, the PLO, we ask the ILO to increase its activities, to denounce the occupation by Israel and the violation of international treaties and to help the Palestinians, whether it be the workers or the employers, to preserve the economy of the territory of the occupied Arab territories and ensure a decent life for several millions of citizens who are living under occupation.

Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan) – The Director-General's report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories is based on information gathered and observations made by his representatives during their mission to Israel and the occupied Arab territories.

It brings up to date the information given and observations that have been made every year since 1978. It is an authoritative and impartial report.

What is alarming is the failure of the Israeli authorities to implement the recommendations made by the Director-General last year and which remain valid even now as conditions have further deteriorated in these territories.

Of particular interest to us are recommendations (iv), (v), (vii) and (viii) of paragraph 5 of the introduction to the report. It warns of the serious consequences of prolonged occupation on the conditions of work and life of the workers of the occupied Arab territories and, needless to say, by extension on the lives of their families.

The application of arbitrary and discriminatory measures of dual legal and social systems of establishing and rapidly expanding Israeli settlements in the occupied territories are not only a continuous source of tension, but also a matter of grave concern to this Conference.

On the basis of the Director-General's findings, urgent action is required to develop industry and trade and facilitate exports so that the rapidly growing labour force has more opportunities of gainful employment. This should help to improve living standards, decrease general tensions and alleviate the disturbed social conditions that have prevailed for more than a decade now.

The observations I have made are to indicate that ILO action on an enlarged scale is immediately required in the occupied territories. At the top of the list I place human resource development, education and training. I am confident that the speeches made in this sitting will enable the Director-General to formulate a programme of action for the occupied territories.

For the past two weeks speaker after speaker has spoken of the need for democracy and democracy alone as a way of life. Let us hope this message will, in spite of all the restrictions and oppression, permeate through to the occupied Arab territories also. They need it as much as we do, if not more. We sincerely hope that the appeals of the international community and the specific proposals of cooperation by the ILO, duly endorsed by the Conference, will bring about an improvement of the situation in the occupied Arab territories.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABDEL-HAK (Minister of Manpower and Training, Egypt) – I would like to congratulate the President for having been elected to preside this special session and I would also like to wish every success to all the Officers of the Conference.

Since 1978 the Director-General of the ILO has submitted a report on the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories to this International Labour Conference. These reports reflect each year in a very clear manner the true and dramatic situation in which the Palestinian and Arab workers and employers are living in the occupied Arab territories, owing to the continuous deterioration in the conditions of life and work, and also in view of the oppressive and repressive practices of the Israeli authorities and the replacement of Arab workers by migrant workers. The violation of the human rights of Palestinians and Arabs in the occupied Arab territories is a day-to-day practice which is aimed at undermining the economic structure of the Palestinian people and preventing the flow of capital. There is discrimination, in flagrant violation of Convention No. 111. The trade union leaders are still prevented from carrying out any trade union activities. They are also arrested and detained without being judged and this deprives the workers in the occupied Arab territories of their most elementary rights and trade union freedoms.

The report of the Director-General confirms the constant deterioration of the conditions of work; the same conditions of work enjoyed by Israelis are not applied to the Palestinian workers, both as regards actual conditions of employment and social security. Exorbitant taxes are imposed on the employers and workers and they cannot set up organisations and trade unions to protect their own rights.

The occupying authorities have continued to try to shatter the Palestinian economic structure and they are establishing settlements and confiscating the territory which is necessary for such settlements. Schools and vocational training centres have been closed. Deportation, exile and the lists of violations and practices which are contrary to the Convention and international labour standards is a very long one, and I am not going to list all these violations because they are to be found in the documents of the United Nations and the ILO, as well as in the documents of the International Committee of the Red Cross; there are also reports sent in by various employers' and workers' organisations.

The Israeli occupation has affected in a negative way the whole way of life of the workers in the occupied Arab territories; from the international point of view, the situation has become intolerable. The international community must assume its responsibility and put an end to this dramatic situation. The ILO and its experience, as well as its prestige at the international level, can provide all the necessary means to put an end to a further deterioration of the situation and the conditions of work of the Palestinian workers and other workers in the occupied Arab territories.

While appreciating the efforts made by the ILO to put an end to these practices and violations of international Conventions and standards, we would like to appeal to the ILO on the basis of the objectives laid down in its Constitution, in the Declaration of Philadelphia and in its resolutions on the Palestinian question to assume its responsibilities and to work seriously to put an end to the further deterioration of the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, and to provide all the necessary assistance and to coordinate, together with the other specialised agencies, such as UNDP and UNRWA, to elaborate well-defined programmes which would be applied in particular in connection with human resources, for instance in the fields of training and retraining for the Palestinian workforce, and to find alternative employment for those who have lost their jobs because they have been replaced by new immigrants, and to promote the insertion of the disabled. We also appeal to the ILO to condemn all illegal practices by implementing the two resolutions adopted in 1974 and 1980.

To those who are sceptical and who have doubts about the value of holding a special sitting regarding the situation of the Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories, we would like to say that this sitting is not an end in itself, but a forum where we can express our views regarding the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories. We hope that the Director-General's report will contain conclusions and a summary outlining specific measures to put an end to the deterioration of the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. It would be appropriate to consider setting up a body to monitor these measures.

In this connection, the Egyptian delegation would like to have a commission set up in the International Labour Conference to discuss the report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Mr. GATTEGNO (Employers' adviser, Israel) – The Near East has ceased to be a high-grade focus of political interest in terms of international conflicts. Year in and year out, the ILO continues to send fact-finding missions. Considering the amount of preparatory work and expense involved, it seems doubtful whether there is any justification for dispatching the mission, not to mention at such frequent intervals.

While both the present mission and the one that preceded it undoubtedly made an effort to strike a balance and to produce an unbiased report, they have once more failed on major points. Their failure is expressed notably in the press communiqué issued on the mission's report stressing the political aspects fo the Israel-Arab dispute. The mission was originally formed to examine the situation of Arab workers from the territories and its powers are confined to this.

Conclusions concerning Israeli control of the territories and the need to put an end to it are ultra vires with regard to the mandate of the mission. Likewise, Israel's entire approach in viewing settlement activity as a political act falls outside the mission's scope of competence. The citing from reports of international organisations in relation to human rights as distinct from workers' rights and from United Nations resolutions on the subject of the territories, the settlements and Israeli policy in connection therewith also falls outside the mission's terms of reference.

Another subject requiring correction is the fact that the mission is divided into two parts, one part of it having separately visited a number of Arab States. The findings of this visit have not been made available to us so that we could formulate a reaction. As we have remarked in recent years, we have been unable to obtain the mission's findings after it left the region.

Another subject that the mission does not have the competence to judge is that of the security considerations by which the authorities are guided. Where the report does mention security problems, and they are presented at most as an Israeli argument, this weighty matter is not presented as an acceptable argument, rather the report consistently maintains a tone of criticism in relation to it.

The Isreali security auhorities can hardly be expected to ignore, as the mission ignores, the change in the character of the uprising – the intifada – which has now switched to bodily harm and murder inflicted by weapons in the hands of terrorist gangs. Terrorisation is directed both at the Arab population and at Israeli schoolchildren and civilians within Israel proper. Are the authorities, when they determine their policy as to the delivery of work permits and other issues, to turn a blind eye to all these factors?

It frequently happens that the result is that the movement of Arab workers to Israel may be prevented for a certain period of time. Israeli employers are neither willing nor able to put up with the consequences of frequent absenteeism for reasons either security-related or related to the internal affairs of the Arab population of the territories. Accordingly, they may take measures such as work termination.

Contrary to what is claimed in the report, awareness of workers' rights is far greater today, on the part of both the workers themselves and on that of the various authorities supplying information and legal advice on relevant matters. In addition, there exist labour tribunals to discuss these matters and hand down rulings. Thus no problem exists as regards payment of severance pay when due.

With the exception of the Gulf War period, the number of Arab workers from the territories employed in Israel has not decreased. This fact can be attributed to the relatively high wages these workers earn in Israel. By way of indication, the minimum wage in Israel, not including social benefits, stands at about US$500 per month. This minimum wage law applies to all employees in Israel, including workers from the territories. The unemployment level in Israel today is over 11.5 per cent, while the unemployment level in the territories is lower. In spite of problems in the security sphere which have become much more acute, these workers continue to come seeking to work in Israel.

The report notes that about 25,000 Palestinian workers returned to their territories from the Arab States following the Gulf War. Why is no effort made to find alternative employment for them in friendly neighbouring States or in stepping up exports from the territories to those States, and why do these Palestinian workers elect to come back to work either in the territories or in Israel? Moreover, some of the world's more affluent States refrain from extending any serious assistance to the population of the territories, making economic and other aid contingent on all sorts of conditions, some of them unacceptable.

In Israel there has been a sharp reduction in the number of foreign workers from overseas owing to local unemployment. This fact encourages employment for the benefit of workers, including those coming from the territories. Fines imposed on employers for hiring workers without permits have been increased, and control in this matter has been tightened.

Cumbersome procedures and red tape are an Israeli "disease" from which Israeli citizens suffer as much as anyone else and therefore the matter should be examined from that viewpoint.

Careful scrutiny must be made when issuing permits for new plants that are liable to cause overcapacity in production which already exists in various industries. And, finally, dialogue on all levels is both inevitable and of the greatest importance.

The Madrid Middle East Peace Conference and subsequent meetings have opened the way to businesslike discussions on subjects of peace and on topics such as use of water, ecology and allied subjects.

The employers' association has seriously considered embarking on negotiations with representative organisations in the territories such as the chamber of commerce, and certainly our trend is to encourage such dialogue, both on the business level and, for the future, on the workers' rights issues.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MORENO (Workers' delegate, Spain) – We congratulate the Director-General of the ILO for the report and the concern he demonstrates in seeking a solution to the serious problems faced by the workers of the occupied territories.

Spanish workers note with interest and hope the negotiations which began in Madrid between representatives of the Israelis, the Palestinians and the Arab countries. The success of these negotiations is fundamental for the workers of the Arab occupied territories, for the people of the Middle East and for peace, stability and economic development in an important part of the world, and especially in the Mediterranean Basin.

Unfortunately, swift progress is not being made in this dialogue, but nevertheless the dialogue's very existence is positive in itself. Meanwhile, the international law so often referred to in recent times in relation to other conflicts has continued to be violated by the right-wing Likud to be violated by the Government which, besides wishing to perpetuate the occupation of the territories seized in 1967, has attempted to establish permanent Jewish settlements in the territories while oppressing their inhabitants.

The Antifada, the peaceful expression of the Palestinian people in demanding its legitimate right to self-determination, is thus supported by ourselves, while we repudiate the violent action of the occupying forces, which have caused so many casualties. Fortunately, however, an important part of the Israeli population also wants peace and does not share the intolerance and authoritarianism of its Government. The Histadrut and several progressive political and civil groups have over and over again demonstrated their will to seek peace. In my opinion, peace will only be achieved by mutual recognition of two States, Israel and Palestine, which must coexist in a framework of securitiy and political democracy. However, from now on it is imperative that resolutions of international organisations, and especially the Conventions of the ILO, should be implemented. It is essential to observe the rights to free movement and peaceful protest of the Palestinians, which have been infringed repeatedly. Likewise, we believe that violence by any groups is deplorable and should cease so that the road to reason and dialogue is opened. Moving forward in this way could guarantee dignity in employment and in the economy for the hundreds of thousands of Palestinians who will then be able to exercise fully their civil rights and build their own democratic systems in the trade union, political and social fields.

Original – French: Mr. MAGNANI (Workers' adviser, Italy) – The decision to devote a special sitting to the situation of the Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories is a sign of the ILO's involvement in this issue.

The true assessment contained in the report which the Director-General submitted to us following the mission of the ILO to these territories primarily concerns the Palestinian workers and their trade union representatives. I can only judge this issue indirectly on the basis of the sensitivity and solidarity Italian workers have shown over the years vis-à-vis the rights of the people and workers of Palestine, which the Italian delegate referred to in his speech to this Conference a few days ago.

This report, even thought it strived to remain within the limits of the terms of of reference of the ILO mission, gives a picture of the situation of the Palestinian workers of the occupied Arab territories which is certainly neither cold nor bureaucratic. It is true that the severity of the situation is primarly due to the military occupation and the deterioration of the economic situation. However, it now seems unacceptable and unbearable.

What can we say about the Palestinian workers of Gaza who every morning depend on the goodwill of the Israeli employers to be able to go and work in Israel and about the scandalous "green card" that prevents citizens from leaving the territories! It would take too long to list all the forms of discrimination suffered by the Palestinian workers in Israel. They include: the payment of wages on a daily basis, a ban on trade union membership, the denial or restriction of social benefits, the complicated bureaucratic procedures necessary to obtain a work permit, the tendency to do without one, the continous arrest of workers who do not have permits and the heavy fines help to create an atmosphere of insecurity for these workers.

Furthermore, the proliferation of Israeli settlements, favoured by the considerable immigration from the former Soviet Union, further limits the economic opportunities in the occupied territories for Palestinian workers and creates new forms of legal and social discrimination. The virtually total end of remittances as a result of the Gulf war has also reduced the resources available for economic activity in the occupied territories.

Within the limits of this brief speech I would like to refer to and support the strong desire expressed by the ILO to strengthen technical cooperation with regard to the training of trade union leaders and managerial staff, the creation of jobs, and in all areas relating to the improvement of the conditions of work and health of the Palestinian workers. With this purpose in mind, the States, the employers and the trade unions should, in corporation with the ILO, give their economic and political support in this area. The ILO should envisage setting up a committee to organise better the technical cooperation for the benefit of Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories of the West Bank of East Jerusalem and of the Gaza Strip.

As is emphasised in the final conclusions of the report, the existence of real trade union organisations of Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories reinforces the idea – emphasised by the ILO – of establishing a dialogue between the parties to examine and promote the situation of the rights of Palestinian workers.

We feel that the new framework instituted together with the Middle East Peace Conference favours dialogue. However, dialogue, the possibility of finding a solution for the most acute problems of Palstinian workers, and of establishing communications between workers and Palestinian and Israeli trade unions, is in itself a definite contribution to peace.

Original – French: Mr. HACHED (representative of the Organisation of African Unity) – My first words will be to congratulate the President on his election. I would like to express my best wishes to him for the success of the work which he is guiding in a very remarkable manner.

In speaking on behalf of the Organisation of African Unity, I would like to recall that the OAU has always deplored the situation which exists in the occupied territories and has always expressed its solidarity with the fight of the Palestinian people and the struggle of the PLO through numerous resolutions adopted over the years.

The examination of the report of the Director-General of the ILO on the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories draws attention to the continuous violations of human rights as well as of international principles and labour standards. There are numerous discriminatory practices as regards employment and training. There is much evidence that the unions and their leaders are coming up against acts of harassment and obstruction on the part of the Israeli military forces of occupation who do not hesitate to arrest and imprison Arab citizens, conscious of their rights, at the slightest pretext. The Israeli occupation favours the deterioration of the economic and social situation by depriving the population of the occupied territories of access to their natural resources, such as water and land.

The international community cannot tolerate this situation any further.

My delegation feels that after having convened three special sittings to examine the report of the Director-General and to draw the attention of international public opinion to the tragic fate of the Arab and Palestinian peoples, it would be logical and appropriate to establish a committee which would be entrusted by the Conference to study and analyse the recommendations of the ILO mission which goes to the occupied Arab territories every year. Such a measure would help the Director-General of the ILO to promote programmes which could reinforce the economic and technical capacity of the Palestinian people to do away with the Israeli military occupation.

In support of this proposal, I am of course thinking about the encouraging and effective results of the ILO's Committee on Apartheid which continues to make a considerable contribution to the eradication of racial discrimination in South Africa, in particular in the social and labour fields.

For its part, the Organisation of African Unity has always shown its solidarity with the Arab and Palestinian cause by demanding the unconditional withdrawal of Israel from the occupied territories, and by condemning the establishment of Jewish settlements in these territories.

Furthermore, the Organisation of African Unity welcomed the opening of peace talks between the Israelis and the Arabs and hopes they will lead to a global settlement. These negotiations must continue in spite of spite of stalling tactics on the part of Israel. We know that they will be arduous and difficult.

It is not acceptable at the end of the second millenium that world peace should be constantly threatened by the persistent tensions of another age.

Peace will be achieved by the creation of a Palestinian State and by cooperation between all States and peoples of the region.

Mr. GHATOWAR: (Government delegate, India) – The question of the problems of workers in the occupied Arab territories is on the agenda of the International Labour Conference for the third consecutive year. The situation in Palestine has been bedevilled by complexities of a historical nature and mutual distrust has been compounded by recurring hostilities. This underscores all the more the need for the international community to encourage and support a just, comprehensive and lasting settlement of the question.

The report of the Director-General Appendices (Vol. 2), the 15th submitted to the International Labour Conference, carries a comprehensive examination and analysis of the problems face by the workers in the occupied Arab territories. The report states that resistance to the Israeli occupation by the Arab population "remains constant and has created an equally constant situation of tension and violence and a permanent state of insecurity between the Israeli and Palestinian populations". The report observes that the economic situation in the occupied Arab territories, already precarious and overdependent on that of Israel, deteriorated in the immediate aftermath of the Gulf conflict. The occupied territories were deprived of the stable income that earlier used to be remitted by Palestinian workers in the Gulf States. Incomes of workers from the occupied territories went down when, for some time after the conflict, these workers were barred from access to Israel. The report notes that many have since regained access to work in Israel but this has not contribute in any substantial way to the improvement of the economic situation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which the Report describes as "alarming". The report recognises that some efforts have been made by the Israeli authorities to relieve the economic situation. It is disappointing, however, to learn from the report that these measures will have no major impact, in the short term, on the ailing economy of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The problems of the workers in the occupied Arab territories flow from the fact of occupation itself. Occupation has led to the imposition of alien laws, jurisdiction and administration in the occupied Arab territories. The Director-General's report notes that in such a situation the free and unimpeded exercise of trade union rights is not possible. The duties and obligations of the Israeli authorities as well as those of the trade unions for their functioning in the occupied territories have been outlined in paragraph 144 of the report. The report also deals with the question of new settlements in the occupied territories. The practice of establishing Israeli settlements and bringing new immigrants for settlements have resulted in the denial of the availability of the means of development to the Arab inhabitants of the territories. The problems of workers in the occupied territories are part of a larger problem concerning the legitimate aspirations of the Palestinian people. As long as these aspirations remain unfulfilled, lasting peace in the Middle East will continue to remain unrealised with broader implications for peace and security. It is for these reasons that India wecomes the initiation of a peace process in the Middle East.

A just, lasting and comprehensive settlement in the Middle East can only be achieved by taking fully into account the inalienable national right of the Palestinian prople, including the right to their homeland, as well as the rights of all States in the region including Palestine and Israel, to live in peace within internationlly recognised boundaries. The peace process could be long, arduous and strewn with obstacles. Political courage and statemanship would be necessary on the part of all parties. As the world community moves away from an era of confrontation, it must be ensured that there are no lost opportunities. In this context, my delegation welcomes the assistance and the support provided by the ILO to the people of the occupied territories.

Original – Farsi: Mr. MUSSAVI (Workers' adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Blessed be he who transported his servant from the holy mosque to the Al-Aksa mosque.

I have the honour in my personal capacity and on behalf of the Federation of Workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran to greet the heroic Palestinian people and I would like to pay tribute to the martyrs of Palestine and the occupied Arab territories and southern Lebanon.

The report of the Director-General, which is before us, is of crucial importance. In fact there are two reports: the Report of the Director-General on Democratisation and the ILO and the report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. How can we link up these two subjects – democratisation and the situation of Palestinian workers – since international Zionism violates the inalienable rights of workers and trade unions and carries out arbitrary practices against them, demolishing their homes, deporting them from their lands, confiscating their assets, arresting and imprisoning them and treating them in an inhuman way?

What is the meaning of democracy from the point of view of the International Labour Organisation? We hold special sittings to examine and consider the lot of Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories. There are numerous governments, trade unions and employers' organisations which denounce and condemn Israel's policies. Where exactly is this going to take us?

We are talking about humiliation. Can this be called a democratic situation?

Imperialism imposes its domination and hegemony over international organisations today and over the United Nations. We must think of ways to free ourselves from this domination which is by no means democratic. We must apply special measures to preserve our Organisation from this diabolical situation. Zionism feels reassured since the great Satan dominates the United Nations family. We must express our concern with this situation, all the more so since during this special sitting provision should not have been made for any other meetings, as is in fact the case according to the agenda.

The Federation of Workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran supports the idea of the setting up of a standing committee to examine the situation of Palestinian workers and workers in the occupied Arab territories. It is the duty of the ILO to comply with this request which has been expressed by a number of delegates.

Since the last session the Zionist entity has reiterated its terrorist practices and demolished the homes of fighters. State terrorism has increased and we must find a solution to help those who are suffering and those who have to live with this injustice.

Original – French: Mr. SENE (Employers' delegate, Senegal) – The report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories has been of great interest to my delegation in this crucial stage of the Middle Eastern question.

Indeed, this document contains useful information collected by experts who went to the occupied Arab territories, that is the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights, as well as several Arab countries.

According to the report, the economic and social context, particularly difficult and worrisome in these territories due to the occupation on the one hand, and the disastrous consequences of the Gulf War on the other. This adds to the deterioration of the global situation.

The resistance against the occupation with the intifada uprising demonstrates the magnitude and seriousness of the living conditions, working conditions and the conditions of the civilian population. They should be protected by the standards of international law and the Geneva Convention of 1949, of which the occupying power itself, Israel, is a signatory. In this respect, the report highlights the obstacles to the implementation of the principles and the objectives contained in the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. I am speaking of obstacles to equal opportunities and treatment of workers and the question of trade union rights in the territories.

In this connection, the report describes the problems of unemployment and underemployment, taxes, commercial transactions, difficulties in education and training, the establishment of settlements, the confiscation of land, the use of water resources, etc., against the background of the duality of the legal and administrative system in force, applicable to Arab, Palestinian and Israeli people in the occupied territories.

And then the report, referring to a situation described in the 1991 human rights report of the State Department of the United States says that "Palestinians, both Muslims and Christians, are treated less favourably than Israeli settlers on a broad range of issues, including equality before the law, the right to residence, freedom of movement, sale of crops and goods, land and water use, and access to health and social services."

Finally, the report also refers to the security measures, including frequent curfews, restrictions and other constraints imposed by the military authorities, which have disastrous effects on the lives of workers in the territories, including their freedoms of employment, of association, movement and expression, which are restricted because of the occupation and economic difficulties. It is no secret that the revolt against the occupation engenders violence and repression, and the blindness and aggressiveness of the protagonists. Therefore, the duty of the ILO is to assist men, women and children and to put an end to the use of brute force which stirs up hatred and mistrust and encourages extremism, radical attitudes and makes peace and stability for the entire region more remote.

This is the reason why Senegal, which has always supported the initiatives for peace, has the firm conviction that only the search for a global, just and lasting peace between the Palestinians Arabs and Israelis will allow this region to devote itself to the development of its enormous material and cultural potential, for the greatest good of its people and mankind.

Moreover, it is in this sense that Africa warmly welcomed the establishment of peaceful relations between Egypt and Israel. Thus, we express the fervent wish that the Middle East Peace Conference, inaugurated in Madrid, will fulfil its promise of freedom, tolerance, brotherhood and the dignity of peoples, the state of law and respect for human rights, mutual comprehension and the requisite of civilised cooperation. For, once again, only a political solution to which the PLO, the true and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, contributes will allow all the parties concerned to resolve one of the most dangerous crises for peace and international security.

While awaiting the solution, we must avoid the risks of the confrontation and a more acute deterioration of the economic and social situation in the occupied territories.

The ILO, for its part, as part of its role in democratisation and technical cooperation, should contribute to enable the establishment of dialogue between the trade unions in the West Bank and Gaza and the Histradrut, with a view to improving relations between the populations of Israel and the occupied territories, suggested by Mr. Oechslin, Employers' delegate from France.

In other words, the ILO should promote the development of institutions such as socio-occupational organisations of employers and workers of the occupied territories so that they may enjoy freedom of association and contribute usefully to the establishment of social peace and economic progress.

Certainly, the ILO should be able to offer its good offices in order to assist in the search for a legal framework in which to resolve social problems, to guarantee fully the legitimate trade union rights of the workers, and to contribute to coexistence in order to build peace and social justice in the region.

In any case, and in conclusion, it is a certainty that the peaceful solution of the problem of the Middle East, just as that of the problems in southern Africa and other troubled parts of the world, shall constitute a significant advance in terms of the wisdom of peoples and the virtues of dialogue in the path towards a new world order.

Mr. BRETT (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I welcome the opportunity of this debate to focus attention on the position of working people in the occupied territories. The ILO exists to help the poor and the marginalised, and the Arab working people of the territories are certainly amongst the most put upon and underprivileged. The report this year again makes it clear that the circumstances of military rule and the political impasse behind it were formidable obstacles to halting economic and social decline even before the Gulf War. But that conflict has intensifed the misery, leading to even tighter restrictions on Arab workers employed in Israel. It has broadened the scope and increased the incentives for non-declared labour and the exploitation that goes with it.

And the War also meant that the trade union organisations in the occupied territories were denied sources of support which were important to them, as Palestinian working people in other countries lost their jobs and indeed their incomes in the wake of the Gulf conflict. Over a much wider area than the territories, Palestinians – often exploited and denied basic rights – have been forced to move from their workplaces and join the increasing flow of migrants in the region. When we consider the position of the Palestinian people we should not lose sight of that, and I congratulate the ILO on the speed of its response to assist all refugees and others displaced by the conflict.

But this debate is principally about the Palestinian workers in the occupied territories and in Israel. It comes after 25 years of occupation of the territories and 15 annual report of the Director-General on the position of working people there. Representatives of the British TUC have taken part in these debates on previous occasions and it is useful, I think, to try to identify the main changes and particularly to see what new hopes for the future can be entertained.

Both the report and our own knowledge of recent developments suggest that the outlook has improved significantly in at least one respect. The trade unions of Palestinian working people in the territories have made further progress towards unity and, just as important, there are new indications of the possibilities for dialogue between their trade union representatives and the representatives of Histadrut in Israel. In the TUC, we have – like the Director-General – consistently encouraged cooperation in the interests of all the workers in the region. People from the territories working in Israel stand in even more urgent need than before of effective trade union representation and it is clear that what is necessary cannot be provided by Histadrut on its own. The report detects an increased readiness on the part of the unions to tackle the acute problems of people in precarious employment who are vulnerable to exploitation. There are pressures on both the General Federation of Trade Unions and the Histadrut which make dialogue difficult, and we heartily support the Director-General in extending best wishes for its success and in offering our help in sustaining it. We hope, too, that before long the General Confederation will be able to play a full part in the international trade union movement.

That will depend on the Israeli authorities ending their harassment of and interference in genuine trade union work in the territories. I am sure that an enlightened approach to the exercise of basic trade union and other human rights would contribute to an easing of suffering and tensions in the territories and improve the climate for the success of the process towards a just and lasting political settlement, according the peoples of the region their full national and human rights.

The improving prospects for trade union dialogue, however, have been accompanied in the past year by a renewed commitment to the settlements policy by the Israeli Government. The intensification of the setting up of the settlements – a quadrupling of building starts in 1991 – is profoundly unjust to Palestinian working people and, at the same time, it sets back the chances of achieving a comprehensive peaceful solution in the Middle East. Land in the hands of the Palestinian families for decades has been taken away in utter conflict with natural justice. The law and practice of the Israeli authorities discriminate viciously against Arab people who are often intimidated at the same time as they are deprived of their land and even of the use of water.

We join the Director-General and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in calling for an end to the settlements policy in the interests of basic justice and peace.

Original – Arabic: Mr. DJEMAN (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

The international news we have received over the past few years has tried to convince us that peace and stability in the world will prevail. We all hope this is true and that the Palestinian people will be able to recover their ligitimate rights, which are recognised by all conventions and international agreements. Indeed, all people have the right to live in peace in their own territory and to enjoy the resources of their own country while striving for its prosperity.

Each country has the right to establish its own State on its own territory, and each citizen has the right to return to his or her own homeland.

All this is recognised by the International Community for all peoples – with the exception of the Palestinian people, because they continue to live under the yoke of occupation and are deprived of their most basic freedoms.

We would like to point out that the report of the Director-General recognised the worsening economic and social situation of the Palestinian people and workers. It admitted that the restrictions imposed upon the workers do not enable them to exercise their trade union freedoms. The report also acknowledged that trade unions and trade unionists are subject to various forms of harassment, detention, imprisonment, and trade union leaders are not allowed to play their natural role. The report of the ILO gives a number of examples. There is no equal treatment or pay. Palestinian workers do not even have minimum wages and are not entitled to social security benefits. Workers in the Gaza Strip are subject to income tax which is known as "tax to breathe the air". The labour market in Palestine is like a slave market in the Middle Ages. The mission reported that the human dignity of Palestinian workers is flagrantly denied. The authorities have acknowledged this reality but do not want to change the situation, which is an affront to mankind. The report also stated that explusion, deportations, the destruction of homes and felling of trees are a daily practice in the occupied Arab territories. We all know the effects of this occupation, of this colonisation; we are aware that the Israeli policies seek to change the very nature and physical image of the occupied Arab territories with its flow of immigrants.

We, the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and the Arab trade unions in general, denounce and condemn this settlement policy and expulsions, and reaffirm the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination, a return to their homeland and the establishment of their independent State on their own territory, Palestine, under the auspices of the PLO – the true, legitimate and sole representative of the Palestinian people.

The report also asserts that the situation in the Syrian Golan Heights is no different from that of the Palestinians. It gives an account of the infringement of fundamental principles, the violation of freedom in its most basic forms, and calls upon the authorities to put an end to the settlements. The report also notes a number of very serious situations.

I have tried to sum up what I have read in the report of this impartial mission. But we feel bound to note that proposals put forward, over the past few years, have not achieved results conducive to changing the situation of the Palestinian people.

We would like to express our thanks to this mission and all the experts who had to confront many difficulties; we should like to thank them for their contribution and call upon the ILO, the Governing Body and the Director-General to intensify their efforts to assist the Palestinian people and to provide them with grants allowing them to acquire a training, because everyone has the right to work. This would allow us to attain justice within our Organisation.

We are convinced that this Organisation, this Conference and our procedures aim at seeking efficiency and justice. We therefore believe that we should set up an ad hoc committee to monitor and follow up the situations in the occupied Arab territories in order to preserve the rights of the Palestinian people and allow them to cope with a very difficult situation – the one that they face daily.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity) – Please allow me, on behalf of African workers and the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, to congratulate the Director-General for his excellent report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

Any impartial reader of the report will see that the position of Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories has worsened since last year. Not only have the Israeli occupation forces flagrantly violated international law, especially the Hague Convention of 1907 and the IVth Geneva Convention of 1949, in the treatment of Palestinian workers but they have also violated Article 2 of the Freedom of Association and the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). Article 26 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights has also been violated by the Israeli occupation authorities by the denial of education as a result of the arbitrary closure of schools and universities.

It is very shameful to note, as is clear from the report, that any civilised country in this last decade of the twentieth century can hold people in such a slavery as the Israelis hold the Palestinians in the occupied Arab territories. Otherwise, how else can anybody describe the following:

— the discriminatory national insurance schemes against Palestinian workers (paragraphs 71 and 73 of the report);
— the arbitrary dismissals and cheating of Palestinian workers out of their severance pay, compensation and wages (paragraph 86 of the report);
— the violation of the dignity of the Palestinian workers and respect for their persons (paragraph 90);
— the refusal to allow trade unions to hold elections (paragraph 92);
— the arbitrary detention of trade unionists and the refusal to allow them to travel abroad for meeting and conferences (paragraph 97);
— iniquitous taxes imposed on traders and enterprises and the difficulties placed in their way to export to countries other than Israel (paragraph 99); to say nothing of the cheating of Palestinian farmers by Israeli middlemen;
— the collection of dues (1 per cent of wages) from Palestinian workers by the Histadrut although they cannot join the Histadrut and their interests are not properly defended by the organisation (paragraph 102);
— arbitrary confiscation of Palestinian land in the occupied Arab territories (paragraph 112);
— the refusal to grant building permits to Palestinians although subsidies are granted for the building of Jewish settlements;
— the restriction of the use of water by Palestinians for domestic and agricultural use;
— unjustifiable taxes applied for grazing of cattle, even on the land of the owner;
— discriminatory educational practices designed to annihilate the Arab identity of the Palestinian population (paragraph 112(4));
— the denial by Israel to the Palestinians of equality before the law, the right to residence, freedom of movement, the restrictions placed on the sale of crops and goods, the illegal confiscation of 65 per cent of Arab land in the West Bank and 50 per cent in the Gaza Strip, etc.

The above-mentioned situation of the Palestinian workers and people in the occupied Arab territories is worse than slavery.

Another disquieting aspect of the report is the disproportionately high unemployment among the Palestinians, resulting from the Israeli occupation policy. The morally indefensible use which the Israeli authorities make of social security funds of the Palestinian workers and the lack of transparency in the administration of the funds, as referred to in paragraphs 71 and 73 of the report, should be condemned by all delegates at this Conference.

The illegal establishment of Jewish settlements in the occupied Arab territories, in violation of United Nations Security Council resolution 446 of 1979, to the detriment of the welfare, peace and happiness of the Palestinian workers and people is another example of the arrogant defiance of the United Nations and the international community by the Israeli occupation forces.

We commend the ILO for the invaluable technical assistance being given to the Palestinian workers and trade unions. This assistance should be substantially increased and continued.

In view of the desperate situation of the Palestinian workers and people in the occupied Arab territories, we call for the continuation of the annual report of the Director-General on their situation and a special Conference committee to review the Director-General's report.

For our part, we believe that there can be no permanent solution to the Middle East situation until the Palestinians are granted their inalienable right to their home in the occupied Arab territories and the Golan Heights are returned to Syria, their rightful owners, and the independence of Palestinians is granted in their homeland Palestine.

The United Nations should then guarantee the existence of all countries in the region. Until justice is done to all sides of the Arab-Israeli conflict, there cannot be peace. We should all work for justice and permanent peace in the region.

Original – French: Mrs. FAUCHERE (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) – The World Confederation of Labour welcomes this Special Sitting for the discussion of the report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. The WCL would also like to congratulate the Director-General on the clarity and objectivity of his report. Despite the end of the cold war, the efforts deployed by democratic forces and international organisations, the Middle East Peace Conference and the successive talks which have taken place, we still must note that the situation between the Palestinian and Israeli peoples remain explosive.

During the elections planned for 23 June 1992, the Israeli public will have to decide what are the prospects for peace with the Palestinians. They will be called upon to determine whether their country can continue to disregard the rights of the Palestinians and the resolutions of the United Nations at a time when the regional and international context provides an unprecedented opportunity for a comprehensive settlement.

The WCL rejects the expansionist policy of Israel and notes that the situation of the Palestinians is worsening day by day. It is aggravated in particular by the establishment of Jewish settlements in the occupied territories, a practice which has continued in spite of resolution 446 of the United Nations Security Council, which states that any policy or practice aimed at creating settlement colonies is a serious obstacle to the establishment of a lasting peace in the Middle East.

The WCL rejects the dispartities which have been created by Israel to the detriment of the Arabs. It is obvious that the colonisation policy practised by Israel and the means used to implement it, in particular the repressive measures used by the military forces, are aimed at destroying the Palestinian people.

Furthermore, the discriminatory measures taken against Palestinian workers are inadmissible. They violate ILO Conventions, and especially those that deal with wages, benefits, equality of treatment, restrictive recruitment measures and administrative procedures for the granting of a work permit, etc.

The reduction of employment in the occupied territories is very disconcerting (a drop of 6 per cent according to the figures quoted by the Director-General). This is all the more disturbing because salaried workers are a minority among the Palestinians working in the territories; 40 per cent on the West Bank and 38 per cent in the Gaza Strip. A large number of Palestinian workers employed in Israel encounter tremendous difficulties in carrying out their jobs with full rights. Even those who have work permits may be prevented from working or are even dismissed before the expiration of their permit. Many others have been prevented from going to their place of work because of the curfew, a problem that has become standard fare when conflict flares.

The report of the Director-General also mentions the practical difficulties caused by the closing of universities and schools with very serious and incalculable repercussions in the field of education and training. The WCL considers that without basic education and vocational training it is practically impossible for a people to flourish in a world where economic, social and political development is more and more important every day. The WCL supports the recommendation made in the report requesting that universities and schools should operate normally and should no longer be subjected to the repressive measures taken against them for so long.

As regards fundamental freedoms, and in particular freedom of association, it is inadmissible that the restrictions imposed on trade unions and trade union activities under an occupation should make it impossible to have a free exercise of trade union rights. We therefore demand that the State of Israel, which is a member of the ILO, respect and apply the principles of freedom of association in the occupied Arab territories.

We solemnly appeal to all independent peace-loving democratic forces which aspire after harmony and justice to continue by all means possible to continue to exert pressure on Israel so that it ceases these policies, which are comparable to the odious system of apartheid.

In the light of this similarity, the World Confederation of Labour requests the ILO to set up a tripartite committee similar to the Committee on Action against Apartheid so that the Palestinian people can recover their dignity while awaiting the advent of a free, independent and sovereign State. The WCL expects an in-depth change in the Israeli position and expresses the hope that the future Government, no matter what its constitution may be, will finally commit itself with good faith and good will to carrying on the peace talks. It is our hope that Israel will recognise the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people.

Original – French: Mr. VITTORI (representative of Pax Christi International) – It is with great sadness that my organisation took note of the Director-General's 15th report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. Without the undeniable credibility conferred to the document by the signature of the Director-General of the ILO, the facts reported would be hard to believe. There is no room for doubt, however, and knowing the restraint with which such reports are written we must acknowledge the fact that the situation is intolerable.

The Jewish people have suffered so much, that for many of them the discrimination, scorn and hatred which the Palestinians are suffering from, are still inconceivable. Rather than being indignant, we are deeply troubled by what the representatives of the Director-General observed during their brief stay in the country which was the birthplace of the one who was born in a manger in Bethlehem, and worked as a humble carpenter in Nazareth, before being condemned as a blasphemer by his own people, and as an insurgent Galilean's by the occupier, and was crucified on Golgotha in the holy city of Jerusalem. The Galilean's disciples were all Jewish. They were fishermen, farmers, civil servants, they were workers. Having become Christians in the course of these generations they ceased to be Jewish and became simply Palestinians. As such, the State of Israel has made them and their muslin brothers second-class citizens in the best of cases, and strangers in their own land, in the worst of cases.

In all legality their lands are confiscated, their houses destroyed, their olive trees uprooted and their water used. Arrested and detained without trial, mistreated and often tortured, they are the subject of retaliation when one of them, because of fanaticism, revolt or despair, commits a crime or is merely suspected of one.

The Jewish settlers who install themselves with the help of the State in the occupied territories are privileged by Israeli laws which confer on them outrageous privileges. The Palestinians of the territories are subjected to the law of the occupier and, in some cases, to Egyptian or Jordanian law amended according to the interests of the Israelis through regulations issued by the military administration.

If this is not racism, what is?

We have also taken note of the document submitted by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs of Israel. It has two positive qualities. First of all it describes what would already constitute a first step if all of the measures listed had really been implemented. The second is that by querying the situation observed by the representatives and Director-General, it condemns it at the same time.

In a speech to the Knesset last year, when he was awarded the Wolf International Foundation prize, the great humanist and Jewish musician Yehudi Menuhin declared:

"One fact is abundantly clear, that this destructive way of governing through fear, through scorn for the fundamental dignity of life, this continuous stifling of a dependent people, should be the last method to be adopted by those who themselves know only too well the horrible meaning, the unforgettable suffering of such an existence."

Sir Yehudi Menuhin honours his people. He fortunately is not the only one, although they are few and deprived of means. Pax Christi would like to pay tribute to the advocates of peace and human rights who, in a number of Israeli and Israeli-Arab organisations, are the generous and bold living testimony to be a long and noble tradition, which has unfortunately gone astray today because of the political situation.

Pax Christi International is surprised once again at not having found anything in the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on the subject of Israel, and would like to end by presenting a specific proposal. Should the Governing Body of the ILO not be requested to take the initiative, alongside the Peace Conference, for a tripartite meeting in Geneva on the implementation of ILO standards in the Arab territories occupied by Israel? It would like to urge governments, employers and workers, respectfully, but forcefully, to study this suggestion to support it if they find it acceptable and likely to improve the lot of Palestinian workers. Words are no longer enough, we have to take action.

Original – French: Mr. RETUREAU (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) – The report which is before us unfortunately indicates that the economic and social situation of the populations in the occupied Arab territories continues to deteriorate. Their human rights continue to be permanently violated. I was able to see this dramatic situation during the stays that I made in the territories after the beginning of the intifada. It is unbearable and is an insult to the human conscience.

The economy of these territories is more and more dependent on Israel through controls, administrative procedures, taxes, and non-tarif barriers imposed on a captive market.

Furthermore, the Gulf War last year affected many Palestinian expatriate workers who were often taken as whipping boys in a conflict for which they were not responsible and where they were not among the belligerents. In addition to their rights, the income which they sent to their families in the occupied territories were seriously affected.

The inhuman curfew of 45 days imposed at the beginning of 1991 by the occupying forces struck the population in an unbearable manner, and led to the breaking of many contracts of work, and destabilised durable employment.

It is in this local and regional context that the standard of living of a growing population is constantly deteriorating, and that unemployment and underemployment are becoming even more serious than in the past.

During the same period, the massive immigration into Israel had an effect on the employment market, depriving workers of the possibility of employment, whereas the occupied territories are condemned to economic starvation because of the blocking of their possibilities of development, their possibility of training and educating the young generation because of the repeated, long-lasting closures of schools and universities, which will have incalculable long-term effects on the future of Palestine.

Most of the jobs accessible to the Arab workers in the territories are precarious, occasional, badly paid, and the right to a minimum wage is often violated.

The system of work permits and identity controls, which are inspired by racist ideals, the obligations imposed on these workers, lead to a policy which is similar to apartheid. The workers without permits who take risks to support their families are more seriously struck by the heavy fines of the employers, who over-exploit them. As regards recruitment and military controls of day labourers, paragraph 90 of the report emphasises the fact that this is contrary to human dignity.

The Arab trade unions in the occupied territories are facing increasing difficulties in their operation and activities, due to the occupying authorities, which continue to obstruct and harass their leaders, delegates and activists. Some are arrested and expelled.

Since last year, in spite of the beginning of political contact and negotiations, Israel has continued its policy of new settlements and a massive transfer of the Jewish population to the territories and, in spite of repeated requests by the international community to put an end to this colonialist policy, has continued to violate international law and the Geneva Conventions.

The settlers have special advantages and privileges in many fields. They benefit from the confiscation of Arab land. They have privileges with regard to access to water, economic facilities, to the detriment of the Arab population, which suffers from discrimination on an ethnic basis.

During the past 25 years, since the war of 1967, a real apartheid policy has been applied systematically by the occupant and Israeli colonialiser.

We welcome and appreciate the work of the ILO to show the reality of the life of the Arab workers in the occupied territories. The facts speak for themselves, and the simple statement of these realities is an act of accusation against the occupants. We would like to see this work continue, and that the ILO continue its efforts, attemping in every possible way to intensify technical cooperation with the Arab workers of the occupied territories, and their trade union organisations, despite the difficulties and barriers put up by the occupant.

However the debate that we continue to have on this report is relatively limited, and should be expanded and considered in greater depth in the future if possible, through a special, tripartite committee, so as to reach specific conclusions and recommendations at the Conference which would lead to real and lasting changes, and help to put an end to military occupation and promote the development of an independent and sovereign Palestine.

This occupation has already lasted for a quarter of a century, and the brutal and bloody repression of the legitimate revolt of the oppressed against the occupant is a focus of destabilisation and military conflict in the whole region. The occupation and colonisation can only continue to strengthen the resistance, increase tensions and prevent a just and lasting peace respecting the right of all peoples in the region to self-determination and security, while respecting international law.

The international community as a whole now seems to wish to settle the situation, as has been seen in the Madrid negotiations. But it will have to come up with more effective ways of persuading the Israeli authorities to put an end to their discriminatory and repressive policies and withdraw from the occupied Arab territories, which have been occupied since 1967, so that the Palestinian people can freely exercise their right to self-determination and so that the populations of the Syrian Golan Heights and southern Lebanon will recover their national rights in their respective countries.

This is what the workers of the World Federation of Trade Unions are demanding, and they will continue to express their solidarity and to give their support to their brothers who are subjected to this inhuman occupation.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MARIUS (representative of the Latin American Central of Workers) – It is with great pleasure and deep concern that we speak once again from this rostrum at a special sitting of the International Labour Conference concerning the situation of the workers of the occupied Arab territories.

It is a pleasure because it is once more an expression of our full, consistent and effective solidarity with our brother, workers in Palestine, a solidarity that we have with all those who one way or another have their fundamental rights restricted, their legitimate need to develop as human beings regardless of colour, race, religion or nationality.

But we must also say that it is with a deep sense of concern that we take this rostrum to question the incoherence shown by some international bodies concerning this situation.

Independently of our opinion on these matters and the events related to the so-called Gulf War against the Government of Iraq, memories which are still painful, as well as present events concerning the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, we were all able and are still able to see the determination and speed with which the United Nations and, in particular, some countries with a decisive influence in that body felt no doubt in adopting extreme measures, including the use of force to ensure the application of the decisions adopted.

We all know that since 1967 and 1973 resolutions exist such as Nos. 242 and 338 of the United Nations which called for the withdrawal of the occupation force from the occupied Arab territories, in line with the fundamental principle of self-determination which the workers and peoples of Palestine legitimately deserve. However, in spite of the prolonged and unjustified delay in the application of the resolution, we have not seen the same determination or any other special measure for its application, as occurred in the above-mentioned cases. None of us doubts how the application and implementation of international agreements are subject to the interests of economic and military hegemony, a situation which makes us fearful for the future of humanity, since it compromises peace and universal harmony and violates the most sacred rights enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The most dangerous and disappointing aspect of all this is the fact that such bodies as the United Nations, which were established to guarantee peace and ensure the proper application of justice, and which are basic references for the weakest peoples, our peoples in the Third World, and which should preserve in an unequivocal and unrestricted manner the moral force of applying international conventions with equanimity, are now being drawn into regrettable situations of complicity and incoherence which compromise their respectability and efficiency.

The Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO states that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice" and that "conditions of labour ... involving ... injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people ... produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are impelled". If these principles are still valid, and for us they should be, then there should be no doubt or hesitation on our part to make the necessary efforts to find forms and mechanisms to promote and establish the legitimate right of the workers and people of Palestine to be able to live as free beings and to develop on the basis of their own interests as a people and a nation.

We thus support what has been achieved by the ILO and strongly endorse the initiative to set up a special Conference committee, as in the case with apartheid, with the responsibility of making an in-depth study of the situation of Arab workers in the occupied territories with a view to identifying effective alternatives which would lead to a just and definitive solution to this problem. In the same way, we express our support and willingness to participate actively in a trade union solidarity committee.

We are fully aware that this decision will affect the future of millions of workers, not only those in the above-mentioned territories but those that are obliged to live in other countries in which they are subject to the constant violations of their most basic rights without any possibility of being allowed to return to their countries of origin and build a better future for their children.

We are profoundly committed to the preservtion and development of a culture based on peace and freedom, as the fruit of democracy and social justice. This leads us to fight for the rights attending the workers and people of Israel, and of all the workers of the world who fought and are still fighting to live as human beings. With the moral force of this commitment, we demand the necessary spirit of coherence on the part of the bodies and we engage our most active solidarity in the task of bringing peace and justice to the breasts and hearts of our Palestinian brothers.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We have come to the end of this very long Special Sitting. I am going to close the sitting with a few brief words, so that we can conclude our work.

I think that it is not necessary to draw conclusions but I am convinced that the Director-General has drawn very useful information from all the statements made here, and a response will be given at the end of the Conference. I would like to thank all the speakers for their cooperation during this Special Sitting, which I believe contributed quite considerably to furthering this cause.

As President of this Conference, I am the very first to wish to apply the decisions taken in connection with this Special Sitting. This was my duty and I hope everyone understood this. On my own behalf, and on behalf of my three Vice-Presidents, I would like to reiterate my thanks to the speakers for their cooperation.

Finally, in conclusion, I would most sincerely like to express our hope that peace and social justice will prevail and that it will be possible to resolve this very complex problem and that there will be a dialogue between the competent parties.

(The Conference adjourned at 7.45 p.m.)

Action Taken on the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa

Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid

1. The Committee was established in accordance with paragraph 4 of the updated Declaration on Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia which was adopted by the Conference at its 75th Session (1988). It was established, inter alia, for the purpose of monitoring action against apartheid.

2. The Committee was composed of 50 members with the right to vote (20 Government members, 10 Employers' members and 20 Workers' members). It also included one deputy Government member, 9 Employers' deputy members and 16 Workers' deputy members. In accordance with the usual procedure, equal voting for the three groups was assured by the appropriate system of weighted voting. A number of organisations with consultative status, as well as the African National Congress of South Africa (ANC) and the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC), were represented by observers.

3. At its opening sitting, the Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. John L. Nkomo (Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare, Zimbabwe);

Vice- Chairmen: Mr. B. G. Hernandez (Employers' member, Philippines) and Mr. B. Brett (Workers' member, United Kingdom);

Reporter: Mr. H. Halinen (Government member, Finland).

4. The Committee held six sittings. Its agenda was to examine the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, which dealt, inter alia, with developments regarding the situation in South Africa in respect of labour and social matters, and contained an analysis of the information provided by governments, and employers' and workers' organisations on measures taken against apartheid as foreseen in paragraph 5 (b) of the Declaration as well as on international action against apartheid, and that which had been provided in response to the questionnaire revised by the Group of Independent Experts to follow up on and monitor sanctions and other action against apartheid which had been approved by the Governing Body of the ILO and distributed by the Office. A further document complemented the Special Report by providing a brief summary of the principal events concerning labour matters which have occurred in South Africa since the preparation of the 1992 Special Report. The Committee also had before it the following documents relating to the Committee on Discrimination of the 253rd (May-June 1992) Session of the Governing Body:

(1) information supplied by governments and by employers' and workers' organisations on action taken against apartheid (G.B.253/CD/2/4);

(2) reports of the eighth and ninth meetings of the Group of Independent Experts to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid (G.B.253/CD/4/2);

(3) those portions of the Report of the Committee on Discrimination which relate to the above matters (G.B.253/14/26); as well as

(4) the report of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa which took place in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 5 to 8 May 1992 (G.B.253/CD/3/5; and reproduced in Provisional Record No. 4).

5. In opening the proceedings of the Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General referred to the Special Report and other information before the Committee, which showed clearly that apartheid and its effects – the legacies of poverty, inequality and lack of freedom – were still to be confronted. These issues received attention at the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa in Harare in May 1992 and were reflected in the conclusions adopted by that Conference. A discussion on these conclusions took place recently in the Governing Body's Committee on Discrimination. Moreover, an important analysis, together with significant conclusions and Recommendations, was contained in the report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association (FFCC), which was appointed by the ILO Governing Body to examine the complaint of infringements of trade union rights in the Republic of South Africa presented to the ILO by the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU). At its May-June 1992 Session, just concluded, the Governing Body decided to transmit this report to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. All of these various documents showed the need for continued action by the ILO in a field where it had developed a great deal of expertise over the years. For the most part, that action had comprised three elements: a careful appraisal of the situation in South Africa, in all its facets; the encouragement, even the insistence, that maximum pressure be exerted by ILO constituents for the ending of apartheid; and constant assistance to those who have been most closely involved in the campaign to demolish that system. All three elements had been undertaken in close collaboration with the United Nations and other organisations in the international community. Today, the question was not whether these forms of action should continue, since it was obvious that they must, until our common goals have been achieved; rather, it was necessary to determine how best to carry out these functions in the context of the rapidly changing situation. It was premature to assume that the path towards meaningful, complete change would be smooth. The set-back experienced when the Convention for a Democratic South Africa II (CODESA II) failed to reach a substantive conclusion on the implementation of machinery for framing a democratic Constitution for South Africa had still to be overcome. That was still awaited so that transitional arrangements were put in place for an interim government, thereby enabling the ILO and other UN organisations to move forward to provide assistance where it was most needed, for the purpose of overcoming discrimination and establishing true social justice. The Special Report made it clear that the ILO was ready to extend the necessary assistance, and that this might involve activities inside South Africa. Other agencies within the international community, including the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the World Food Programme (WFP), the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the World Bank, the European Community and the Commonwealth Secretariat, had already engaged themselves, or were poised to respond to the country's needs. The UN General Assembly had, in its consensus Resolution No. 46/79A of December 1991, also clearly pointed the way to such activity, while stressing the need for adequate safeguards. All of these measures constituted strong indications of the type of action that was needed, while at the same time maintaining the pressure for definitive change, which was a necessary precondition of all future ILO action. It was to be hoped that the Committee would focus on the ways of giving effect to those needs and requirements.

6. The Chairman considered the Committee had a duty to "walk the last mile" on the way to the end of apartheid, in the terms of Mr. Nelson Mandela's appeal to the 1990 International Labour Conference. It would be very sad to send a wrong signal to South Africa, particularly at this stage when it appeared there was a slowing down in the process of reform. The responsibility of the Committee was to hasten the progress. Accordingly, it was to be hoped that the Committee could present a unanimously agreed report to the plenary. The question of sanctions stood out as the most important weapon: if there should be any changes, the people of South Africa would provide guidance. In this regard, the presence of representatives of the workers' and of the liberation movement would enrich the Committee's report. The Chairman expressed appreciation for the comprehensive Special Report, which formed the basis for a meaningful discussion. While not wishing to preempt the deliberations of the Committee, he however considered that it was of paramount importance to ensure that the situation did not abort: there was a need to establish true democracy in South Africa and to eradicate apartheid definitively.

7. The Workers' Vice-Chairman observed that developments in South Africa over the past year had raised the expectations of the international community on the prospect of an early negotiated political settlement of the burning issue of apartheid. However, optimism had been dashed almost immediately by other events in the country. The deadlock in the talks at CODESA II in May was but the latest episode to shatter expectations. The change of attitude of the South African Government after the all-White Referendum on March 17 was largely responsible for the breakdown of the talks. Negotiations collapsed when both sides disagreed over how decisions should be taken in the elected body which would eventually draw up a post-apartheid Constitution. President F. W. de Klerk's National Party tabled proposal after proposal designed to allow it, in alliance with other minority parties, to veto decisions of the Constitution-making body. This would be achieved either by imposing a requirement that decisions be taken by a 75 per cent majority, or by a specially elected Senate, with a disproportionately large representation for regional and minority groups, who could veto decisions of the main body. The African National Congress of South Africa (ANC) proposed a two-thirds majority which was rejected by the National Party. The ANC then offered to accept a 70 per cent majority (with 75 per cent to approve the Bill of Rights) and demanded that a popular referendum be called if that majority could not be achieved. The Workers' group believed that this demonstrated the good faith of the ANC, particularly when it was considered that in many democratic countries important decisions were taken by simple majority only. Moreover, the ANC position contrasted vividly with the Government's demonstrable reluctance to hand over power to the majority. The Government's behaviour over the last few months persuaded the Workers' group that the Government had adopted a deliberate tactic of destabilising the democratic transition by promoting circumstances of social disorder. The failure of the authorities to curb township violence, which had left 11,000 dead since 1984, was also an indication of the Government's double-sided strategy of negotiating the future of the country, while simultaneously destabilising the Black community. As the Special Report revealed, violence took place not only in communities, but also in factories and mines, thus affecting seriously the organisation and recruitment activities of trade unions. Although the Government had adequate resources to deal with the major outbreaks of violence, little had been done to do so and, consequently, questions had been raised about the Government's commitment to end violence. In addition, the failure to bring to justice the many perpetrators of violence strengthened the view that the Government was an interested party in invoking violence for its own political survival. Trade unionists continued to be intimidated and arrested by the police. Sanctions concerning arms, oil and finances, were an essential form of pressure which must continue to be used until apartheid had been dismantled fully. Those countries which hastened to remove economic sanctions before the establishment of a democratic government were to be condemned. The repeal of some apartheid legislation did not mean the abolition of the system. The Special Report revealed that at least 14 apartheid laws were still in force. Labour legislation did not yet cover farmworkers, domestic servants and public employees, in contravention of the Laboria Minute agreed upon in 1991. In the light of all these circumstances, and in accordance with the Recommendations adopted at the Harare Tripartite Conference, it was considered that the repeal or revision of the ILO Declaration concerning apartheid would be premature. The work of the Committee would only end when the Black majority enjoyed constitutional rights ensuring their participation in a non-racial, democratically elected government. The persistence of profound socio-economic inequalities and widespread poverty undermined progress towards the eradication of apartheid and a future democracy. During the transition period and as the country eventually entered the post-apartheid era, the ILO had a role in promoting the training and education of the Black population, including the extension of assistance to democratic trade unions to address glaring inequalities in the areas of employment and working conditions, education, technical and vocational training and retraining, occupational health and safety, housing and social welfare. The Workers' group was concerned to note that while there had been an increase in the number of replies received from workers' organisations to the questionnaire of the Group of Independent Experts, the number of replies received from employers' organisations had continued to decline. The Workers were also concerned that most Members of the European Community had not provided individual replies to the questionnaire, particularly as the implementation of sanctions adopted by the Community in 1986 had been left to individual Member States. Appreciation was expressed for the convening of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa in Harare. The Workers' group was convinced that the continuation of broad-based negotiations in CODESA on the future of South Africa, in conformity with the objectives set out in its Declaration of Intent, were important prerequisites to the total eradication of apartheid through peaceful means.

8. The Employers' Vice-Chairman complimented the Director-General on the Special Report, which expressed satisfaction over ongoing negotiations that would result hopefully in the demise of apartheid and the institution of a non-racial and democratic government in South Africa. The Director-General's Report had suggested, correctly, that apartheid had not disappeared. It also noted that the CODESA talks were being compromised by a high level of violence within the country. The Employers' group reiterated the concern it expressed last year and hoped for the avoidance of any violent measures which would disrupt the negotiations of a new, non-racial Constitution and a fully representative government. Last year, the Employers expressed satisfaction on the repeal of several major legislative underpinnings of apartheid in South Africa. However, as the Special Report declared, at least 14 apartheid laws were still in force. The Employers' group was concerned to be apprised of the nature and texts of these laws and appealed to the South African authorities to consider a review – within the context of encouraging developments in the country – of existing laws, with a view to nullifying those that still permitted and encouraged discriminatory practices and precluded the equitable distribution of services and resources to all people. Even despite the repeal of discriminatory legislation, it would take a long time before the scars of apartheid were healed, more particularly while poverty remained widespread. In this connection, the Group of Independent Experts had noted that much of the de facto pattern of apartheid prevailed. In 1991, the Employers expressed regret over the low response of governments, employers' and workers' organisations to the request for information on action taken by them against apartheid, despite the revision and simplification of the questionnaire. The limited response on this occasion was not, it was hoped, an indication of the diminishing resolve of the social partners and the constituent Members of the ILO to pursue all efforts to dismantle apartheid. Rather, it could be due to the perception that, since South Africa has made substantial progress towards eliminating the system of apartheid, it would continue to do so even in the absence of international pressure. There may also have been the impression that the system of apartheid would wear itself out. The Employers were pleased and satisfied with the results of the Harare Conference. The Vice-Chairman referred to the preambular paragraph of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, which linked the apartheid system to the peace and security of the region. Read in the light of that paragraph, the report of the Conference and particularly the conclusions, assumed relevance and importance, in terms of their impact upon and direct benefit for the frontline and neighbouring States and the entire southern African region. Special reference was made to paragraph 62, subparagraphs 9, 10, 11, 15, 23 and 25 of the conclusions of the Harare Conference. In expectation of the advent of a non-racial democratic South African Government, it was appropriate for the ILO to formulate programmes and prepare projects on technical and other assistance for implementation in the country, as soon as such a government was installed. For this purpose, it would be necessary for the ILO to undertake consultations with relevant employers' and workers' organisations inside South Africa. The Organisation should stand prepared to act whenever and wherever its specialised technical competence and resources were required. The Harare Conference considered it premature to repeal or revise the ILO Declaration on Action against Apartheid. The Employers' group did not consider it imperative and necessary to consider, at this time, a revision or restructuring of the Declaration and the Programme of Action. Those documents should remain in force as basic guidelines, applicable until such time as the ILO had decided that their objectives had been achieved. It was to be hoped that the members of the Committee would work in unison to urge the hastening of the formation of a truly democratic, non-racial and representative government so that the Declaration and the Programme would be rendered obsolete and academic. The position of the Employers' group concerning sanctions was reflected in paragraph 62, subparagraph 11, of the conclusions of the Harare Conference, with the reservations expressed by a minority of employers who were constrained by certain constitutional and corporate factors. The formation of a non-racial employers' organisation was earnestly sought and steps had been taken concerning this matter. A Seminar was held in Harare on 27-29 January 1992 on the prospects for the creation of a representative body of employers in South Africa.

9. The Government member of Egypt pointed out that a decisive stage had been reached regarding the improvement of the situation in South Africa. Each year, the report of the Committee concerning action against Apartheid was based on the examination of the Special Report of the Director-General, as well as on other documents; this year, the Committee also had before it the report of the Harare Tripartite Conference. The Egyptian delegation considered there had been positive developments in South Africa, such as the repeal of certain laws on apartheid, which opened the way for change and for establishing a transitional government that would respect human rights and institute democracy. However, violence had threatened the lives of Black inhabitants of the country and had led to the increased intervention of the police and security forces. CODESA I and II had failed to reach an agreement concerning the disputes and conflicts, particularly on the majority required to amend the Constitution. Such a situation should not hinder the creation of an interim government, nor the establishment of a non-racial society in South Africa. The ANC had shown a spirit of openness that created a favourable climate to which CODESA III could respond. In addition, the ILO could play an important part within its own field of competence to continue to bring about an irreversible change in South Africa. This could become fact by providing technical assistance to Black trade unions and to non-racial organisations of employers and workers, and by strengthening supervision of the application of labour legislation in the country. The process already begun to prepare a post-apartheid society should be augmented to ensure the creation of a society that could offer its members a normal, secure life. The United Nations and organisations such as the ILO could have a vital bearing on the lives of Black workers. Any progress in this regard would have consequences on the economic viability of the country and on its investment possibilities. The representative stressed that since the last session of the Conference, several international bodies had considered the apartheid question: for example, the UN General Assembly adopted at its 46th Session resolution No. 46/79, the Sub-Commission of the Human Rights Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities examined the question at its 43rd Session in August 1991, and the Human Rights Commission adopted a resolution on the matter at its 48th Session held from January to March 1992. The Organization of African Unity (OAU) also discussed this problem at its Special Committee on South Africa, which met at Arusha. All of these meetings reached the conclusion that there was a need to encourage a dialogue in South Africa with a view to establishing an interim government and to establish the foundation of a non-racial society where all citizens enjoyed equal rights and duties; and to maintain the pressure of the international community on South Africa until these goals were achieved. The representative stated that there would have been no necessity to debate the question of apartheid if all the required reforms had been instituted. Action for the total abolition of apartheid could not yet come to an end. The international community had a significant increased role in the creation of a democratic and non-racial society.

10. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that a number of developments had been noted in the documents presented to the Committee, but that they had not been sufficient to eliminate apartheid. The members of the Committee would have been happy to meet simply to note the end of apartheid. In fact, the Committee was charged with the task of elaborating future programmes to assist the workers of South Africa in a post-apartheid society. The institutions of apartheid remained in place; there was still more to do to eliminate them and to adopt a democratic Constitution which would establish equality and justice. The speaker pointed out that the social, economic and labour situation had been very bad during the past 12 months. The gross national product (GNP) had diminished by 0.9 per cent over the last nine months of 1991. The dialogue to establish a non-racial society had been jeopardised by violence; the repercussions of violence on the social and economic arena could only hinder the improvement of the situation. Other pillars of apartheid remained. It was necessary to make a distinction between the repeal of the legislation on apartheid and the elimination of discriminatory racial practices so as to end centuries of suffering. Fourteen apartheid laws remained in force. The South African Government had agreed to the participation of trade unions in a certain number of discussions and activities, but these organisations had been forced to withdraw when the Government refused to implement their proposals. For example, the Government had refused to extend the provisions of the labour legislation to cover domestic and agricultural workers. In addition, the Government had refused the direct participation of the workers in future discussions; COSATU, the ANC and the NACTU had sought direct participation at the negotiating table but this had been opposed by the Government. NACTU had proposed amendments to the judicial system, such as the creation of workers' tribunals; and a public awareness campaign had been launched by NACTU to fight for workers' rights and to guarantee them protection against discrimination. The various laws in existence did not grant to Black workers the status accorded to White and foreign workers particularly as concerns wages, health, occupational safety and housing. Trade union organisations required material assistance to support their battle to obtain equality for Black workers, whether in the workplace or as regards housing. The Libyan Arab Jamahiriya did not recognise the apartheid regime in South Africa. The Libyan people did, however, offer aid to the South African people and upheld their rights in all international forums. Unfair accusations were levelled at the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya for its support of justice, but it would nevertheless continue to work for the defence of the rights of Black South Africans as well as those of Palestinians who suffered under racist regimes, until positive changes were put into place. The representative stated that his country supported the maintenance of sanctions. It was premature to lift sanctions: rather, they should be applied seriously and relentlessly. ILO action was commendable, in particular, technical assistance to trade unions and to Black workers.

A programme to assist the construction of a post-apartheid society should be developed now so as to be prepared for that eventuality. The speaker paid tribute to the Group of Independent Experts and to the Committee on Discrimination, as well as to the worthwhile work accomplished at the Harare Tripartite Conference.

11. The Worker's member of the United States drew attention to Chapter I of the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid, which highlighted the racial divisions in South African society. Progress towards achieving equality in basic living standards would be the most accurate index of the demise of apartheid. Unfortunately, the gap in Black and White living standards remained huge. In education there was a 4 : 1 ratio in per capita spending on White and African students; in housing there was a shortage of between 2 million and 3.4 million units for Africans; and in the area of health care Whites received a disproportionate share of funding while high rates of infant mortality and AIDS added to the diseases of poverty affecting African communities. Improvements in this situation would show a movement away from apartheid. Finally, he reminded the Committee that recent data on the activities of US companies in South Africa showed that of the 106 US companies remaining, 18 provided 80 per cent of all Black jobs generated by US companies; therefore anyone wanting to discuss the lifting of sanctions should best begin by offering a realistic solution to the continuing problem of investment without responsibility.

12. The General Secretary of the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) expressed his appreciation for the work of the Committee, and emphasised that more remained to be done because apartheid continued to exist and President de Klerk was intent on smashing the democratic movement. The effect of the Government's campaign of destabilisation had been devastating, and President de Klerk could not escape responsibility since it had been exposed that state funds were used to fund groups promoting violence, assassinations and covert operations. In one COSATU local, 75 trade unionists had been murdered in the past two years. At CODESA II, it had become clear that the Government wanted to entrench White minority rule and COSATU had therefore decided to embark upon a programme of mass action to break the political log-jam, based on their demands for an interim government of national unity by the end of June 1992 that could level the playing field by exercising control over state finances, security forces and media. Elections to a constituent assembly should be held by the end of December 1992. The ILO had an important role to play in helping to redress the inequalities of apartheid through a programme of socio-economic reconstruction. The report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission contained recommendations which could be used to assist in the reform of the labour laws and the labour market institutions. The trade unions were involved in negotiations with the government and employers on unemployment insurance, on training and on the extension of collective bargaining to the agricultural, domestic and public sectors. In addition, tripartite negotiations were beginning on macro-economic issues, and the ILO could provide assistance on the policy questions to be debated there. An affirmative action programme was also required, and an investment code that would ensure that investment did not undermine worker rights. Technical cooperation in these areas was essential to help the democratic movement level the playing field. Such assistance should await the establishment of an interim government, and should go only to democratic and non-racial organisations. In this regard, COSATU fully endorsed the report of the Tripartite Conference on southern Africa held recently in Harare.

13. The Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic noted that apartheid continued to exist in South Africa despite the apparent changes that had taken place. Violence and other pressures continued to be exerted on the workers, and it was therefore necessary to maintain international sanctions against apartheid. The ILO had a vital role to play in that process which should continue until apartheid had been eliminated.

14. The Government member of Senegal thanked the Director-General for the quality of the Special Report on Apartheid and the Group of Independent Experts for their work. He recalled that, although President de Klerk had pronounced the official death of apartheid, a number of laws still had to be abolished, such as the Electoral Act which accorded the right to vote to Whites, Indians and Coloureds, but excluded Blacks. There were also discriminatory laws applying to the homelands, education, health and social security. In addition, the years of suffering under apartheid would leave their mark for a long time to come. He was concerned about the climate of violence present in the townships, factories, mines and public transport. It was regrettable that the Group of Experts had not made contact with the International Olympic Committee, which had its headquarters in Lausanne, and which had taken important decisions regarding relations with sports bodies in South Africa. He deplored the fact that since the positive result of the White referendum to decide whether the Government of President de Klerk would continue to negotiate with the Black majority to introduce a new constitutional dispensation, the Conservative Party and some White extremist groups still desired partition in order to perpetuate the anachronistic and barbaric system of racial segregation. He referred to the statement of Mr. Nelson Mandela at the headquarters of the OAU in Geneva last May 25, where he noted that considerable progress had been made, even though not all the proposals put forward by the ANC had been realised, particularly those concerning an interim government. But the oppressed people of South Africa were in the process of sitting down with the regime and were discussing the nature of the society to be constructed. This was a historic accomplishment that had become irreversible. It was to be recalled that the difficulties in the negotiations at CODESA II revolved around the majority required for adoption of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, and the division of powers between the Central Government and the regions. In every case, the Black majority had opted for a peaceful and negotiated solution with the acceptance of compromise to resolve differences. If the Government of South Africa did not respond accordingly, the ANC would use mass action to advance the advent of democracy and respect for human rights, in the hope that they would be supported by the international community. He pointed out that at the Pan-African Conference on democracy and the management of the transition held in May 1991, at which three governing parties and 57 opposition parties came together to try to end dictatorship in Africa, Mr. Botha, the South African Foreign Minister, asked President Abdou Diouf to mediate in an effort to resolve the deadlock at CODESA. He informed the Committee that the next OAU summit meeting in Dakar would devote considerable attention to the development of the political situation in South Africa and examine also the question of the drought which affected the countries of southern Africa. He expressed the wish to see the ILO strengthen the position of the rights of the trade unions, as well as their activities in the National Manpower Commission, collective bargaining and the tripartite economic forum.

15. The Government member of Nigeria expressed anxiety at the slow place of change in South Africa, and of the negotiations towards a democratic South Africa. The reluctance of the South African Government to take appropriate measures to end the township violence was a source of concern to the Nigerian Government. These developments ran counter to the view of his Government that the South African Government should be encouraged to continue its reforms, and it was that policy that had led to the visit of President de Klerk to Nigeria and to diplomatic contacts between their two Governments. The Nigerian Government wanted to assist the parties in concluding the negotiations that would bring about a democratic and non-racial system in South Africa. His Government remained committed to the emergence of a democratic South Africa, and would take all necessary measures to ensure that the South African Government was made to speedily complete the necessary reforms.

16. The Government member of China pointed out that the system of apartheid encroached on the human rights of the vast majority of Black South Africans, and this had resulted in worldwide condemnation. Substantial changes had occurred in South Africa in the past year, including the establishment of CODESA and the abolition of some apartheid laws. His Government hoped that this progress would continue, and that the opposition groups would be able to unite to deal with this crucial juncture in South Africa's history. The apartheid system was not yet dead, and basic political rights were still lacking. The Chinese Government would continue to support the people of South Africa in their struggle for freedom, and would continue to exert pressure on the South African Government to force it to abandon the policy of apartheid.

17. The Workers' member of the United Republic of Tanzania had been encouraged by the common stand adopted by the ILO Tripartite Conference in Harare, at which the main areas of ILO and other international assistance to South African organisations had been outlined. He therefore expected this Committee to spend more time discussing the conclusions of the Harare Conference and of the Group of Independent Experts.

18. The Workers' member of Mozambique pointed to the significant influence exercised by South Africa in the subregion from the time it had been a British Colony to the time it had become the Republic of South Africa. The neighbouring countries in the subregion had all become dependent economically on South Africa, even though the degree of dependence varied from country to country. South Africa had itself become an economic and military power and the most developed country in the region. It was appropriate to recall that the system of apartheid was created when the National Party came into power in 1948, a time when the whole world was celebrating the victory over the defeat of fascism and racism. From 1970, when Mozambique, Angola and Zimbabwe became independent, the apartheid regime launched an economic and military war of aggression and destabilisation against Mozambique and Angola, in particular, and against neighbouring countries in general. The people of southern Africa, supported by international democratic forces, exposed the apartheid system as a crime against humanity and thus influenced changes in the mentality of the White minority in South Africa. Even though the right-wing in South Africa declared themselves, publicly and officially, opposed to the system of apartheid, their forces continued to support economic destabilisation, the massacre of the population and the destruction of socio-economic infrastructures like hospitals and schools both in Mozambique and in South Africa itself. The violence in South Africa and in the neighbouring countries, which was perpetrated by the apartheid system, was designed to demonstrate that the Black population was incapable of governing themselves. It was evident that there was a need to maintain international pressure against South Africa until a non-racial society had been constructed. The speaker appealed to the ILO and to the international community to hasten this process.

19. The Workers' member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya expressed appreciation for the different efforts undertaken by the ILO, through its various bodies, to bring about an end to apartheid and to install a free and democratic society in South Africa. The Special Report was an exhaustive and important account of the ILO's activities. The speaker, like his colleagues, was concerned about the obstacles being placed in the way of efforts to eliminate apartheid and to perpetuate the privileges of the White minority who made a pretence of abolishing the system, while only attempting to give a fatal blow to the Black liberation movements, so as to prevent the creation of a free and democratic society in the country. All the data and information provided by the trade unions in South Africa, as well as by the liberation movements was credible and accurate and confirmed the attachment of the regime to its power. The data also showed that the authorities participated in violence against the African people to destabilise the country and the region. The apartheid regime found support in Western countries which claimed to defend human rights but which extended support, in general, and military aid, in particular, to the regime. The Zionist regime was also an accomplice. It was important to promote a dialogue among the concerned parties, and to respect the sanctions so that there could be a complete end to this despotic and racist regime. The Libyan workers reaffirmed their continuing and strong support to eliminate apartheid for the people of South and southern Africa. It was to be hoped that the conclusions adopted at the Harare Conference were implemented.

20. The Employers' member of the Netherlands associated herself with the sentiment expressed in paragraph 67 of the conclusions adopted at the Harare Conference, in hoping that Conference would be the last such Tripartite Conference held. Equally, she hoped that the present session of the Committee would be the last meeting necessary to consider action against apartheid. If an interim government were established between this session and June 1993, it would become necessary to consider the legal procedure to be applied. Accordingly, she suggested that the Governing Body Session in May 1993 should adopt a recommendation to the Conference declaring that there was no need for an Apartheid Committee to be established at the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference; the Conference could then declare the ILO Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa to be obsolete. In suggesting this, she did not intend that the proposal should appear in the conclusions of the Committee.

21. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran expressed appreciation for the Special Report of the Director-General, which had, in recent years, contributed to a number of positive developments such as the lifting of bans on the anti-apartheid groups, the greater engagement in national affairs of non-racial federations of trade unions, and alliances between the trade and labour unions. In addition, employers and trade unions had reached major agreements on wages and on other aspects of employment and social welfare. Recent developments in South Africa encouraged hopes for a peaceful elimination of apartheid. Some apartheid laws had been repealed, the release of political prisoners was continuing and negotiations had begun for a new democratic Constitution. Much still remained to be done to free the country from apartheid. In contravention of the proposed amendments to the Labour Relations Act, trade unions continued to be pressured and repressed, their offices were raided by the police and a number of trade union leaders had been arrested. Numerous clashes had occurred between union members and vigilantes and police, resulting in deaths of workers. The police had broken up legally permitted strikes and had sought to interfere with and hatch conspiracies among trade unions. As a result of the discriminatory policy in the country, employers had experienced instability in the economic and political system that created difficulties for the maintenance of their enterprises. The Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran believed that in order to accelerate the eradication of apartheid, the South African Government should release all political prisoners, refrain from imposing any restriction and repression on the people, lift completely all bans and restrictions on anti-apartheid groups and individuals and repeal all racist legislation. The Islamic Republic of Iran viewed the implementation of international sanctions against South Africa as a principal instrument of pressure on the apartheid regime; and accordingly, the sanctions should remain in force. In accordance with the ILO Declaration on Action against Apartheid and other UN resolutions, the Islamic Republic of Iran had severed all political, cultural, economic and sporting relations with the apartheid regime and had established close cooperation with the Intergovernmental Group to Monitor the Supply and Shipping of Oil and Petroleum Products to South Africa. Efforts were also made to strengthen and guarantee the implementation of the ban on the sale and shipment of oil and other petroleum products, by insisting that the purchasers of oil present discharge certificates.

22. The Government member of the Russian Federation expressed the hope that the Chairman of the Committee would enter into history as the Committee's last chairman; this would have been a notable achievement of the international community and the people of southern Africa. The speaker recalled that his country had already had the opportunity, as an independent sovereign State, of setting out its position in regard to South Africa during the debates of the Harare Tripartite Conference. This position was reflected in paragraph 28 of the Conference report. His country was firmly in favour of dismantling completely the apartheid system and of seeing South Africa proceed to a democratic non-racial society. Progress had been made towards the democratic transformation of the country and changes had been made in its political activities. The visit of President de Klerk to Russia had increased the possibility of further progress in the battle against apartheid. The active participation of the ILO in this struggle was supported. The ILO's position, as set out in the Declaration adopted at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, had reflected the actual situation prevailing at that time. That decision could be modified in the light of the present developments, in particular the process which was taking place in South Africa and the new attitude of the international community on this question. These efforts had been noted by the UN General Assembly in a resolution, in accordance with which action would be taken. Russia wished to make a positive contribution to the work of the Committee; it intended to press strongly for, and maintain respect for, decisions taken by the United Nations and other international organisations, notably by the ILO. The speaker agreed with those other members who had pointed to the right of the Committee to examine relevant detailed documents. The apartheid problem had to be examined in perspective so that a significant contribution could be made towards its complete eradication, thereby favouring the emergence of a democratic society in South Africa.

23. The Workers' member of China referred to the positive changes in South Africa over the past year, which showed that the country's people, and the workers in particular, had achieved a great victory over apartheid. The South African Government had abolished some apartheid legislation as a result of the unyielding pressure of the people and the vigorous support of the international community. Strenuous efforts were still required to bring about the abolition of apartheid. The majority of Black people in the country were discriminated against severely on the fields of employment, wages, education, housing and medical treatment. Their leaders were persecuted and their political rights were still denied. This situation naturally aroused the indignation of the South African workers and people. In November

1991, millions of South African workers held a two-day general strike to demand their right to participate in the policy-making process. That strike brought most sectors of the economy to a state of collapse. In mid-March 1992, many Black people held demonstrations in Cape Town and Johannesburg to demand their political rights. These instances demonstrated that the people have taken hold of their own destiny. The referendum on 17 March showed that nearly 69 per cent of the White voters favour the continuation of political reforms and the Constitutional negotiation. The 140 million Chinese workers and the Chinese trade unions have always supported the South African workers' struggle against apartheid. It was to be hoped that the South African authorities would remove all obstacles to the Constitutional negotiations and would settle a new Constitution based on racial equality in the very near future. ILO member States should continue to render effective support to the South African people's struggle for the establishment of a unified country of freedom, democracy, and racial equality.

24. The Workers' member of Namibia pointed out that the only deep-sea port in Namibia, Walvis Bay, was still under the control of South Africa and that the workers located in that area were subject to daily discrimination. It was hoped that the Committee would be able to address this specific issue. While there had been encouraging developments in South Africa, notably the repeal of a number of apartheid laws, there was concern that the situation appeared to have reached a deadlock. The economic problems of the country required attention: the present high level of unemployment would threaten the stability of a government of national unity. The speaker appealed to the ILO to assist in the formulation of labour legislation and affirmative action laws for South Africa.

25. The Government member of Algeria stressed that the struggle against apartheid had always been carried out simultaneously in Zimbabwe and in South Africa. The United Nations had exerted leadership through its Special Committee, on which Algeria is serving as Vice-Chairman, and had demonstrated its support to the national liberation movements. In the past few years, the situation had evolved in an optimistic direction, which the ANC itself recognised, and a climate favourable to the eradication of apartheid had been created. The speaker emphasised that apartheid did not only consist of racist behaviour: it was also a deliberate will to automatically exclude persons from society. ANC President Nelson Mandela came to Geneva to inform the international community of the reality of the situation in his country, as well as to warn it both about the precautions to be taken with regard to events and against the temptation to precipitate the relaxation of pressure on the regime. The lesson of CODESA II was that it was advisable to progress, but that at the same time maximum leverage should be maintained in order to act against the system and to avoid the possible evolution of the situation in a direction opposite to the one desired. Patience and determination were needed in order to bring results and not to let the country descend into violence. The political will to reach an agreement to govern the country would not be enough to lead it to democracy, and the incitement to violence, which had left many victims among Blacks, was a major preoccupation of the ANC. The speaker stated that his country endeavoured to be vigilant and to be attentive to the analysis of the situation in South Africa by the ANC and other well-informed organisations. The present consultations had come to a point where dialogue had prevailed, which could only argue in favour of the efforts to achieve a democratic order. The speaker insisted that it was necessary not to demobilise until the major problems had been resolved in South Africa and reiterated his country's support to the Black majority.

26. The Government member of Syria expressed appreciation for the Special Report of the Director-General which stated clearly that apartheid continued to exist in the form of 14 discriminatory laws that had yet to be lifted and social and economic inequalities that remained. In addition, the police were encouraging violence against Black people. He considered that the trade unions have played a very important role in the process of eliminating apartheid. His Government supported the conclusions of the Harare conference, and in particular conclusion number 11 concerning the need to maintain sanctions to speed up the process of change. It was also necessary to continue to monitor the application of the Declaration until apartheid was completely eliminated. He noted that sanctions may adversely affect the people of South Africa and the front-line States, but Mr. Nelson Mandela had called for sanctions to be maintained even though people were suffering. The ILO could play a role in assisting trade unions and other non-racial organisations by monitoring the reform of the labour laws and ensuring respect for international labour standards. For decades, his Government had not maintained any relations at all with the racist regime of South Africa.

27. The Workers' member of Cyprus noted that although some progress had been made in South Africa, apartheid still existed. The delay in bringing about the end of apartheid could make the country ungovernable. He drew attention to the report of the Harare conference, and in particular the contribution of the PAC delegate, which raised doubts about the intentions of President de Klerk, which in certain quarters were seen as aiming to ameliorate and beautify apartheid, to delay its abolition and to maximise the cost of overcoming apartheid. He urged the Committee to endorse the conclusions of the Harare conference, in particular numbers 10 to 13, and 25. The ILO Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid should be retained, and the creation of an interim government should be encouraged.

28. The Government member of Cuba associated herself with the statements made by previous speakers concerning the solidarity of her country with the heroic people of South Africa and its national liberation movement. The speaker considered it necessary to change the regime fundamentally, because although there had been some reforms undertaken that had led to positive changes in the country, the Black population still suffered violence and the workers and the most important trade unions were pressurised. For that, it was necessary to maintain sanctions against South Africa and require that the recommendations proposed by the ANC be implemented: those recommendations were to install an interim government and to set up a Constituent Assembly. Any ILO support and assistance to the workers in South Africa would be appreciated as well as any effort to strengthen trade unions and incite international solidarity. She declared that any step towards the elimination of racial discrimination would contribute to the creation of a united, free and democratic South africa.

29. The Government member of the United States began by stating that the goal towards which the Committee was working was a free and democratic South Africa. His Government expected an interim government to be in place before the end of the year. The question that remained was what the ILO could do to advance that goal. The report of the Committee should accurately reflect the progress made during the past year; anticipate and welcome an interim government; endorse the Harare conference's recommendation to permit ILO staff to work in South Africa; and adopt a positive stance in keeping with United Nations actions to eliminate apartheid. The United States Government wanted to see ILO staff inside South Africa working to promote free and democratic trade unions and employer associations which were essential elements in the creation of a functioning democracy. His Government was encouraged by the Group of Independent Experts' statement on the need to interpret ILO positions in line with United Nations resolutions. The United States approved of the Governing Body's decision to limit the mandate of the Group of Independent Experts and to possibly use those funds to support ILO activities in South Africa. It shared the concern of many speakers that the continuing violence in South Africa was a major threat to the peace process, and remained convinced that CODESA was the best forum for a peaceful transition to democracy.

30. The observer from the Government of Namibia explained that they had participated in the Harare conference in order to take a strong position on the issue of dismantling apartheid. His Government expressed its concern at the delay in bringing change to South Africa because South Africans had been subjected to oppression for too long. It was clear that the apartheid government had a hidden agenda, and that needed to be exposed. The South African Government had to be pressurised to continue the negotiations with the ANC and other progressive forces, and sanctions should not be lifted until apartheid had been completely abolished. In Harare his delegation had cautioned those organisations and governments that were eager to enter into trade, political, economic and diplomatic relations with South Africa, for if United Nations sanctions were removed it would give a licence to the South African Government to continue to encourage ethnic confrontation. The South African economy was designed to protect the interests of the White minority and there was no indication that the Government of President de Klerk was ready to share wealth with the Black majority. The ILO should therefore assist the people of South Africa to continue their struggle through their democratic organisations. He also reminded the Committee that the South African Government continued to illegally occupy the enclave of Walvis Bay, and to exploit Namibian workers under apartheid laws.

31. The Employers' Vice-Chairman introduced a number of draft conclusions that were to be considered in addition to those adopted at the tripartite conference in Harare. The Conference should express once again its strong aversion to violence and note with concern that violence in South Africa is still continuing. The Conference should urge the South African Government to implement fully the National Peace Accord and to take drastic measures to curb the still prevailing violence. The Conference should note with concern that the negotiations of CODESA II have failed to lead, as yet, to an agreement on a new Constitution for South Africa. It should urge the parties concerned to make every effort to conclude such an agreement and to set up as soon as possible a non-racial democratic interim government. The Conference should endorse the report of the ILO Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, held from 5 to 8 May 1992 in Harare, and in particular the conclusions contained in paragraph 62 of this report. The Conference should note with interest the decision of the Governing Body, taken at its 253rd Session, to extend the term of office of the Group of Independent Experts by one year, with a renewed mandate focusing on the monitoring of the implementation of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. The Conference should express the wish that all funds becoming available as a result of this decision be spent on the preparation of technical assistance projects as described in conclusion 25 of the report of the Harare meeting (May 1992). The Conference should note with interest that the Governing Body of the International Labour Organisation had taken note of the report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Committee. It should express the wish that the ECOSOC will follow up the implementation by the authorities in South Africa, in consultation with the parties concerned, of the conclusions and recommendations contained in this report.

32. The Workers' Vice-Chairman drew the attention of the Committee to a number of suggestions and measures that his group wanted to see included in the final conclusions to be adopted by the Conference. These were in addition to the conclusions adopted at the Harare Conference. In addition, the Workers' group invited the Conference to consider a conclusion based on the message sent by the Harare Conference to President Banda of Malawi concerning the detention of the trade unionist, Mr. Chihana. The Workers suggested that the Conference should call on all governments, employers' and workers' organisations, as well as the ILO, to make a special effort to promote the total implementation of the recommendations contained in the updated Declaration of June 1988 and the programme of action appended to it. It was imperative that the constituent members make increased efforts, including special information campaigns, explaining that the little progress made so far towards the dismantling of apartheid had been halted by the South African Government's reluctance to hand over power to the majority. The Conference should further express its grave concern that the South African Government had failed to take measures to enhance the climate conducive to fruitful negotiations as called for by United Nations resolution No. 46/79A on international efforts towards the total eradication of apartheid and support for the establishment of a united, non-racial and democratic South Africa adopted on 13 December 1991. The Conference should express regret that some governments had been too quick to lift some sanctions before major and irreversible changes had taken place as regards the eradication of apartheid. The Conference should appeal to these countries to re-examine their attitude and adopt new measures now that the process of dialogue had been blocked by the South African authorities. Maximum pressure, including sanctions, should be maintained on South Africa to guarantee the process of change, until the democratic trade unions and the broad liberation movement advise otherwise, with the exception of people to people sanctions involving institutions and organisations in South Africa which had become racially unified. In particular, the following sanctions should be maintained, in line with United Nations policy: the arms embargo and the prohibition of the supply of all types of technology and equipment, including nuclear technology, intended for use by South Africa's armed forces, arms-producing companies, or any cooperation with the South African Government in this respect; existing financial sanctions, including new loans and credits by governments and financial institutions, the IMF and the World Bank, whether to the public or private sectors; and the oil embargo. The Conference should call for all constituent members to launch campaigns to put pressure on the South African authorities to ensure the immediate release of the 450 remaining political prisoners, and for the unhindered return of political refugees and exiles in conformity with agreements signed in this respect. The Conference should note that the failure of the South African Government to take appropriate measures to end the violence had cast doubt on its responsibility as a serious partner in negotiations, and South Africa would have no prospect of peace and stability until the Government took stringent measures to demonstrate its determination to accept ultimate responsibility for bringing peace and security to the country by bringing to justice those destabilising the Black community by executions, assassinations, massacres and other human rights violations. All constituent members of the ILO should press the South African Government to take its full responsibility, as a signatory of the National Peace Accord, to enforce the measures agreed upon to curb the violence. The Conference should convey to the Government of South Africa a request to repeal the Bantu Homelands Citizenship Act which made people living in the so-called homeland republics foreigners in their country of birth. The total elimination of the homelands was a key component in the dismantling of apartheid, and the Conference should demand the immediate restoration of South African citizenship to all the peoples of Transkei, Ciskei, Venda and Bophuthatswana. The Workers' group wished to draw the attention of the Conference to the remaining effects of the acts of aggression and destabilisation that were committed by South Africa against neighbouring and front-line States, and noted that particular attention needed to be paid to a balanced and harmonised economic growth mutually beneficial to all countries in the southern African region. In this respect, the ILO should increase its support and assistance, not only to counter the destructive effects of the apartheid system in countries of southern Africa, but to ensure that there was sustained economic growth. The Conference should call on the Government of South Africa to dismantle every remnant of aid to destabilising forces in the southern African region and to work for mutually good relations with its neighbours founded on the principle of mutual respect for sovereign States. The Conference should note that investment will be needed to stimulate economic growth and job creation in South Africa during the transition and the post-apartheid period. Hence the Workers' group fully supported the democratic trade union movement in South Africa in developing policies and procedures for investors in the economy which would include guidelines on the use of appropriate technology and the preservation of the environment. Therefore, the Conference should recommend that a new, unified and comprehensive code be drawn up. Such a code should take into account the ILO's Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. The code should embody provisions on the following issues, among others: (i) employment creation, equality of opportunity and treatment in employment; (ii) conditions of work and life; (iii) security of employment; (iv) trade union and worker rights; (v) occupational and environmental health and safety; (vi) training and educational needs; (vii) development of science and transfer of technology; (viii) disinvestment; (ix) and mechanisms for follow-up action. The Workers' group believed that the process of political change in South Africa must be accompanied by a parallel programme of affirmative action to achieve a rapid social transformation. In this respect, the Conference should urge workers' organisations to increase their assistance and support to the democratic trade unions in South Africa to expand and adapt their education programmes to the needs of the transition and post-apartheid period. The responsibility for organising education and training activities should rest on the trade unions themselves. Training courses should also address issues such as racial and sexual equality, occupational health and safety, environment and literacy. Given the inadequacies of the current educational system, the neglect of the problems of school drop-outs, the effects of the job reservation system over several decades and the denial of skills to Black workers, the ILO should support the efforts of the democratic trade unions in the fields of technical and vocational training and retraining aiming at upgrading the skills for those already in employment and to match skills with employment opportunities and programmes to deal with the particular needs of the long-term unemployed. The Conference should urge the Director-General to respond effectively and rapidly to requests from the democratic South African workers' organisations for technical cooperation assistance including in new areas within the field of competence of the ILO on condition that this assistance does not constitute in any way a breach of the policy of sanctions. The Conference should reiterate its call to employers in South Africa to form a non-racial employers' organisation. The Conference should express its highest appreciation for the work carried out by the Group of Independent Experts whose findings have been extremely useful to the Committee on Action against Apartheid. The Conference should call upon all ILO constituents to reply in detail to the questionnaire in future. In addition, the Conference should call upon the Director-General to do everything possible to ensure that the Group of Independent Experts continues to receive the necessary financial and human resources to carry out its task satisfactorily. The Workers' group welcomed the report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association appointed by the Governing Body to examine the complaint of infringements of trade union rights in the Republic of South Africa, presented to the ILO by the Congress of South African Trade Unions in a communication dated 11 May 1988. The Conference should request the Director-General to take all appropriate measures to put pressure on the South African Government to implement the report of the Commission and thereafter to continuously monitor the effects to be given to the Commission's conclusions and recommendations. The Workers' group noted with satisfaction that the ILO had given effect to the recommendation made by the Committee on Action against Apartheid at the 77th (June 1990) and 78th (June 1991) Sessions of the International Labour Conference to hold a tripartite conference in and for the southern African subregion. The conference took place in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 5 to 8 May 1992, to review the situation in South Africa with a view to providing up-to-date information to the International Labour Conference in 1992 and making suggestions for further action to be taken in the light of prevailing circumstances. The conclusions of the conference had been very useful to the work of this Committee. Finally, the Conference should convey the following message to His Excellency President Banda of Malawi:

> The International Labour Conference, currently in session in Geneva, Switzerland, is gravely concerned at the arrest on 6 April, and the continued detention of Chakufwa Chihana, Secretary-General of the Southern African Trade Union Co-ordination Council, and for many years Secretary of the Workers' group on the Committee of Apartheid, and the closure of SATUCC offices in Lilongwe, Malawi. These are gross violations of fundamental human and trade union rights and the Conference demands the immediate release of Chakufwa Chihana, and for SATUCC offices to be reopened. The Conference also calls upon your Government to honour its commitments to respect human and trade union rights guaranteed under the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the Charter of the United Nations, both of which Malawi is a Member.

33. The observer of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC) made reference to the speech of the COSATU General Secretary who had questioned the need for the South African Government to spend vast amounts on covert operations during peacetime. At the same time there were crises in housing, education, health and employment that required billions of dollars to redress. He referred to the alarming levels of political violence which resulted in some 15 deaths each day, and wondered what the response would have been had the dead not been Africans. The PAC had supported the conclusion of the National Peace Accord in September 1991, but had not signed it as they did not believe that it could stop the violence because it lacked an independent arbiter. For this reason, the PAC had called for the establishment of an independent international commission of inquiry. Turning to CODESA, the observer from the PAC said his organisation could not accept the South African Government's objective of a drawn-out period of interim government. The deadlock at CODESSA II was only partly due to percentages and an unelected senate. As a newspaper of 22 May 1992 reported, the Constitutional Minister, Dr. Delport, stated that the breakdown of CODESSA II had not been about mere percentages but about basic differences of opinion over federalism and the representation of minority parties in the government executive. The Patriotic United Front set up in October 1991 had agreed that the transitional arrangement in South Africa should be referred to as an interim government/transitional authority, and he therefore proposed that paragraph 62, subparagraph 25, of the conclusions adopted at the Harare Conference be changed accordingly.

34. The Government member of Portugal observed that the Committee provided an opportunity for a solution to be found as to what future action should be taken by the ILO. The speaker indicated that he would take the opportunity to present the position of his Government, as well as that of the Government members of the European Community, at a later time and most probably during the deliberations of the Working Party. The aim of the Committee was to make a positive contribution to the position which would be taken by the international community as a whole. In order to meet that aim, it was essential to take into account the views of all delegations. The Harare Tripartite Conference had provided the basis for the work of the Committee. It ought to be possible for the work of the Committee to have a positive outcome, if regard were taken of the conclusions adopted at the Harare Conference, although he would need to reflect on the extent to which support could be given to all of these conclusions as neither his Government nor those of most member States of the European Community had been represented at Harare.

35. The Government member of the United Kingdom expressed some perplexity concerning the fact that the final interventions of the Workers' and Employers' groups had drawn very different conclusions as to the nature of the action to be taken by the ILO, whereas there had been a large measure of agreement on all sides during the Harare Tripartite Conference. The conclusions adopted by that Conference appeared balanced, objective, realistic and forward-looking. Participants at the Harare Conference clearly took the view that although it was premature to repeal the ILO Declaration, it was essential also to acknowledge the changes which had taken place since 1988 when the Declaration had been adopted. The Group of Independent Experts had taken the same pragmatic approach in its Eighth and Ninth Meetings, held respectively in March and April 1992. Problems obviously remained to be resolved in South Africa. It was apparent from CODESA II that a distinction had to be made between a stalling of the dialogue and its breakdown: both parties recognised that CODESA provided the best forum for future progress. Among the problems, many references had been made to the level of violence in South Africa, which was rightfully a cause of concern. However, there was no evidence to support the theory that the country's security forces had fomented the violence. On the labour front, the unemployment of some 5 million people, out of a workforce of 13 million, was by any standard far from satisfactory. In this respect, even COSATU had recognised, at its economic policy conference in March 1992, the influential role played by multinational companies in world economies; and while supporting the continuation of sanctions, urged potential investors to be ready to move into South Africa as soon as the conditions for the lifting of sanctions had been met. The political change sought by all sides needed to be underpinned by economic growth and stability. It had to be recognised that investment, training and other forms of assistance could not be turned on and off like a tap. The forward-looking approach in paragraph 62, subparagraph 25, of the conclusions adopted at the Harare Tripartite Conference was welcomed because that paragraph recognised the importance of the ILO making preparations now for technical assistance to be undertaken after the creation of an interim government. In deciding how the present Committee should report to the Conference, the speaker urged the Working Party to bear in mind that it would be as bad to ignore the real and substantial progress made towards non-racial democracy in South Africa since the Committee's 1991 meeting, as it would be to deny the continuing injustices inflicted upon the Black population. Appropriate pressure should be kept on the Government, but there was also a need to support positive efforts at this stage. Trade and investment sanctions would disadvantage the poorest people. This year, there was a need to produce a report with realistic conclusions which reflected the changes which had taken place in South Africa and which would therefore command the largest possible degree of support at the Conference. The credibility of the ILO could only be damaged if the Conference were to adopt conclusions which were unrealistic or which differed markedly from those adopted elsewhere in the UN system, of which the ILO was an integral part.

36. The General Secretary of NACTU paid tribute to the comprehensive Special Report that had been produced every year since 1964 to enable the International Labour Organisation to remain informed on developments in South Africa and on the activities taken by various trade unions, employers and governments against apartheid. The reforms which had taken place in South Africa would not have been possible without consistent and sustained international pressure and, in particular, through the role played by the ILO. It was important to maintain the existing measures against the regime, as an indication that the international community would not be satisfied until apartheid was eradicated totally and a democratic constitution was in place. While a political stalemate existed, created deliberately by the regime, the South African Government had been restructuring the economy unilaterally through privatising natural resources. NACTU saw this as an effort by the regime to ensure that even if political power was lost, economic power would remain in the hands of the White minority. Moreover, the regime was increasing the public debt by borrowing from foreign countries. This was seen as a deliberate programme to ensure that a future democratic government would not have sufficient public resources at its disposal to address the inequalities created by apartheid. The ILO should request Western countries not to furnish loans to the regime. ILO support was also desirable concerning the call made by NACTU and COSATU for the establishment of a national economic negotiating forum. Delaying tactics were being used by the regime regarding the granting of basic worker rights to farm, domestic and public sector workers. It was hoped that the ILO would call for the regime to implement the recommendations of the ILO Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association. NACTU had always valued the technical cooperation and assistance in the field of worker education provided by the ILO to the democratic trade union movement in South Africa; and it was hoped that this assistance would be expanded, consistent with the conclusions reached by the Harare Tripartite Conference. It was also important that this assistance be extended to the whole subregion which had borne the brunt of apartheid. In the light of changing circumstances, an Investment Code, which should include provisions of the SATUCC Social Charter and all other codes implemented in South Africa, would be an important measure. The speaker also appealed to the International Labour Conference to communicate a plea to the President of Malawi for the release of a colleague, Chokufwa Chihana, who was imprisoned for calling for the implementation of human and trade union rights.

37. The Workers' member of Norway associated the Nordic trade unions with the proposals made by the Worker Vice-Chairman. As the Special Report stated, a strategy was needed to deal with the realities of the present changed position in South Africa and to face up to future challenges. Though there had been some positive developments, the apartheid system still remained. The South African Government was responsible for the standstill in the negotiations. It was therefore important to put the maximum pressure on the Government to ensure both the creation of an interim government and the adoption of a new and democratic Constitution. In this regard, sanctions should be maintained in line with the decisions of the United Nations, particularly in relation to arms, oil and finances. Such sanctions and international pressure, in combination with domestic opposition, had led to the recent progress. The lifting of sanctions by industrialised countries, before the necessary conditions had been met, was to be regretted. The Nordic trade unions had long taken an active interest in the work against apartheid and had been in the forefront of support for the building of strong, democratic trade unions in South Africa. The movement was, moreover, committed to continuing its strong links with South African trade unions, so as to assist in the social and economic reconstruction of the country. The Harare Tripartite Conference had adopted important conclusions, which should be reflected in the report of the present Committee. They included the maintenance of pressure on the South African Government, the need to support the democratic trade unions and to strengthen workers' education programmes, the establishment of a tripartite negotiating body, assistance on employment and industrial relations matters and the development of an Investment Code for South Africa. The ILO had a major role to play in all these initiatives. The level of political violence was a human tragedy for which the South African Government bore full responsibility, and which it was obliged to bring to an end. The speaker called upon the Committee to join the trade union movement in its efforts to eradicate apartheid and to assist the people of South Africa in recovering from the effects of a brutal and repressive regime.

38. The Workers' member of Japan stated that Japanese workers, unlike the Japanese Government and employers, considered the work of the Committee to be important. Over the course of many years, Japanese workers had opposed the inhuman apartheid policy that prevailed in South Africa and had developed anti-apartheid activities inside as well as outside Japan. They had also put pressure on the Japanese Government both to impose sanctions and to continue to respect the international campaign to isolate South Africa until such time as apartheid was abolished completely and full democracy was realised in the country. In spite of those demands, and in the face of international criticism, the Japanese Government had lifted sanctions and had established diplomatic relations with South Africa, with the excuse that South Africa was in the process of democratisation. Moreover, President de Klerk had visited Japan recently at the invitation of the Japanese Government and discussions had reportedly taken place between the South African and Japanese Governments, and with the business community, concerning the strengthening of economic cooperation. The Japanese workers, represented by the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (RENGO) would continue to put pressure on the Government of Japan to fight against apartheid until an interim government, supported by the majority of the people, had been established, and until there was a democratic Constitution and elections held on the basis of one vote for one person. The democratic trade union movement in South Africa had made a significant contribution to the fight against apartheid and would continue to receive the support of the Japanese workers, as would the liberation movements in South Africa, through the ANC office in Tokyo.

39. The Workers' member of Venezuela concurred with a previous speaker from the Workers' group that the work of the Committee had contributed to the elimination of racial discrimination in South Africa. A foundation of democracy and social justice was crucial for the country. While the Government had shown a certain opening, recent events were not sufficient to ensure the elimination of discrimination imposed by the White minority in political, economic, social and cultural life. As long as political prisoners were being held and trade union leaders and social activists were being prosecuted, the Committee had a reason to exist. For the same reason, pressure had to be maintained on the Government of South Africa.

40. The Workers' member of Togo expressed the hope that the session of the Committee would be the last one, as this would indicate that apartheid had disappeared from African soil. The workers of Togo felt whole-hearted sympathy with their sisters and brothers in South Africa, who had suffered so much humiliation. This situation had to change. The workers of Togo supported every step taken by the international community both to assist the Black population and to establish a free and democratic government. In this connection, the ILO had an important role to play, particularly in the area of workers' education, as South African unions needed help to strengthen their organisations, and to become better informed and trained to take on their future responsibilities. The speaker supported the continuation of sanctions and expressed the wish that the ILO would show greater courage and determination in precipitating the end of apartheid. After its liberation from the burden of apartheid, South Africa should be free and independent, and so be able to take part in and contribute effectively to the economic development of an African continent which was rich in resources.

41. The Workers' member of Tunisia, speaking on behalf of the General Confederation of Tunisian Workers, was pleased to note the divergency of views expressed in the Committee, as it was an indication of true democracy when each respected the opinion of the other. The speaker was confident that the Committee was ready to do everything necessary to ensure that South Africa would live under the best conditions and show a spirit of openness. If the necessary conclusions were not adopted and implemented, the work of the Committee would have been useless. An atmosphere of trade union solidarity prevailed in Tunisia. National liberation movements should be assisted throughout the world; in order to provide such assistance, Tunisia had just adopted a basic law which would be implemented and which was fully supported by the trade unions. Apartheid needed to be confronted directly; it was a worthless regime, incompatible with justice and human rights. It was thanks to democracy and human rights that it should be possible to bring an end to this odious regime and install equality for all human beings of different races and beliefs. The speaker considered that countries developed only through implementing democracy and human rights. Apartheid was the result of a complex, as those without complexes were able to adopt a positive and non-discriminatory attitude towards others. The Tunisian workers had always supported freedom and democracy. The speaker stressed the importance of educating children who should be taught to abhor such a system and to take the side of freedom and equality. It was the absence of respect for democratic values that engendered underdevelopment. It was necessary to struggle against violence and against everything that was harmful to human beings. The purpose of democracy was the expression of different opinions that could be expressed without resulting in confrontation.

42. The Government member of Pakistan recalled that Pakistan had been one of the countries which had consistently opposed the policy of apartheid. Pakistan's policy towards South Africa had been under constant review as the country moved towards a gradual dismantling of apartheid. The overwhelming mandate given to President de Klerk in the March 1992 referendum established clearly that South Africa had embarked upon a process of political transformation which would result in the eventual demise of apartheid. Even though all the problems would probably not be resolved immediately, the dismantling of apartheid appeared to have become an irreversible process. These positive political developments should receive a favourable response. Despite the official maintenance of sanctions, a number of Third World countries had been gradually establishing direct or indirect contacts with South Africa. The situation had reached a delicate stage. Until apartheid had been dismantled, there was a need to maintain pressure on the regime and yet a well-considered balance had to be struck between the application of pressure and its release. The speaker expressed optimism that the goals of the South African people would soon be realised.

43. The Committee set up a Working Party to prepare the conclusions of the Committee. It was composed of five Government members: Cuba, Egypt, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Portugal, the United States; five Employers' members: Miss Hak, Mr. Hernandez, Mr. Cheshire, Mr. Amonoo, Mr. Chanda; and five Workers' members: Mr. Brett, Mr. Bjornstad, Mr. Lescault, Mr. Mpangala, Mr. Trotman. The Reporter of the Committee acted as Chairman of the Working Party and subsequently introduced its conclusions.

44. In presenting the Working Party's conclusions, the Reporter observed that, unfortunately, the draft conclusions of the Working Party had not met with the unanimous support of all Government members of the Working Party even though it used twice the number of sittings than originally intended for its deliberations. On behalf of the Employer Vice-Chairman, the Employer member of the Netherlands observed that even though the Working Party's sessions had been intense, a good atmosphere had prevailed whereby all members had been willing to compromise to settle a text. She stressed that the Employers' Group had discussed and fully supported all of the draft conclusions. The Workers' Vice-Chairman echoed the remarks made by the Employers' spokeswoman concerning the spirit of compromise that had characterised the Working Party's deliberations.

45. The Committee then proceeded to a discussion of the draft conclusions. The conclusions set out in paragraph 48 below were adopted with certain reservations expressed by some members. It was hoped, however, that after further consultations, the conclusions would be adopted by consensus. Subsequently, the government member of the Russian Federation proposed an amendment to the second sentence of subparagraph 2(1) which was agreed. There was a clarification of the terminology in subparagraph 2(5) (ii) as referring to the policy of sanctions adopted by the ILO, including that contained in the Harare conclusions. The Government members of Finland, Portugal and the United Kingdom expressed reservations concerning sub-paragraph 2(4); the Government member of the United Kindom expressed a reservation concerning subparagraph 2(5) (ii); and the Government member of the United States expressed reservations concerning subparagraphs 2(2), 2(3), 2(4), 2(5)(ii), 2(5)(v) and 2(6).

46. The Government member of the United States called for a vote on the adoption of the conclusions of the Committee. The Committee then proceeded to a vote which resulted as follows: 922 votes for the adoption of the conclusions; 20 votes against; and there were 60 abstentions. The quorum was 456.

47. A number of members of the Committee explained their votes. The Government members of Finland and Portugal stated that, despite the efforts of all concerned to reach a consensus on the conclusions, it was regretted that this had not been possible; and their respective delegations would give a more detailed explanation in Plenary. The Government member of the United States said that, in the light of the progress made in dismantling the apartheid system, the negotiations to create a non-racial democracy in South Africa and the evolving situation in that country regarding worker rights and individual human rights, the United States could not accept any reference to sanctions except for UN security Council Resolution 418 on an arms embargo. Therefore, the United States Government could not accept those references in the Harare Conference conclusions (paragraphs 10 and 11) that refer to sanctions against South Africa and the continued viability of the ILO Declaration and Programme of Action on Apartheid. The latter document, which called for continued diplomatic isolation of South Africa, the need for strict economic sanctions and the calls for disinvestment, among other harsh measures, was obsolete in view of the developments in South Africa. Given that the United States' Government could not accept subparagraphs 10 and 11 of the conclusions of the Harare report, it could not accept subparagraph (5)(v) that would have the ILO draw "particular attention to the maintenance of sanctions". The United States Government did not accept the assertion that South Africa continued to hold 450 political prisoners nor that there was not a free political climate in South Africa. The United States Government believed that the time had come to focus international attention exclusively on the need to encourage the negotiating process that has been ongoing in South Africa and to encourage the channelling of assistance to the majority population in South Africa. The Government welcomed and considered essential those many provisions of the Harare conclusions concerning the provisions of training and other assistance to the workers of South Africa. There was much of benefit the ILO could do in South Africa. Until all references to sanctions were removed and the other changes referred to were made, the United States Government was unable to support the language of the Committee. The Government member of Senegal regretted that, for the first time, the Committee had proceeded to a vote for the adoption of its conclusions; and he wished that the action taken by certain countries to fight the apartheid system had been reflected in the position they had taken with respect to the conclusions and the work of the Committee.

Conclusions

48. The Committee examined the Special Report of the Director-General concerning the Application of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid and other documents submitted to it, including the reports of the Group of Independent Experts to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid and the report of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, convened by the Governing Body in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 5 to 8 May 1992.

49. In the light of its discussions, the Committee invites the Conference to approve the following conclusions:

(1) The Conference notes with concern that the negotiations on CODESA II have failed to lead, as yet, to an agreement on a new Constitution for South Africa. The Conference further expresses concern at recent development in South Africa since the holding of the All-White referendum of 17 March 1992, which are not conducive to the negotiations called for by United Nations General Assembly resolution No. 46/79A of 13 December 1991. It urges the parties concerned to make every effort to conclude such an agreement and to set up as soon as possible a non-racial democratic interim government.

(2) The Conference once again expresses its strong aversion to violence, and notes with concern that violence in South Africa, in particular the tragic loss of life, is still continuing. The Conference is concerned that a climate of free political activity cannot exist in such an atmosphere of violence. The situation will remain volatile until the South African Government takes stringent measures to demonstrate that it is determined to accept its ultimate responsibility for bringing peace and security to the country. The Conference therefore calls on all constituent members of the ILO to press the South African Government to take its full responsibility, as a signatory of the National Peace Accord, for the enforcement of the measures agreed upon to curb the violence that still prevails.

(3) The Conference regrets that a substantial number of political prisoners remain incarcerated. Therefore the Conference calls with renewed urgency for all constituent members of the ILO to continue to put pressure on the South African authorities to ensure the immediate release of all remaining political prisoners. It also calls for the unhindered return of political refugees and exiles in conformity with the agreements reached in this regard.

(4) The Conference takes note of the report of the ILO Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, held from 5 to 8 May 1992 in Harare, and in particular endorses the conclusions contained in paragraph 62 of that report. (The conclusions are attached hereto as an appendix to this report.)

(5) Developments since the Harare Conference in May 1992 reinforce the need for certain action and assistance set out in the conclusions of that Conference. Specifically, the Conference is therefore asked to endorse the following supplementary conclusions:

(i) The Conference urges the ILO to increase its support and assistance to neighbouring and front-line States to ensure that there is sustained economic growth to counter the effects of previous policies and actions of the South African Government. The Conference further calls on the Government of South Africa to review its policies and actions in the southern African region in order to ensure mutually good relations with its neighbours, founded on the principle of mutual benefit for sovereign States.

(ii) In line with conclusion No. 25 of the Harare Conference, the Conference urges the Director-General of the ILO to respond effectively and rapidly to requests from the democratic and non-racial South African employers' and workers' organisations for technical cooperation in areas within the field of competence of the ILO, on condition that this does not constitute a breach of the policy of sanctions.

(iii) The Conference recognises the vital role of education and training in the transition process towards a democratic South Africa. The Conference urges accelerated skills training and education for the Black population; cooperation from employers; and flexibility in adjusting to changing needs. Further, this training and education should be conducted in consultation with the democratic and non-racial employers' and workers' organisations. The Conference urges the Government of South Africa to strengthen the process of immediate and rapid desegregation of all existing and future education and training facilities.

(iv) The Conference notes that investment will be needed to stimulate economic growth and job creation in South Africa during the transition and the post-apartheid period. The Conference, in line with conclusion No. 23 of the Harare Conference, encourages the South African tripartite bodies to develop policies and procedures for investors in the South African economy. Therefore, the Conference emphasises the need for a comprehensive code of investment for South Africa to be negotiated by the parties concerned in that country. This should be part of a broader economic and social programme.

(v) The Conference draws particular attention to the maintenance of sanctions as set out in paragraph 11 of the conclusions of the Harare Conference.

(6) Recognising the importance of the recommendations contained in the updated Declaration of June 1991 and the Programme of Action appended to it, the Conference calls on all governments, employers' and workers' organisations, as well as the ILO, to make all efforts and take such actions as are required to bring about the total eradication of apartheid.

(7) South African citizenship should be enjoyed by all the people of South Africa, including those of Transkei, Ciskei, Venda and Bophuthatswana. The Conference notes that the Government of South Africa is committed to the repeal of the Bantu Homelands Citizenship Act which made people living in the so-called homeland republics (bantustans) foreigners in their own country. The Conference conveys to the Government of South Africa with a sense of renewed urgency its request to accelerate the process of repeal. Bantustans constitute a basic subsystem of apartheid. Their basic elimination is a key component of the current process of the eradication of the whole system of apartheid. The reincoporation of each bantustan into the South African State is the sole responsibility of the central Government.

(8) The Conference expresses its appreciation of the work of the Group of Independent Experts to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid, whose findings have helped considerably the work of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. The Conference supports the decision of the Governing Body taken at its 253rd Session in May 1992 to extend the term of office of the Group of Independent Experts by one year with a renewed mandate focusing on the monitoring of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. The Conference recognises that the Governing Body will review its position, as indicated in paragraph 38 (b) of the report of the Committee on Discrimination at the 253rd Session of the Governing Body, and should the conditions then exist that would allow for the termination of the work of the group, there would remain a residual amount of budgeted expenditure. The Conference expresses the wish that, in that event, such funds be spent on the preparation of technical cooperation projects as described in paragraph 25 of the conclusions of the Harare Conference in May 1992.

(9) The Conference notes with interest that the Governing Body of the ILO took note of the report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association concerning the complaint by COSATU against the Government of South Africa. The Conference recommends that the Governing Body decide what follow-up should be given to the recommendations in the report following its examination by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. The Conference expresses the hope that the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report will be implemented expeditiously by the South African authorities in consultation with the non-racial and democratic employers' and workers' organisations.

50. In addition, the Committee recommends that the Conference should send the following message to the Government of Malawi:

> The International Labour Conference, currently in session in Geneva, is gravely concerned at the arrest on 6 April, and the continued detention of Chakufwa Chihana, Secretary-General of the Southern African Trade Union Coordinating Council, and for many years Secretary of the Workers' Group of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, and the closure of SATUCC offices in Lilongwe, Malawi. These are gross violations of fundamental human and trade union rights and the Conference demands the immediate release of Chakufwa Chihana, and that SATUCC offices be reopened. The Conference, noting that Malawi is a member of the United Nations and of the ILO, calls on the Government of Malawi to honour its commitments to human and trade union rights guaranteed under the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the Charter of the United Nations.

Geneva, 15 June 1992.

APPENDIX

Conclusions of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, Harare, Zimbabwe, 5-8 May 1992

Social, economic and labour aspects of subregional integration in post-apartheid southern Africa

1. Good relations should prevail between all States in the subregion, founded on the principle of mutual respect between sovereign States. The Conference calls on the South African Government to refrain from any actions which harm stability in the southern African subregion.

2. In southern Africa, priority should be given to supporting efforts aimed at balanced policies for economic and social growth, social justice, and basic human and trade union rights in all the countries, to the benefit of the whole region.

3. The Conference expresses the hope that – in line with further positive political developments in South Africa – the integration of South Africa in SADCC, PTA and SALC will be favourably considered by governments of the countries in the subregion, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organisations.

4. The Conference notes with appreciation the work of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council and calls on governments of the subregion to implement fully the social charter of workers' rights adopted recently by the Southern African Labour Commission (SALC) in Lusaka, Zambia.

5. The following areas should be covered by the ILO Programme of Action in southern Africa: (i) job creation; (ii) promotion of small business and cooperatives; (iii) vocational education, training and retraining; (iv) improvement of labour laws and upgrading of labour standards; (v) promotion of equality of opportunity; (vi) improving working and living conditions and organisation of rural workers; (vii) occupational health and safety; (viii) migration of labour.

6. The ILO should continue to support assistance to migrant workers in southern Africa and provide more resources to technical and vocational training and the creation of employment opportunities for returning migrant workers. Such programmes should be conducted in conjunction with trade union organisations of the subregion and particularly through the coordination and cooperation of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council. The governments in the subregion should also give immediate priority to the initiation of specific programmes providing job opportunities for migrant workers and provide for regular consultation and collaboration with workers' and employers' organisations in the formulation and implementation of policies affecting migrant workers.

7. The ILO should effectively assist the countries in the subregion in setting up adequate mechanisms for social and economic dialogue; for constructive industrial relations and for tripartite consultation and cooperation. They are essential pillars in the building up of national infrastructure, which is indispensable for the preparation and implementation of economic and social programmes.

8. The ILO should play its full role with the international financial institutions as well as with the national governments in the subregion, to make sure that the concerns of workers and employers are effectively taken into account and that their organisations are involved when programmes and policies for structural adjustment are planned and implemented.

9. The Conference urges governments, employers' and workers' organisations and multinational and national enterprises operating in southern Africa to observe the principles embodied in the ILO Tripartite Declaration and Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. In this respect, particular attention is drawn to the provisions in the Declaration on employment, training, equality of opportunity and treatment, conditions of work and life, safety and health, freedom of association and the right to organise and collective bargaining.

Recent development concerning apartheid in South Africa

10. The Conference considers that it is premature to repeal or revise the ILO Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa. It expresses the hope that future developments in South Africa will, in due time, make the content of the Declaration obsolete.

11. Sanctions should be maintained on South Africa to speed up the process of change, in line with the decisions of the United Nations.

12. The ILO should continue to support the democratic trade unions' struggle to extend basic trade union rights to all workers in South Africa. Particular attention should be given to farm, domestic, public sector workers and those in bantustans who continue to be denied basic trade union rights.

13. The ILO should continue to support the efforts of the democratic trade unions to ensure that basic human and trade union rights, such as the right of workers to belong to trade unions, trade union independence from government, employers and political parties, the right to resort to strike action, freedom of association and expression, are entrenched in a new South African Constitution and should urge the Government of South Africa and all political groups to respond positively to this demand.

14. The Conference strongly urges full implementation in South Africa of the principles laid down in the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The removal of all discrimination and the promotion of equality are of particular interest to the further development of a non-racial South Africa.

15. The Conference notes with appreciation that the IOE, PEC and their members have undertaken the effort – in line with the conclusions of the 78th Session of the ILO annual Conference – to convene a meeting with the South African employers' organisations, i.e. FABCOS, NAFCOC and SACCOLA. At a meeting which took place in Harare in January 1992, FABCOS, NAFCOC and SACCOLA "expressed their agreement on the principle of the creation of a unified and representative non-racial umbrella employers' organisation in South Africa able to represent and defend the common interests of its constituents while preserving their specificity and identity". The Conference expresses the hope that the creation of such an organisation will pave the way for the inclusion of South African employers into the ILO, once South Africa becomes a member State of the ILO.

16. The Conference stresses the importance of education and training so that the transition process can lead to improved working and living conditions, equality and social stability. In particular, the Black population should be able to occupy positions crucial to the building of non-racial democratic institutions throughout society. They must be equipped with the skills needed for an expanding economy, which should include basic literacy education, technical and vocational training and retraining.

17. Employers and employers' organisations are requested to provide adequate in-house training in order to upgrade the skills of workers.

18. The democratic trade unions have an important role to play in this area and have to be involved at the planning and implementation stages.

19. Assistance programmes on workers' education should be expanded and adapted to the needs of the transition and post-apartheid period. Maximum support should be given to the non-racial democratic trade union movement through ILO Workers' Education Activities. Assistance programmes should also be developed for non-racial, democractic employers' organisations.

20. The Conference strongly urges that measures should be taken to ensure that domestic and farmworkers and workers in the public sector are covered by labour legislation. This legislation should be in accordance with the principles laid down in ILO instruments.

21. The Conference regrets that the National Manpower Commission is at present not able to function in a proper way.

22. The Conference recommends that the creation in South Africa of a tripartite economic and social body should be seriously and expeditiously considered.

23. The Conference recommends that in this tripartite body negotiations be held on an investment code for South Africa, which could be part of a broader economic and social programme.

24. The Conference deplores the practice whereby the South African Government recruits skilled and semi-skilled workers, particularly from Eastern Europe and Hong Kong, as well as the preferential treatment and job opportunities given by employers to White immigrant workers even in circumstances where local workers are qualified and available or could be readily trained; in addition, immigrant workers are paid more than local workers, the latter being subjected to strict tests when applying for jobs. The Conference recalls the conclusion adopted in this regard by the International Labour Conference at its 78th Session (1991) (paragraph 64 (i)) of the report of the Conference Committee on Action Against Apartheid.

25. The Conference recommends that the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 1992) takes the following decision:

> The ILO should – in line with other UN agencies – prepare projects for technical assistance to South African employers' and workers' organisations, on the understanding that these organisations are non-racial, democratic and are willing to accept international labour standards. For this purpose the ILO should, in accordance with the usual procedure for consultation with workers and employers, respectively, meet with representatives of these organisations and consult with them on the nature and content of proposed projects in South Africa. Such projects could then be implemented after the creation of an interim government.

Twenty-second sitting

Wednesday, 17 June 1992, 10.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues and Mr. Mugalla

Tenth report of the Selection Committee: Submission and adoption

Original – French: The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda is the tenth Report of the Selection Committee, which can be found in Provisional Record No. 61. This has been submitted by the Chairman of the Selection Committee and contains only changes in the composition of committees. It is submitted to you for adoption. If there are no objections I will take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Let us move on to the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Mr. CLARKE (Government delegate, Barbados) – I wish to join with other delegates who preceded me in offering the President my warm congratulations on his election to the high office of President of the 79th Session on the International Labour Conference. I wish him and the Vice-Presidents every success during these proceedings.

At the outset, I wish to reaffirm the commitment of the Government and people of Barbados to the principal objective of the ILO, which is to secure universal peace through social justice. We certainly are appreciative of the assistance rendered by the ILO over the past years, especially in the important fields of human resources development, social security, labour administration, training, and occupational safety and health. This collaboration with the ILO has contributed significantly to the social and economic development of my country.

The Barbados delegation wishes to support the views expressed by the Director-General in his Report, Democratisation and the ILO. His views provide some useful insights for countries now engaged in developing the democratic process. Barbados is among those countries which share a long history with this process. I therefore welcome the new States which have recently embraced the democratic process and encourage them to work assiduously to ensure that they attain the desired transformation in their economies and societies.

The three items on the agenda of this session – protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employers; prevention of industrial disasters; and adjustment and human resources development – hold great significance for the participants at this Conference. Not only do they rest at the heart of labour-management relations in general, but collectively, and especially at this time of worldwide economic uncertainly, the impact of these triple difficulties on developing countries could be devastating if they are not recognised and early action taken to mitigate them.

Over the past two years the economy of my country, Barbados, has registered a negative rate of growth as a direct consequence of recession in the economies of our major industrial trading partner countries. As a direct consequence, Barbados has entered into an arrangement with the International Monetary Fund, aimed at stabilising the economy through the strengthening of the external sector. The programme also provides for a structural adjustment component/approach which will be undertaken with technical and financial assistance from the World Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank.

Invariably, programmes of this nature bring with them certain social costs and Barbados is no exception. We are already experiencing some of these adverse social effects, in that our unemployment numbers have increased and overall economic activity has slowed down. Because of these factors, there is now a clear urgency for a new direction to be taken to get the productive sectors active again.

My Government has long recognised that employers and workers alike have a significant contribution to make in the task of turning the economy around. It has therefore engaged in continuous consultation with the social partners to elicit their cooperation in getting our economy moving again. It is our firm belief that this tripartite approach is essential for success.

My delegation looks forward with much interest to the discussion on the agenda item on adjustment and human resources development. It will provide a unique opportunity for governments, workers and employers to share perspectives and experiences with countries which have implemented, or are in the process of implementing, structural adjustment programmes. We believe that the focus on education and training, in the ILO document now before the Conference, is most timely. My Government is now putting in place a special education and training programme, having as its main objective the upgrading of the quality, effectiveness and efficiency of technical and vocational training. This programme is structured specifically to meet the needs of displaced workers; we look forward to assistance from the ILO, especially in the area of retraining.

My delegation also believes that in the whole complex of training and retraining programmes, there is an urgent need to highlight the area of productivity. We have already approached the ILO for technical assistance in this specific area for Barbados and the Caribbean region, and we appreciate early action on this our very pressing request. We see the urgent need to reorient both workers and employers to the primary role of productivity, both of labour and capital, in achieving real growth in the economy.

The Barbados delegation also welcomes the discussion on the proposed Convention and Recommendation on the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. This discussion started at the 78th Session last year and since then the international economy has been subjected largely to further and rapid deterioration. The international recession has resulted in widespread insolvency, business failures and unemployment. The pressures created by these situations have a severe impact on all workers, but especially those in developing countries who have nothing but their wages to rely on for the maintenance of their families. The need to make adequate provision for the protection of workers is therefore all the more necessary and urgent in the prevailing economic circumstances.

I now turn to another important item, the prevention of industrial disasters. Let me state unequivocally that Barbados highly appreciates the efforts that the ILO is making to reinforce existing standards in this area. Discussion on this topic fortuitously coincides with the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, recently concluded in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in which I have just participated as Minister with responsibility for the environment. That Conference examined a whole range of issues dealing with environmental protection, conservation and especially sustainable development. Undoubtedly, the issue of a safe and healthy work environment must be seen as an integral part of the development process for all countries as it directly relates to and affects productivity and performance.

As you are well aware, Barbados is a small developing State; it has to be extremely sensitive to environmental matters, and must do everything to prevent or otherwise mitigate the effects of disasters, both natural and man-made. Our industrial sectors mainly centre around agriculture, light manufacturing and tourism. We must therefore be most concerned with any practices which may have a negative impact on our fragile ecology.

We are very mindful of the fact that all industrial activities have their associated dangers and potential for disaster. Indeed, the record of tragic disasters from chemical leaks and oil spills in recent times stands as a grim reminder to us that international action in this area by the ILO is a step in the right direction. At the national level, we have to plan carefully, upgrade our own awareness levels and implement training programmes to equip ourselves with contingency arrangements to deal with hazards at industrial sites, for the safety and protection of the human and physical environment. No less should be our concern for the plight of workers and the environment as a result of natural disasters such as hurricanes and floods.

The area of occupational safety and health is too dynamic to permit any feeling of complacency to develop. Developing countries in particular, which import both the processes and technology, invariably do not have the skills to carry out adequate monitoring schedules to ensure the proper performance of the imported equipment. My delegation therefore wishes to stress that it is vitally important that some measures should be worked out to supply developing countries with the technical assistance and the training needed for the establishment of adequate local monitoring capabilities. And here I must emphasise the need for the transfer of technology from the developed to the developing countries.

The Barbados delegation has noted recent developments in the ILO Caribbean Office located in Trinidad and Tobago. Specifically, we are happy with the appointment of an officer to coordinate and strengthen relations between employers in the region. We believe it is vital that the other outstanding concerns of the Caribbean region which have already been raised by my Caribbean colleagues be addressed at the earliest opportunity.

We in the Caribbean area wish to reaffirm our support for the activities being carried out at the regional level, particularly in the areas of employment generation and labour market information. We are well aware of the resource constraints affecting the ILO, but we wish to stress that the needs of our region should not be relegated under the guise that others might be worse off than we are.

My delegation notes the situation in South Africa. We confidently expect that notwithstanding the immediate difficulties, the dialogue will continue and a solution which is in conformity with equity and social and economic justice will be achieved for all races.

Finally, I wish to express my personal pleasure at being able to participate in this 79th Session and wish the Director-General and his staff every success as they go about their difficult task of seeking to improve the level of living conditions of all peoples.

Mr. CROSS (representative of the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations) – I am pleased to address this body today on behalf of 32,000 international civil servants. We appreciate this opportunity to present our views and receive the Conference's reaction. As representative of the Federation of International Civil Servants' Associations, I will be providing a view of the relevance of some of the issues being discussed by this Conference on the international civil service.

Staff members do not understand why it is that a renewed dependence on the United Nations system coincides with attempts to cut back staff salaries and strength. These actions lead staff to believe that their governing bodies are unduly influenced by political considerations brought to bear by a handful of the wealthiest countries whose leaders would rather not see a unified and strengthened international civil service. For, as we all know, a strengthened United Nations system is not considered by some countries to be in their best interest as it will lead to a weakining of their power on the international stage.

Staff do not see the United Nations system's primary role as a conduit of funds from wealthy to poor countries. Rather, staff promote the concept of a global community wherein each national participant has an equal say in matters that ultimately affect all. A nation's wealth should not determine the extent of a nation's influence within the United Nations. Nations, as individuals, are equal in voice and merit equal consideration. When staff see that political factors carry the most weight in decisions about their terms and conditions of service, they feel deceived and disappointed. The principles to which they give countenance, that they strive to exemplify in their work in every country of the globe, are betrayed by the body for which they perform that work.

Staff are too often accused of being concerned only with the "bread and butter" issues. Nothing could be further from the truth. These issues are merely the most visible manifestations of the underlying precepts of staff-management interaction – honesty, transparency, democratic process and equality of influence based on integrity, morality and justice. Some of our decision-makers seem unable to see the relationship between these lofty concepts and staff salaries and pension. Therein lies the difficulty. True leaders will work hard to transform principle to reality. False leaders manipulate reality to a politically expedient, and often times, self-serving end.

Unfortunately, what we are experiencing today in our deliberations with the inter-agency bodies, particularly in our sessions with the International Civil Service Commission, is leadership based on political expediency. ICSC is a powerful body; its recommendations are generally accepted with only perfunctory debate at the United Nations General Assembly. Consequently, decisions made by the Commission determine, directly or indirectly, the way in which staff will carry out their work, the levels of compensation for that work and the number and quality of people who will be available to implement programmes mandated by member States. Given the extent of the Commission's influence, staff would expect technical excellence and objectivity on the part of the commissioners, as ultimately their role is to ensure the excellence of the common system and propagation of the concept of global community.

Our experience with the Commission has betrayed our hope and trust in their ability to lead. There, arguments are made based on faulty data; correct data are manipulated to support pre-decided objectives; conclusions are not drawn through logical and democratic process; rather an "end" is simple "reached".

Yet, until staff are given the opportunity to negotiate direct with our employers, we must continue to make our voice heard in ICSC and try to awaken the commissioners to the need to uphold the principles on which the work of the international civil service is based. Our voice as workers is equal to theirs and our influence is also equal, for there would be no common system without the people who carry out the work. As individuals, we may each be expendable, but we would only be replaced by others who, after a short while, would also balk against the Commission's recalcitrance and intransigence. You see, the major characteristics of the international civil servant – integrity, idealism and dedication to principle – make it difficult for decision-makers to deceive us. Herein lies our strength and the source of our influence.

Our salary system is based on principles – enunciated by Mr. Noblemaire and Mr. Flemming – to ensure that our conditions of service remain competitive enough to keep us on the job and, more important, for our organisations to be able to recruit the best people. Just as they have lost sight of other principles, some of our decision makers have chosen to close their eyes to these principles. In word, they invoke the principles' names; in deed, they ignore the principles' content to reach a predetermined reduction in our salaries and pensions. Thus, staff cannot listen to their words but must see to their acts. We must work hard to counteract the deterioration of our conditions of service and show that we stand for those two principles as well.

As words alone have lost their power to affect decisions deemed crucial by staff, staff have chosen to act; it is for this reason that FICSA's member associations and unions have opted for a strategy of industrial action. I think this forum understands the need for workers to unite in an affirmative action to defend their rights. I am certain that each of you has individually experienced that turning-point when talk no longer suffices, when workers have no choice but to stand up and walk in support of their principles. When we as staff stand up to our employers, we are in reality standing up to the member States of the United Nations General Assembly which, in fact, determines for all of us, on your behalf, the common system's conditions of service. However, the way the common system works, we must stand up to many others first before reaching this centre of our labyrinthine system. Thus, any action which the staff feel compelled to take at the local level is in reality an appeal for your support for staff positions and for you to request your representatives to inter-agency bodies and the United Nations General Assembly also to come out in support of staff positions. In particular, staff expect the International Labour Organisation to be especially sympathetic to their views, as well as their strategy of industrial action and to speak on our behalf.

There are very serious attempts at the moment to cut General Service salaries and pensions; if successful, the cuts would be substantial. This would eventually undermine the ability of the organisations to recruit and retain the highly qualified local staff needed to carry out the Organisation's programmes. Staff in the Professional and higher categories are still awaiting restoration of purchasing power lost over the past 12 years. Further, the purchasing power of pensions of staff in this category has still not achieved parity with that of New York. This continued erosion of conditions of service affects recruitment and retention of Professional staff, and I think you know what this implies for the quality of work carried out in and for your countries.

Another important issue is career development. It is important to offer staff the opportunity to commit themselves in the long term to humanitarian work. The advantages are obvious. Stability of career offers our organisations consistency of effort gained through experience. At the present time, however, there is a troubling undercurrent. In times of economic crisis, management may turn to reliance on temporary assistance rather than fund a post with the accompanying expense of benefits such as health insurance, pension, etc. Thereby staff can be engaged temporarily with no prospect of career at all. We have seen this happen numerous times with projects that rely on extra-budgetary funds. Staff worry that this approach might be expanded and consider it to be detrimental to our organisations.

Career development entails not only security of tenure but also the assurance that opportunities will be offered to update skills and learn new techniques through training. Unfortunately, in times of economic crisis training programmes are cut back in the name of economy. Staff see this as false economy, a withdrawal of investment in their system's most valuable resource.

Another resource that is still underutilised in the common system is women. Percentages of women in our organisations are still very low, particularly at decision-making levels. We cannot still believe that women are indecisive. Our women colleagues must not suffer the indignity of such a caricature and mockery of their qualifications and aptitude for highly responsible posts. Our system must do away with the time-worn sexist perspectives that have deprived our organisations of the talents of highly competent people.

I would now like to turn to an issue that has not received the prominence it deserves. Recent news reports hail the imminent release of the last Western hostages in Lebanon. If this were only true. A recent list published by the Association for the Security and Independence of International Civil Servants indicates that five international civil servants are considered abducted or missing in Lebanon. The list details the situation of nearly 125 international civil servants whose basic rights have not been observed by 16 member States or who have been abducted by unknown elements. It is small consolation that no ILO staff member is on the list at present. As representatives of the population and governments of your respective countries, I implore you to apply whatever pressure is possible to ensure that the basic rights of international civil servants in particular, but of all the peoples of the world in general, are respected and protected.

In point of fact, as I conclude this address, there is really only one issue at hand – the excellence of the international civil service. Inherent in this concept of excellence is our organisations' ability to deliver top-quality programmes to our member States. You cannot ask staff to help your countries without also enabling them to do so through adequate support and financial commitment.

(Mr. Mugalla takes the Chair.)

Mr. FRISO (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – I begin by congratulating the President on his election and on the manner in which he has guided the discussions of the last two weeks.

The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions welcomes the Director-General's choice of subject for his Report to the Conference. It corresponds closely to our own priorities. Indeed, the role of free trade unions in the construction of a democratic world order was a major theme of our World Conference held in Caracas in March.

This is no casual coincidence. Rather it reflects the common values and objectives that for decades have united the ICFTU and the ILO in the pursuit of the indivisible goals of social and economic justice and democracy.

Trade unions are and must be advocates and practitioners of democracy. Our own structure, practices and policies are examples of democracy in action with which our detractors generally bear poor comparison. Moreover, the role of trade unions in the global process of democratisation of recent years, played out with courage in the face of cruel adversity, is something in which we take justifiable pride. The presence of President Chiluba at this Conference was a living symbol of the truly historic achievements of working people.

For it is true that democracy has made dramatic strides forward. But legitimate satisfaction must be tempered by the realisation that what has been constructed is fragile. That the formalities of political democracy, hard won and jealously guarded as they are, do not signal the end of the struggle for the ideals of economic and social justice and a better future for every person in every society. Nor do they relieve us of the obligation to prosecute it with vigour.

The architects of democracy have uprooted the criminal military dictatorships that disfigured the American continent. They have transformed the face of long-divided Europe. They are doing the same from one end of Africa to the other. They have written the prologue. And the role of the ILO is, I believe, to lead the way in writing the chapters that must follow if the book of democracy is to be completed.

Doors to progress, long held shut by dictators living in mortal fear of the peoples they held in subjugation, have been swung open, but real obstacles still prevent millions of workers from crossing the threshold of liberty to advance along the path of social justice.

Today whole societies, which have no wish to turn back to the cruelty, repression and failures of the past, still see no way to achieve the better future they had believed to be in reach.

This is the dangerous reality that together we must confront and overcome. The price of failure is, frankly, too terrible to contemplate, whether measured in economic and political dislocation or, more simply, in terms of massive human misery.

Let us be clear. Global interdependence means that we are all involved. If the rich of the North continue to turn their backs on the developing South, and if the settled societies of the West do not meet their responsibilities to those undergoing change in the East then they too will pay the price.

International solidarity is not only the guiding principle of the ICFTU. It is the common sense imperative upon which all must act in their own interests and those of others.

The need for action then is urgent and for this reason the Director-General is to be congratulated for identifying some of the crucial elements of the contribution which the ICFTU calls on the ILO to make.

He is right to emphasise the role of the ILO in assisting the process of establishing and consolidating strong, free and independent trade unions and employers' organisations. They are the preconditions for tripartism and are indispensable if the fruits of social justice are to be brought forth from the fertile soil of democracy.

He is likewise to be commended for insisting that the ILO should continue its efforts to influence other international agencies, notably the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. To have them understand that prescribed programmes of structural adjustment will bring intolerable social costs and simply fail if they are not reworked so as to encompass the ideals of this body and the expressed interests of the population to whom they are applied.

Yet I feel obliged to state that the Report before us says some things with which the ICFTU does not agree, and fails to say others that we had expected to find in a document of this importance.

By way of example, it seems to us both incorrect and dangerous to suggest, as the Director-General does, that countries subjected to totalitarian regimes today regard "the free operation of supply and demand in markets open to international competition" as alone being "capable of ensuring efficiently the production and distribution of goods and services" or that they regard "the market economy as (...) a guarantee of prosperity".

This line of thinking gives rise in the Report to a worrying underlying analogy – that positive movement along the political spectrum to the ideal of unrestricted democratic freedoms is mirrored in the economic sphere by transition to the unrestricted operation of the market. It is this false and dangerous parallel that the ICFTU is fighting to dispel and we would welcome a more careful analysis of this question.

The ILO has at its disposal a body of international labour standards whose application we believe to be absolutely indispensable to the struggle to ensure that transition towards market-based systems embodies the social dimension that is no more and no less than the definition of its success. It is crucially important that these standards, and notably those on freedom of association, are seen by each of the ILO's tripartite constituents as the valuable tools for social and economic advance that we know them to be. To label them as unwelcome impediments to the free workings of the markets would be simply to rob the ILO of its most basic rationale and to set it adrift of its historic objectives.

The ICFTU has every reason to believe that the Director-General regards the promotion and application of international labour standards as central to the ILO's role in regard to democratisation. They provide the necessary infrastructure within which market forces can be harnessed to social goals and entrepreneurial activities channelled to the maximum advantage of all sectors of society.

In concluding my speech, in which optimism and apprehension stand side by side, I am left with the uneasy feeling that to very many working people this debate can be of only the purest academic interest. They are the countless millions whose rulers have chosen the path of oppression over that of democratisation and for whom the most fundamental democratic freedoms are still an unfulfilled objective.

This month the third anniversary of Tienanmen Square massacre has brought further evidence that the regime that rules over the most populous nation on earth remains firm in its endeavour to deny the Chinese people their basic human rights...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Mugalla) – I give the floor to Mr. Wang, Government adviser, China, on a point of order.

Original – Chinese: Mr. WANG (Government adviser, China) – The speaker just now tried to attack the Chinese Government. We have to express our protest. The ICFTU is a very influential organisation. As leader of that organisation, he should not base himself on distorted information to attack other governments. So we have to express our regret and I would like to reserve my right of reply.

Original – French: Mrs. AHOYO (Government delegate, Benin) – It is a real pleasure for me to join those who have extended well-deserved congratulations to the President on his election to the Chair of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

On behalf of the Government of my country, Benin, and the members of the delegation which it is my honour to head at this session, I would like to extend my warmest congratulations to him and to the distinguished officers and I hope that under their authority our proceedings will be brought to a successful conclusion.

We are here once again in Geneva giving consideration to the Director-General's Report on Democratisation and the ILO which has been submitted for our consideration.

I very much appreciate the choice of this theme.

The respect of human rights, the fight against discrimination in all its forms, the transition to the market economy and a true employment policy based on the creation of viable enterprises, the primacy of social protection over social security, the strengthening of tripartism as a vehicle of development make up the broad thrust of this Report.

On this point I would like to express the gratitude of my delegation for the objective arguments advanced in the Report, as well as the relevant conclusions which it has reached.

However, allow me to remind our Conference that, as we draw towards the end of the second millennium, the world has experienced the greatest social, political and economic upheaval since the last World War.

It is for this reason that I believe that the subject of the Director-General's Report is so relevant, and this is why we must give it profound consideration because of the implications which democratisation may have for our respective countries.

At a time when Africa is opening up to democracy, tens of millions of people have laid all their hopes on the rapid development of democracy towards greater freedom and social justice.

Our rural peoples are still impatient, and in particular our young people are vulnerable, and workers' trade unions are demanding better living conditions.

It is against this background of sharp contradictions that the democratisation of our national institutions is taking place.

While we are convinced that only democracy can ensure the respect of fundamental human rights, we wonder whether democracy without financial and technical support can promote the integral development of our States.

But beyond these concerns, my country is among those which believe that democratisation is a lengthy process. Not so long ago it was almost trampled underfoot in Africa and it is a new phenomenon on the continent which requires a new attitude as it develops.

Democracy is a value, an attribute of the human race.

I do not believe that there is a democracy for the North and a democracy for the South.

However, one should recognise that each democratic movement, whatever its nationality, has its advantages, its constraints and its weaknesses which must be overcome as time goes by.

And this is why, as the crisis in democracy draws to an end and is accompanied by free elections and the establishment of constitutional institutions, the move towards a market economy, the emergence of the private press, trade union freedoms, the ILO must prove its ability and desire to adapt its structures to the new socio-political contingencies.

On a similar note, the ILO must try always to be the catalyst behind progress, justice and freedom by fighting against poverty and deprivation in all its forms to satisfy the legitimate rights of the peoples of our respective countries.

How can we promote and strengthen democracy in our African States while they are still so affected by fluctuations in commodity prices, and consequently, by the dizzying drop in their export income, and the chronic deficit in the balance of payments as well as overwhelming debt?

This is why, from this rostrum, I would like to restate that democracy implies social justice, that is solidarity and frank cooperation among peoples. As you know, the Republic of Benin has indeed turned a page in its political history since the National Conference and the democratic elections of 1990 and 1991. The constitutional institutions are working. There is free initiative and the growth of the GNP in December of 1991 was 3 per cent compared to approximately 0.6 per cent in 1990. No one doubts that the road ahead is long and fraught with danger, because our country, like most other African countries to the South of the Sahara, has very restricted financial abilities and enormous requirements, and still has to face many great difficulties.

Since our last meeting, despite the unceasing efforts of the Governments of our African countries to relaunch our national economies, urban unemployment and poverty in the rural areas is still a cause of great concern.

That is why, in the light of this increasingly critical situation, the international community must take tough measures to support the young emergent democracies of Africa, both financially and technically, if they are not to be seriously damaged in the short, medium and long term, thus thwarting our legitimate and final hopes.

Here I believe that the international community must, within a reasonable time period: provide the necessary logistical support to the nascent democracies, particularly in Africa; take necessary steps with a view to supporting employment policies at the national level to make the definition and application of structural adjustment policies more flexible in our countries by strengthening the social dimension of these programmes; democratise the policy governing commodity prices with a view to improving the balance of payment in our States; define a system for the cancellation, pure and simple, of the debt of the African countries; promote aid for training programmes; and strengthen the private press so that it can play its role in the vanguard of democracy.

All these proposals are an attempt to prevent Africa from continuing to be the weakest link in the chain of international interdependence.

As you know, the world has recently borne witness to certain events in South Africa, and I hope that the ILO will continue, as in the past, to use all its influence so that the process of democratisation in this part of Africa becomes a reality. My country will spare no effort in ensuring the progressive dismantling of the odious system of apartheid.

It is above all here, in this body, which serves as mankind's social conscience, that the suffering peoples can best raise their voices and speak of their pain, hopes and aspirations.

It is therefore my ardent wish that the ILO should remain a privileged forum of dialogue and international cooperation. The Republic of Benin, through myself, commits itself to making its own modest contribution to the building of a new international, democratic order, one which is fairer and more humane.

With these words I would like to wish every success to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

(Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues takes the Chair).

Original – Arabic: Mr. SAHBANI (Workers' delegate, Tunisia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is a great honour for my organisation and for myself to be able to address the various social partners and governments of the world at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Before addressing the Report of the Director-General and the Report of the Governing Body, I would like to offer the congratulations of the Tunisian General Trade Union to the President on his election. We are sure that his wisdom and experience will permit the Conference successfully to complete its work.

It is also a pleasure for me to speak to a gathering of people representing the dynamic currents at work throughout the world at this historic juncture, which is beyond any doubt one of the great historic turning points of humanity. In recent years, changes have taken place which have profoundly altered the aspect of our world, relegating dictatorships and totalitarian regimes which had oppressed their peoples to the pages of history. Perhaps the most outstanding of the winds of change that have swept our world during the past three years has been democratisation, which has affected many of its regions, in the north, south, east and west.

While some of the old democracies have quickly adapted to the international situation, the newly independent countries of the south have encountered great hardship reconciling the demands of democracy with those of development. The Director-General's Report is particularly timely this year, as it places the ILO at the very heart of this new worldwide movement.

I would like to take this opportunity to state that my country began a unique and innovative democratisation process in November 1987, which gathered all the democratic and popular currents of the country together with all its dynamic forces. Among the latter was the trade union movement, symbolised by the Tunisian General Trade Union, the largest popular organisation in Tunisia.

This change of course enabled my country to abandon the one-party, one-opinion system and to adopt a democratic, pluralistic system based on freedom and respect for human rights. We in the Tunisian General Trade Union believe that this innovative experience cannot be consolidated if we do not resolve our economic problems, poverty and unemployment. In this field, the International Labour Organisation should not limit its activities to the organisation of seminars and meetings and the adoption of recommendations. It should take measures to establish projects as well. Our experience has shown that economic and social hardship creates conditions conducive to the emergence of fundamentalism, while weakening moderate and tolerant social and political forces. Such a state of affairs can weaken or even destroy democracy and multipartism. We are therefore firmly convinced that, just as democracy and social justice are closely related, so are democracy and development. The ILO has a decisive role to play in the field of social reform, a precondition if democracy is to thrive. I should like to take this opportunity to invite the World Bank and the IMF to cooperate with our organisation in developing balanced and objective reform programmes, which give their due to matters of social concern. That aspect is indispensable if these programmes are to succeed and these countries are to remain stable.

The workers of Tunisia, who have fought for freedom and democracy throughout history, are again ready to wage a struggle for social justice, without which there can be no democracy.

Our struggle for political and economic democracy at the national leval should not prevent us from carrying on our campaign internationally. Today, it is a disgrace to see the gap between the North and the South widening day by day. The world economic order is unfair and does not serve the interests of the smaller peoples. Consequently, all the democratic and progressive forces of the North and South must stand united to create a more balanced world, with greater solidarity. If democracy can vanish owing to a lack of social justice within a given country, the same can happen at the international level if all peoples are not able to aspire to the same standards of development and prosperity. We want to live in a new world where peace reigns and the rights of all peoples are respected without exception. This objective appears out of reach to us because of the incessantly growing gap between international justice and international legitimacy. The credibility of the latter will suffer as long as there is a double standard applied to problems of a similar nature, such as the right of peoples to self-determination and the right to security.

We congratulate the Director-General on his choice of democratisation as the main theme of this session of the Conference. It will make it possible to emphasise this principle for which millions of people have sacrificed their lives throughout the world. Furthermore, it serves to strengthen the confidence of the workers and helps them in their just struggle for democracy.

In conclusion, I should like to address a very important question which is of particular concern to us as workers from North Africa. It has to do with the issue of immigrant workers, and particularly North Africans living in Europe. A few months ago, an historic event took place. Today, we do not know what fate is reserved for more than 3 million North Africans who are permanent residents in Europe. These millions of people may find themselves deprived of a fundamental right, the right of freedom of circulation.

I ask the ILO and the Director-General of the International Labour Office to make an extra effort to settle the question of these immigrants, applying the principle of equality, which is one of the cornerstones of democracy.

Original – German: Mr. THUSING (Employers' delegate, Germany) – Allow me, first of all, to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. It is a great honour, under his presidency, to speak on behalf of the German Employers on the Report of the director-General.

This Report deals with democratisation; and I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his choice of a subject and also – and above all – on the way he has handled it.

The Report shows that the ILO is fully aware that democracy and social justice are inextricably linked – and that social justice only stands a chance in a political democracy. But this relationship works both ways; in other words, democracy can only develop and be truly established if – and as long as – the hopes of citizens for more social justice are not dashed.

Let us not deceive ourselves that the process of democratisation can take place in isolation. It is undermined and jeopardised by the inevitable difficulties of transition, which for many people do not initially bring about an improvement but a worsening of their economic and social situation. People are impatient to have their needs met and their hopes fulfilled; and there is a danger that the pains of a rescue operation might make them forget their year-long suffering.

The Report by the Director-General identifies these dangers that accompany democratisation in a very realistic way; and the conclusions he draws for the work of the ILO are also marked by this pragmatism. He offers no pat solution to these problems but advocates assistance and counselling as a corollary of democratisation. Without wishing to enter into details, I should merely like to say that we see this as a positive sign for a new approach to the work of the International Labour Organisation. The energy and the means which were paralysed for decades on account of political divergencies have now to be used to stabilise democracy. As the Director-General's Report firmly points out, these "dividends of peace" should not be invested in a social Utopia, but used in a realistic way to make imperfect situations less imperfect and to prevent dangerous situations from becoming even more dangerous.

But one thing is the Director-General's Report – and another is the day-to-day running of the Office. Large organisations – like tankers – only change course slowly and the ILO is, by definition, a large organisation. I am not making a criticism but I would like to make a plea to all staff members of the Office, whatever their position: only with their work and their commitment can they contribute towards consolidating and maintaining the process of democratisation. It will depend on them, on their readiness to take up a new course, whether the ILO will be positive force of social progress, or whether it will be overtaken by changes in the world. I repeat: this is a plea and an appeal I make to them.

The Report of the Director-General allocates new, unusual tasks to the ILO. Commitment to democracy and social justice is no longer enough. Both concepts remain abstract unless they are accompanied by a commitment to a market economy system. And this, precisely, is the linking factor: only in a market economy system is democracy viable and only in an efficient market economy system can there be social progress.

The State, as a rule, is a squanderer of economic resources, which cannot thus be earmarked for social progress. An important task for the ILO would be to try to clarify the complex relationships inherent in the market economy, as part of its programme to support the democratic process. This is a new, unusual task; but it is not all. The ILO must also become the champion of private property.

The importance of private ownership of production, as a vital factor in a market economy system, is mentioned in the Director-General's Report. But as to its urgency, it is given less priority than other issues discussed. Yet, it represents one of the most difficult problems encountered in the transition from a centralised, planned economy to a market economy. Without the privatisation of enterprises, the market economy – and, in the final analysis, democracy – stands no chance. The idea that competition between state-run enterprises can be simulated has already proved to be an error.

I am fully aware of the tremendous difficulties involved in privatisation; and I am aware also that there is no standard recipe that can be applied to all countries. I also know that privatisation takes time and that it should not necessarily be applied to all areas of the economy. But whenever our sights are not clearly set on privatisation – clearly and in a decisive way – the chances for a market economy and social progress are lost.

Of all the conclusions that might be drawn from this statement, I should like to mention one. The assistance provided by the International Labour Organisation to employers' associations should first and foremost be used for the development of private employers' associations; employers' associations whose spirit and policy are dictated by state-owned managers cannot, by their very nature, be defenders of a market economy. In the same way that tripartism is dependent on trade unions free from State influence, so is it dependent on employers' associations which are free from State influence.

The ILO has opted for a new, difficult course. On behalf of the German employers, may I say that we shall willingly accompany the ILO on this course.

Original – Russian: His Excellency Mr. KEBITCH (Prime Minister of Belarus; Minister attending the Conference) – At this, the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, it is a great honour for me to represent my country, a new sovereign State, the Republic of Belarus, which has chosen to take the path of democratic development.

I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to these very high posts.

We firmly believe that your diplomatic and professional skills will enable us to reach the necessary compromises and be successful in our work.

We also have every confidence in a fruitful conclusion, since the ILO and the Director-General, Michel Hansenne, have done a great deal of preparatory work, which is a guarantee of success. I should like in particular to underline the relevance and importance of the Report Democratisation and the ILO and that on adjustment and human resources development. They are valuable not only because of the importance of the topics covered, for my country among others, but also because of the philosophical depth of the approach and the conclusions. Like the Director-General, we too believe that it is precisely democratisation that can bring about progress in our country and help us to fulfil our hopes for a brighter future.

We would like to congratulate the Director-General on his success. This session comes at a period which I am sure will go down in history as the era when many totalitarian regimes were eliminated, when the Cold War and confrontation came to an end and when many countries achieved sovereignty, freedom and independence.

Two years ago, the Republic of Belarus declared itself a sovereign State. But to arrive at that stage, the people of Belarus had to go through their share of tragedy. For centuries my fatherland, although it did not invade any other country, and since it was located at a geographical and historical crossroads, often became the battleground of devastating war. And this is why, in our Declaration on state sovereignty we have a clearly state aim: to make our Republic a neutral State and its territory a nuclear free zone. This is the goal which we are determined to achieve.

When we embarked upon the path to independent development we affirmed our commitment to the principles of the International Bill of Human Rights, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international instruments on civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights. The Republic's coherence to the pan-European process is, we feel, at a very important stage in our return to the family of European nations.

The Parliament and Government of my Republic believe that the cornerstone for democracy and democratisation is the market economy and this we believe is incompatible with a command type administration. We are firmly committed to the market economy approach. We have already created the legal and administrative basis on which to build a socially oriented market economy. We have passed the appropriate laws. We are working methodically to establish a State based on the rule of law, to share out power and to improve our executive bodies.

I would like to point out that in my country, like in other countries of Central and Eastern Europe, the transition to a market economy is very complex and full of contradictions. The greatest difficulties arise in the implementation of privatisation, in the dismantling of monopolies and in stabilising the monetary and financial system. Many problems arise because the rouble is still not convertible and a deficit in the money in circulation has at the same time been artificially generated. The State, furthermore, has a very heavy domestic and foreign debt burden and this causes a budgetary deficit and inflation.

Our situation is further aggravated by the fact that we have basically left to deal alone with the consequences of the catastrophe at the Chernobyl atomic power station and also by the fact that we have inherited an economic structure with a disproportionately large military-industrial sector.

Nevertheless, my Government has developed both a long-term and a short-term programme to enable us to find a way out of this crisis.

Under our short-term programme, we intend to move swiftly to improve economic links, to increase incentives, to convert industrial plants, to strengthen our currency and, together with our foreign partners, remedy the fall in production system.

Under our long-term programme, we plan structural adjustment for our economy to bring it into the world's system. We also plan to implement privatisation, to give civilised form to and expand entrepreneurial activity and raise living standards.

One of the most difficult tasks included in these programmes is to gain support for the programme from the people by achieving compromise and agreement from the various political tendencies and parties. For this, we need to overcome the psychology which has been cultivated for so many years – that of levelling down. You must remember that, even to this very day, nearly one-half of the income of our people was transferred in the form of wages, which had no relation to the fruits of their labour.

This is why my Government considered and still considers the radical improvement of the distribution system to be one of the major problems to be resolved.

Here, we are making every effort to deal with three interrelated tasks.

First of all, we are radically reforming wages, having moved away from a centralised system of setting wage levels and rates, now leaving such decisions to enterprises themselves – that is to the representatives of the workers and the employers. But our State expects the employers – and indeed this is something which is enshrined in our legislation – to observe a guaranteed minimum wage, ensure equal pay for work of equal value and to establish and observe agreed conditions and hours of work.

Secondly, we are reforming the entire social services sector, along with rules for the provision of such services, by basing their allocation not on the principle of equal distribution but on individual labour contribution. Thus we hope to bring to an end the phenomenon of social parasites and to ensure that there is social justice.

Thirdly, my Government realises that, in spite of all the difficulties which have arisen, we cannot afford to ignore the need for social protection for the most vulnerable sectors of society, that is the unemployed, women, the young, the elderly, and those unable to work, since what is at stake here is democracy itself and political stability.

To this end we must have a fundamental restructuring of our entire social security and insurance system. We have already taken the first steps in this direction. We have an employment service and a pension fund in operation. We are holding tripartite consultations, although I must say that social partnership is still in its infancy.

On the whole, the Government of the Republic is trying to resolve through dialogue the most pressing problems facing the population. This has gone a long way towards helping and forming the situation today whereby relations are on a surer and sounder basis.

As we reform our distribution system and in order to consolidate our reforms, we must create a completely new institutional framework. We intend to strengthen the role of the State in implementing a policy of social insurance on a tripartite basis.

I am happy to note that our relationship with the ILO has become greatly enriched. Our Republic of Belarus wishes to make full use of this international organisation's experience. In this connection, I would like to make a comment and perhaps formulate a request as well. In the light of the fact that a special session of the Governing Council of the United Nations Development Programme has taken a decision that the Republic of Belarus should be transferred from the list of donor countries to the list of countries which receive technical assistance from the United Nations, it would be very useful for us if the ILO could provide concrete assistance in implementing economic reform projects in our Republic.

The International Labour Organisation has been very receptive to the political and economic changes which have occured in the world. It is because it is so receptive that the ILO can improve constantly its work and take new, constructive initiatives, which account for the great interest in the organisation held by the countries and the nations of the world. I should like to congratulate the delegations of all those countries which have become new member States of the ILO and which have been drawn to it by this magnetic attraction.

In conclusion, permit me once again to express my very great respect for the ILO and reaffirm our readiness to do all we can to cooperate further with this Organisation.

Mr. MOTHAKATHI (Minister of Employment and Social Welfare, Lesotho) – Permit me, on behalf of the Government of the Kingdom of Lesotho, the tripartite delegation of Lesotho to the 79th Session of the Conference and on my own behalf to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to the Presidency of this Conference. We are confident that he will guide our deliberations to a successful conclusion. Our congratulations extend equally to the Vice-Presidents. We want to assure them all of our cooperation.

Allow me also to congratulate the Director-General for his concise and lucid report on democratisation. This theme could not be more timely because at this Session we welcome the newly emerged democracies from Central and Eastern Europe to our Organisation. We congratulate the new members whose presence will enrich and strengthen our Organisation.

The democratisation storm, which is sweeping through the world, has also touched my country. The military government had always maintained its objective of returning power to political parties through free and fair elections. I am happy to inform this august assembly that the Government has fulfilled its promise to return the country to civilian rule in 1992, because multiparty elections will be held on 28 November 1992. It is for us to ensure that there is smooth and peaceful transfer of power to those duly elected.

Last week this Assembly was addressed by His Excellency Mr. Chiluba, President of the Republic of Zambia, a living testimony that there can be peaceful transfer of power through the ballot box. Next door to us, our neighbour, South Africa, is in the throes of shedding the mantle of apartheid and ushering in participatory democracy for all. We want to wish them well in their negociation process through Codesa, the Convention for a Democratic South Africa, and express our hope that a full, non-racial and democratic South Africa will be readmitted to the folds of the world community and to this Organisation during the 80th Session of the Conference.

The democratisation process is not easy. It is full of pitfalls and setbacks. I am proud to say that although we were not able to uphold the cardinal principles of this Organisation throughout military rule, we nevertheless made further advancement. By the time we hand over power, we shall have promulgated a new labour code, which has not only consolidated the laws into one text, but has updated these laws and strengthened tripartism. We take this opportunity to express our gratitude to the International Labour Organisation for providing us with invaluable assistance in the drafting of the said code.

The positive developments with regard to the democratisation process are unfortunately not matched on the employment scene. As you may be aware, southern Africa has been hit by the worst drought in living memory. There is absolutely nothing to harvest. Hence we are faced with hunger, malnutrition and consequential diseases, particularly in the remote mountain areas where the need is paramount.

This problem of famine is compounded by that of thirst. There is simply no water for basic human and animal consumption. our capital city, which is also the centre of economic activity, is due to run out of water within a month's time. We urgently need assistance to bore water for consumption and build dams to store the water for future purposes. From the employment point of view, many wet enterprises have had to shut or dramatically cut back production due to shortage of water, resulting in hundreds of workers being discharged.

These problems are further compounded by the massive retrenchments of Basotho workers from South African mines. It is worth noting that Lesotho's economy depends heavily on the remittances of miners working in South Africa. These massive retrenchments not only create unemployment, but have a negative effect on the whole economy. The purchasing power of the economy is reduced, likewise the national income.

It is at times like these that this Organisation, and indeed its Members, should come to our aid and assistance, because we have got a point where we are not able to help ourselves.

Original – French: Mr. DUC (Employers' adviser, Switzerland) – I would like to express the satisfaction of the Swiss employers with the Director-General's very innovative report on democratisation, a subject dear to Switzerland. As the world changes the ILO must too change and adapt; this is of course also true of its partners – the State and governments, the organisations of employers and workers. In this respect the Report expresses good ideas with unusual clarity.

The formal recognition of the market economy as a precondition of social progress, the recognition of the fundamental role of the individual who is responsible for his or her own destiny – all of these factors should contribute to the democratisation that we wish for.

It is understood that in the general interest, this market economy must also include a social component. In fact, it is the only type of society which has made it possible in the advanced countries to have true social progress, not just empty words. We support the ILO in its task of spreading it throughout the world. We must, however, accept a logical priority: and its social ideal must also respect the freedom of enterprise, and its efficiency and profitability.

People often forget that before you can begin to distribute, it is necessary to create, and that a cake can be shared only after it has been mixed and baked.

Democratisation also implies freedom of thought and action, by the citizen as well as the enterprise. States grappling with this difficult policy must accord an essential role to small and medium-sized enterprises. These enterprises have to be able to multiply without bureaucratic straitjackets. Hundreds of laws need to be repealed urgently so that small and medium-sized entreprises may develop and play their creative role. Democracy must not remain a simple proclamation in these countries, with reservations immediately applied because of the fear of economic consequences. During a recent mission to an Eastern European country, I was able to see personally how civil servants, even though convinced of the superiority of the market economy, nevertheless longed for a past which gave them privileges, special rights and power over ordinary citizens and the economy. Many of them complained that they had to look after thousands of small and medium-sized enterprises which were badly organised and unaware of the sacrosanct rules and regulations, and whose managers often objected to the civil servants' interventions and, shockingly, made a profit. They missed the time gone by when ideology concentrated the economy into a few hundred dinosaur enterprises, with which it was easy to get along since the public authorities, the managing directors and the trade union leaders all belonged to the same party.

In fact this bureaucratic phenomenon, pushed to extremes by communist planners, dates back far longer than 1917 or 1945. In fact it originated in the feudal officialdom of the tzarist empire, in the rigid and proverbial bureaucracy of Prussia and in the former Austro-Hungarian and Ottoman empires. I am saying this in order to remind those who hope for a quick reform of the economies and attitudes through well-intended management courses that a great deal of patience is needed, for it is necessary to change ways of thinking which have developed not during the last decades, but over centuries. The reform policies advocated by the ILO will therefore only bring tangible results in the very long term.

The path leading to a market economy is fraught with obstacles. Even Switzerland, usually considered as a good student in the economic field, has not been able to avoid throughout the last 30 years inappropriate policies which clearly show the path which must not be chosen. While many countries of the world were dismantling their interventionist regimes and moving towards a market economy, the Swiss Parliament went in the opposite direction and approved economic and social legislation which hindered the development of enterprises. The result is that fewer young people become enterpreneurs.

The Swiss employers appealed to the authorities as well as the parties and workers' organisations to give priority to competitiveness. These warnings went unheaded and the consequence for Switzerland is that we are now suffering from recession. We need a radical turnabout in order to safeguard the future. Switzerland allowed itself to fall into the complacency of systematically protecting the status quo; this delays innovation. Moreover, it guaranteed social benefit above and beyond what is economically reasonable. The remedy will consist in the abolition of protectionist measures and useless subsidies, and a return to the virtues of the market and competition, effort and acceptance of risk.

The economic forces in my country nevertheless remain liberal at heart. They can play an active role in favour of the countries which are now democratising, and not only as regards assistance and credits, but especially in the fields of training and investment.

We know that the ILO is well prepared in this field and has vast experience at the international level. But in order to keep theory in check and to be closer to the "front", we would suggest that through the employers' organisations and the multinational enterprises, the ILO should also gather accounts of experiences, both good and bad, of enterprises which have gambled on the successful transition of the former socialist countries.

We would also like to propose that in setting up the policies of democratisation, more room should be given to federalism. According to Swiss tradition, true democracy cannot be achieved if the authority of the State is concentrated in the capital of the country. True democracy will satisfy the people only if the authority is close to the citizens, and only if they are able to control it where they live. We also have the principle of subsidiarity, in which the State limits itself and gives the citizens as much freedom and autnomy as possible, delegating many important tasks to intermediate bodies, such as employers' and workers' organisations. These forms of citizens' participation have been used successfully for many years in Switzerland which is a country with many different races, languages and religions. This system has the name of direct democracy and it has certainly contributed to Switzerland's prosperity, and its political, monetary and social stability.

Mr. BARAK (Government adviser, Israel) – Allow me to congratulate the President on his election. I am sure that under his guidance the work of the Conference will be conducted smoothly and successfully.

In reviewing the agenda of the present session of the Conference and studying the Reports provided by the Director-General, one could not help but be struck by the importance of the subjects covered to all our countries. ILO activities in the fields of human rights, promotion of equality and social justice, labour standards and employment policies involve issues which are of the utmost interest and concern to us all.

We fully endorse the theme chosen for the Director-General's Report to this session of the Conference, namely Democratisation and the ILO.

The Director-General outlines in his Report the means by which the ILO can and should contribute in all areas within its competence to the democratisation process. Quite rightly, the ILO's assistance is and should be channelled primarily to those member States which have to make the necessary structural adjustments on the path to democracy.

Another important topic on our agenda is contained in a Report prepared by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on minimum wages.

The right to minimum wages is one of the most important factors in the conditions of work and life of workers, the improvement of which constitutes one of the ILO's fundamental objectives and is indeed linked to the question of democratisation.

While reviewing some international instruments such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Report points out that the right to a minimum wage is recognised by these instruments as a human right. I believe that this has always been the attitude of the ILO.

In Israel we established the right to a minimum wage years ago. At first it was provided in the form of "minimum income" by collective agreements. Then in 1987 we enacted a minimum wage law entitling every worker in Israel, notwithstanding his or her nationality, place of residence, citizenship, or country of origin, to minimum wages amounting to 45 per cent of the average wage in the country.

The need for the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of the employer is another facet of the employment and social difficulties created by recession and by the severe economic problems which confront many countries, developing and developed alike.

In Israel the question of the protection of workers' claims in the case of the insolvency of the employer was dealt with in 1976. In the event of an employer's insolvency, workers' claims are protected by a privilege, to be paid out of the assets of the employer before payment to ordinary creditors, but not before secured creditors. Further coverage is therefore provided by a guarantee institution – the National Insurance Institute. Employers' insurance contributions are obligatory and cover all categories of workers, regardless of their nationality, citizenship, place of residence or country of origin.

The claims thus guaranteed are in respect of all debts due to the worker relating to the performance of this work, including, among others, wages, holiday pay, severance pay and contributions for social insurance.

In the light of the serious problems of economic growth and unemployment existing in the world today, I would like at this time to touch briefly on Israel's employment situation and my Government's programmes and plans to encourage employment and to deal with the increasing joblessness.

The coming decade presents a great challenge to Israeli society. In the last two years, approximately 400,000 new immigrants arrived, primarily from the ex-USSR, representing an increase of 8 to 10 per cent in the Israeli population. Immigration in the next few years is expected to continue, and this, together with the rapid increase in the working age population and the very high unemployment rate, coupled with the difficulties encountered in preceding years in setting the economy on a path of sustained economic growth, has resulted in a very thorough review of economic and employment policy by the three social partners – the Government, the Histadrut Labour Federation and the employers' organisations.

In the light of the conditions described above, the principal objectives of current economic, social and employment policy are: first, the stimulation of rapid economic growth, mainly through the encouragement of private investment, together with the reduction of public sector involvement in economic affairs, and the expansion of the country's economic infrastructure as a basis for absorbing new immigrants and preventing increases in unemployment; and secondly, devising short-term, stop-gap measures for the transition period by means of special educational and vocational upgrading and training programmes. These programmes include courses providing skill adjustment and updating, and, where necessary, retraining, the expansion of basic technological training for young people and the development of internship of semi-apprentice-type training.

Another component of the programme is direct employment promotion through the subsidisation of incremental employment increases in the private sector and institutions of applied research. A closely monitored increase in public sector employment primarily in health, education and welfare as also been proposed.

The third element in the programme are special measures aimed at assisting the most vulnerable sectors of the population – the long-term unemployed, elderly workers facing dismissal and unemployed workers in areas which have been especially hard hit by the current situation.

We hope that the measures which are being taken towards achieving rapid sustained economic growth, together with the short-term programme I have outlined, will increasingly lead, over the coming years, to a significant expansion of employment and will enable us to lighten the difficulties which will face us in the coming years.

Before concluding, let me turn back to the subject of democratisation. From a historical viewpoint, the democratisation process has been influenced by many factors, but the most important single factor which may encourage the movement towards democracy is peace that will, in its wake, divert resources from military expenditures to economic and social development; peace that can and should lead to regional cooperation and to its social and economic development.

The Middle East is an area of great potential, and regional cooperation can contribute significantly to its realisation. Peace can also be utilised as an instrument in the war against poverty, intolerance and social injustice.

Israel is more than ready to work towards peace in our region and to cooperate with its neighbours in furthering these goals.

Original – Arabic: Mr. GAZARIN (Employers' delegate, Egypt) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of the Confederation of Egyptian Industries I have pleasure in warmly congratulating the President of this session on his election. We are certain that his vast experience will have its imprint on the work of this Conference, leading to the adoption of resolutions that will fulfil our expectations. I would also like to extend my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents for their election.

I would like to take this opportunity, on behalf of the Confederation of Egyptian Industries, to welcome all the delegations which have just joined the ILO. I am sure that their contribution will reinforce the mission of the ILO in serving the cause of labour and workers.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General for his excellent choice of theme for his Report, Democratisation and the ILO. This theme closely reflects the recent changes and developments represented by the progress towards democracy in the international arena. We believe that democracy is an essential prerequisite for the implementation of social justice. Social justice, however, would be difficult to achieve without linking it to economic issues, including urban and rural development, increasing per capita income, combating unemployment and guaranteeing a decent job for every citizen.

It is against this background that the ILO, with its unique tripartite system has great responsibilities to take on vis-à-vis these rapid changes, and the concomitant economic problems facing developing countries in general and African ones in particular. African countries are experiencing great difficulties and undergoing structural changes. This responsibility is embodied in the need to increase material and technical assistance to these countries to enable them to cope with the problems caused by these changes, such as unemployment, training and retraining, the role of employers organisations and their contribution to such development.

To that end, we request the ILO to maintain and increase its material and technical assistance to African countries, without being influenced by the changes which took place in Central and Eastern European countries. We hope that the assistance to those countries will not come at the expense of aid to African countries.

I would like to point out here that the Egyptian Government was among the first in Africa to start to implement changes aimed at economic transformation from a planned system to a free-market economy. It has taken major strides in this respect in collaboration and consultation with workers' and employers' organisations. The outcome of this change was that the Egyptian private sector started to take positive steps to fulfil its role in economic development. The Government has also embarked on the necessary steps to liberalise the public sector, and has promulgated a law aimed at freeing this sector from government intervention which would constitute a transition period prior to the privatisation of state-owned enterprises. Such privatisation has already happened in the case of certain tour operators and a number of small enterprises in the provinces.

To face up to the possible manpower surplus, a social development fund, financed by international institutions and friendly countries, has been set up. This fund is intended to combat unemployment, to create new job opportunities and to train or retrain laid-off workers. I am glad here to mention the efforts made by the ILO to support this fund, particularly in the areas of training and retraining, the setting up of an information centre on Egyptian unemployment, assisting small businesses and in supporting our confederation to enable it to cope with its increased responsibilites. I have every hope that this fruitful cooperation will continue between the ILO and the social partners in Egypt, who are working together to foster economic liberalisation based on democracy, freedom and respect of individual rights.

Before concluding my intervention I would like to express the hope that the measures taken by the De Klerk Government in South Africa will be a serious step towards the eradication of the despised system of racial discrimination, so that Black and White Africans will have equal rights and duties. We also look forward to the release of all political prisoners in South African jails, so that all citizens can enjoy true freedom and real democracy.

In conclusion, I wish this Conference every success and we hope that it will produce resolutions and recommendations that contribute to reinforcing the work of this Organisation in its efforts to create a better future where freedom, democracy and social justice shall prevail.

Original – French: Mr. GLELE (Employers' delegate, Benin) – I would like to associate myself with previous speakers in congratulating all the Officers of the Conference and, in particular, President Nascimento Rodrigues, on his unanimous election which he has deserved in full measure. His election augurs well for the success of our work.

Now that democracy has been restored to its rightful place among peoples formerly oppressed by totalitarian regimes and dictatorships, now that the wind of freedom prevails over our continent and over Eastern and Central Europe, the great relevance of the topic before us at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference is to be warmly welcomed.

Democratisation is an ongoing concern for the ILO. It is the very essence of its mission to establish tripartism and social justice, goals which cannot be attained without democracy.

I shall address only one aspect of the Director-General's Report, namely democracy and structural adjustment.

Can there be development without democracy if democracy means government of the people, by the people and for the people?

In other words, every development programme must involve the people. We have very many examples to show that measures taken without the support of the people have been doomed to failure and have indeed failed. That is why structural adjustment programmes developed without those chiefly concerned bear within them the very cause for their failure. Indeed, over the decade that these programmes have been under way in our countries, they have continuously failed. Poverty has worsened. Development potential in our countries has been destroyed and social turmoil has become widespread.

A professor of economics at the University of Ibadan quite rightly stated at the 15th annual meeting of economic and social circles on 3 November 1991 in Brussels that these adjustment programmes, as designed and deployed, are surely merely a reincarnation of colonisation, as evidenced by the fact that the afflictions which disappeared from the continent a decade ago have reappeared.

This is the inevitable outcome of programmes in which man is ignored. This is why the efforts to democratise these programmes must become widespread; we are happy to note that such democratisation has already taken root with some of our development partners. The representative of the World Bank at the ACP/EEC meeting I referred to above publicly recognised the seven errors contained in these programmes.

Thus, it is very important that our Governments should pursue a course of genuine and full democracy by associating employers and workers fully in the design stages of economic and social development programmes.

They only stand to gain popular support for such programmes, in which the entire population would be involved. In developing an economic policy with a strong social component, what better assistance can our States hope for than that provided by the ILO?

In spite of this, there are still many pockets of resistance to democracy throughout the world, and especially in our continent. This is why we are happy that the ILO will cooperate more intensively with the IMF and the World Bank, as promised by the Director-General in his Report, to ensure that social policies reflect the concerns of the social partners.

As regards the development of employment, we believe that in a period of crisis and structural adjustment the creation and promotion small and medium-sized enterprises must be accompanied by assistance to enterprises which have not yet gone under. This would make it possible to reabsorb those left unemployed by structural adjustment.

Along the same lines we feel that those countries which are emerging from a long experience with a centralised economy need specialised financial assistance to jump-start their economies. The political and institutional environment, marked by a progressive establishment of a State governed by the rule of law in these countries, should encourage such efforts.

This implies that the problem of our debt should be reviewed with a view to partial or total write-off, and the establishment of a guarantee fund with the participation of our partners in development to stimulate our economies.

As regards the items on the agenda of the 79th Session, I wish to comment only on human resources development.

Human resources development depends on continuous training in the light of the quick pace of technological change. But this brings us back to the question of financial means. Look at our States labouring under a heavy debt burden and confronted with structural adjustments. What do we have left over for manpower development? Nothing.

Although the ILO is doing a great deal to help us in this field, we need even more assistance to achieve the neccessary improvements. We have a great deal of training to do, in particular in small enterprises, the rural sector and the informal sector. Also, we have to be able to help our manpower to diversify their skills in order to enhance their occupational mobility.

Social and professional organisations also have to continue to consolidate their training structures and equipment so that they can contribute to human resource development. It would be very useful to have assistance of all forms for those organisations, which are underfinanced and underequipped. Such assistance would enable them to continue with their training work.

In conclusion, democracy is not won once and for all. It requires a daily struggle because it is the foundation of freedom. Every freedom requires ongoing effort. There are still very many pockets of resistance to democracy on our continent. We must remember that democracy and structural adjustment are one thing, but mean little to an empty stomach.

Thus, without the necessary assistance from the international community, without the essential assistance from the ILO in developing social policies and structural adjustment programmes, democracy will always be threatened. It is one thing to help us to establish democracy, but it is another thing to help us to maintain and consolidate it.

Therefore we appeal to international solidarity to ensure that the Director-General's excellent ideas will be put into practice for social justice and peace throughout the world.

Ms. PEDERSEN (Workers' delegate, Norway) – Allow me to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference. The main theme for discussion this year is indeed the right one. Having read the Director-General's Report Democratisation and the ILO with great interest, I would like on behalf of the Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions to underline the following.

In assisting the numerous countries around the world that are in the transition process from a planned economy to a market economy, the ILO should bear in mind that the law of the market cannot be the law of the jungle, and the Organisation should assist in pointing the way to prosperity for all. The act of governing in a free democratic society is not just a question of administering public affairs efficiently. It is also a question of good use of democracy, inter alia, in involving the social partners in shapping the common destiny.

We fully agree with the view of the former Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Pérez de Cuellar, that genuine political democracy has little chance to survive without social justice. Indeed, democracy needs support from all quarters. Democracy and social justice must go hand in hand.

Economic efficiency is intimately linked to dialogue between the social partners. The important lesson is that the success of structural adjustment policies depends to a great extent on the dialogue whereby these policies are worked out and on the social measures accompanying them.

Fortunately, the political situation and détente now make it possible to effect substantial savings on defence budgets and to allocate these resources to social protection schemes and to investments which promote economic and social development that may meet real needs. This must be done without delay. What is at stake is not only the survival of the poorest but also the economic and political viability of both the new and the old democracies.

It is scarcely necessary to state that the social dimension should be integrated in all activities of the ILO. The Organisation must continue to work out labour standards and to help its member States to establish institutions that respect trade union and human rights and, above all, freedom of association and the right to organise, and to bring their legislation into line with these international standards.

The ILO must take a keen interest in civil and political rights, for without them there can be no normal exercise of trade union rights and no protection of workers. The enjoyment of trade union rights is closely bound up with the enjoyment of other civil liberties and the Freedom of Association Committee has always held that a genuinely free and independent trade union movement can only develop where fundamental human rights are fully respected and guaranteed. Surely, it is unnecessary to repeat that the denial of the civil liberties set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the International Covenant and Protocol on Civil and Political Rights makes a mockery of the very notion of trade union rights. The normal exercise of these rights requires respect for the individual's right to freedom and security, protection against arbitrary arrest and detention, freedom of opinion and expression, freedom of assembly, the right to an equitable trial by an independent and impartial court and the right to the protection of trade union property.

The ILO must take a keen interest in assisting trade unions to build up their organisations in the process of democratisation. The Organisation should continue to assist trade unions that are establishing themselves to reform their structures, to conduct their activities and to prepare workers' education and retraining programmes.

The Organisation should further endeavour to influence the approach of the international financial institutions and to accentuate the advantages of tripartite discussions in developing social cohesion and enlisting broad support for national development policies.

The ILO should continue to assist in the planning of the policies and programmes that mitigate the social costs in times of transition and restructuring and protect those in the most difficult circumstances.

The ILO should also continue to develop international labour standards on the working environment, security, health and safety at the workplace and to assist member countries in implementing them. It must also continue to support efforts to eliminate discrimination in all its forms. This includes promoting equality between men and women in employment and occupation, as well as the development of human resources. In this connection one should bear in mind that women suffer all kinds of disadvantages, and are frequently victims of discrimination. They are far from enjoying the consideration and respect which their work and their role in society deserves. The ILO should support women's initiatives to unite and to play their appropriate role in trade unions and in employers' organisations and in the society as a whole.

Last but not least the Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions would like to see ILO efforts made to increase efficiency within the Organisation, also through closer cooperation between different departments within the ILO, and through further decentralisation of the Organisation and its activities from the headquarters in Geneva to the regional and national offices.

Original – Spanish: Mr. PINZON SALAZAR (Workers' delegate, Guatemala) – To speak from this forum to express the opinions, feelings and aspirations of the working class of my country, Guatemala, concerning the Report of the Director-General on Democratisation and the ILO is a challenge to all the bitter truths which must be spoken about the internal and external obstacles of those who have sabotaged or conspired against the process of democratisation which began in the eighties.

At a time when well-known economic, political, cultural and ideological interests and forces are developing strategies, tactics and policies to diminish and wipe out the little space which has been won for democratisation in Guatemala, it is good to see the ILO, through the Director-General's Report, tackling the issue and to be given an opportunity to reflect on these matters which may help us correct and redirect the paths being taken by our countries. Such paths will, we believe, inevitably lead to the collapse of democracy. The Central Workers' Organisation of Guatemala, an organisation which I represent, and other organisations of civil society in Guatemala have all borne their share of grief, anguish, desperation and death in order to move towards real or authentic democracy, as the Director-General has called it, to which we the workers and the people in general aspire.

This is why it is a duty, an obligation and a challenge, as I have already said, to express our feelings on this issue, to be consistent with what we are, what we think and what we do. The 1960s and 1970s, with the development of the method of guerrilla warfare and the doctrine of national security, believed and on more than one occasion affirmed that the solution to the problems, be they economic, social, cultural, political, of our countries was to be found in the barrel of a gun or a machine-gun. Such statements led to the development of dictatorial regimes for many decades.

However, the free democratic calling of our people has gradually shaken off the yoke of arms and dictatorships and is moving towards a commonwealth of nations of Latin America and the world in order to find, in a democratic, civilised and intelligent way, a solution to the interrelated problems which beset us. But barely six years from the establishment of formal and representative democracy in Guatemala, once again the shadow of the long dark night of the past looms ahead.

The drums of war and much wrong-doing of the past continue to sound. Until we set our own house in order and achieve the integrity and transparency to which the Report of the Director-General refers, then many aspects of national life will leave much to be desired.

Within civil society, and more particularly in the working class, there is a feeling of distrust, fear, doubt and frustration.

The theory, promises and speeches of those who have governed the destiny of our country and those who possess the means of production are totally out of keeping with reality and the hopes and interests of the workers and the majority of the people.

Thus, as I have said, for these reasons it is good to see that the Director-General of the ILO refers to the issue of democratisation out of his own concern for the destiny of this system of democracy in the "civilised" world.

I must say that our main challenge today is for all of us to manage to redefine what we want from and what we mean by democracy, and that includes the ILO.

Mankind depends on the society to which he belongs and the economic, social and cultural, political, ethical and moral forces which govern the society where he lives. In Guatemala, for example, what democracy are we talking about when those who guide the fate of the nation continue to lie, to deceive and to blackmail the majority? When there is no political will to change and control corruption, impunity and speculation? When the abuse of individual, social, economic, political and organisational human rights is part of the daily routine in the country?

When the independence of the powers of the State exists only on paper, or when it favours the interests of minority influential economic, political or social sectors?

When critical poverty and deprivation affect the majority of the people (more than 80 per cent) and the luxury and opulence of the minority serves only to widen the breach of inequalities between our society?

When we suffer from the employers' strategy (be they public or private) to confront and destroy trade union organisations and the workers in their just despair and who through loss of faith and credibility in the laws and those who apply them, turn to civil action, acts of peaceful resistance, such as the march of the workers and the peasants over more than 250 kilometres and their occupation of Central Park for more than two months in order to claim respect for the law, and when there is no national authority or human sensitivity on the part of the employers to resolve disputes conflicts?

When because of the systematic persecution, repression and division of the unions and the Guatemalan labour organisations have turned to the ILO to denounce violations of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and others and when more than a year after the submission of these complaints and documentary proof of their validity, the Committee on Freedom of Association, in paragraph 12 of its 283rd Report, states that: "despite the time which has elapsed since the presentation of these complaints, it has not received the Government's observations"?

When the Government replies, if indeed it does, we are convinced that many unions will have disappeared and the ILO will continue with the same procedures and will continue to wait! What democracy are we talking of when we are obedient, dependent and subject to the policies of the IMF, the World Bank and others institutions and when the Government continues implacably to apply neo-liberal principles and their adjustment programmes, without heed to the social, economic, ethic and moral moral implications for the majority?

This is the cancer which is eating away at the heart of democracy in our country. But as we have said, it is a challenge and a moral obligation to denounce this situation, although this may not be to the liking of some. But our societies cannot and should not continue to be governed by particular sectarian, hegemonistic and monopolistic interests.

This could be called almost anything but democracy. We must stop on our path and we must try to see how we can rebuild the democratic system to protect and defend the "lives of all" and not just those of a select and privileged minority.

I repeat: what democracy are we talking of? For how long will the poor, the weak and the isolated have to bear this situation?

It is a good thing indeed that the Director-General has tackled the issue of democratisation but we are convinced that this will not suffice. This is something which must be of importance to us all.

For our part, the people of Guatemala and the workers of Guatemala have for many years been doing our utmost, and we have borne our share of deaths. But we are even more determined to continue. We are alert and will participate in the upholding of our achievements and make our contribution to change and correct the errors and shortcomings of representative and imperfect democracy such as we know it.

We are furthermore convinced that the imperfections, errors and weaknesses of this democracy can be overcome and corrected only with greater democracy.

Any other pretext to return to our nefarious past is worthy of the most energetic denouncement and rejection.

I firmly believe that the ILO can do a great deal to assist us in overcoming these problems experienced in the democratisation process and one of the first contributions could be to commit itself to the ideas and suggestions emerging from discussion of the Director-General's memorandum.

For example, by encouraging the organisation of meetings and seminars or workshops, so that civil society can say what kind of democracy it wants and needs for the society which we have.

In the face of these attitudes, behaviours and conspiracies against democracy we must promote the bold and visionary establishment of the "positive civil conspiracy", as it was called by the President of the Chapter of the Club of Rome in Spain, or, as Teilhard de Chardin said many years ago "a conspiracy of love" to save our continent.

We can all speak on this.

By way of conclusion, I should like to quote a passage on democracy which John Paul II included in his Encyclical Letter Centisimus Annus: "Following the collapse of Communist totalitarianism and of many other totalitarian and "national security" regimes, today we are witnessing a predominance, not without signs of opposition, of the democratic ideal, together with lively attention to and concern for human rights. But for this very reason it is necessary for peoples in the process of reforming their systems to give democracy an authentic and solid foundation".

Original – French: Mr. ADJANOHOUN (Workers' delegate, Benin) – I should like, on behalf of the workers of my country, the Republic of Benin, and of their trade union organisations, to bring greetings to this Conference and add my voice to all those who, rightly, rejoiced in the brilliant and unanimous election of the President and the other Officers of the Conference, which constitutes to my mind a sure guarantee of the success of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I also address my congratulations to the Director-General and his collaborators for the perfect organisation of the present Session, and for the excellent quality of the documents they have made available.

To affirm that the workers of my country, more than anyone, have quite exceptional reasons for appreciating so highly the central theme of the present Session of the International Labour Conference is neither exaggeration nor sectarism. Indeed, more than anyone else, on account of their sad experience of fierce dictatorship, they will tell you that freedom has no price. Yes, along the road towards the conquest of liberty, they sacrificed everything to make a final victorious assault on the impregnable fortress of democracy. You will now surely understand why the workers of Benin are most happy and interested to accept the Director-General's invitation to give serious consideration during this present Session to the issue of Democratisation and the ILO.

Indeed, the great changes which are taking place throughout the world, the real possibilities of satisfying the legitimate aspirations of the workers and the peoples to more democracy, the end of the cold war, and thus of the ideological blocs, are all favourable and objective conditions for the effective implementation of the fundamental objectives of the International Labour Organisation and the main principles which guide its action: that is to say, social justice, freedom, equality and the protection of fundamental human rights. Those are the essential characteristics of a true and genuine democracy.

It is good to note that almost everywhere in the world today, and especially in our continent of Africa, a wind of democratic renewal is blowing. The artisans of this renewal are the workers, mobilised and organised in their unions, in perfect symbiosis with other social structures so that side by side, with a common front, they can give shape to their hopes for a better life. In Benin, the sovereign people, having recourse to their creative potential, have been able to set up, without bloodshed, a democratic regime led by a Government for renewal. It goes without saying that in such a context freedom of association, freedom of expression, of movement, and the protection of fundamental human rights are solidly installed and constitute an achievement for the workers and the entire population, an achievement equalled only by the importance attached to it in daily life by every citizen of Benin, man or woman, and for which no sacrifice will be too great.

However, in spite of our determination, the unfavourable regional and international environment multiplies the difficulties along our way which, if we are not careful, will ultimately threaten democratic reform. First and foremost among these is the programme of structural adjustment, said to be an inevitable and obligatory stage. The negative consequences of this results according to the report by the Economic Commission of the United Nations for Africa published in 1985, from conditions imposed by the IMF for the granting of loans and credits: devaluation of currency, ceilings for limitation of state expenditure, public debt, credits, internal and external loans, increased rates of tax and interest, elimination of tariff controls, employment and salary restrictions in the public sector, etc.

In spite of all the privations, the sacrifices, the workers are convinced that the macroeconomic and financial balance promised by the programme cannot be attained and the problem still remains to be solved.

This state of affairs naturally leads to massive cutbacks in the workforce and so to unemployment, and to permanent pressure on employment and loss of purchasing power for wage-earners. It is evident that such phenomena are part and parcel of the global strategy of the present monetary and economic order whose survival depends on maintaining the developing countries in an absolute dependency, which justifies to a great extent the drastic conditions applied by the IMF in granting credit. Consequently this institution creates, sustains and amplifies African debt. Today, my country, Benin, suffers under the burden of 600 milliards of debts within the general framework of Africa's debt crisis which is itself linked to the international crisis and the deficiency of the monetary system. It is often said that the cause of this phenomenon is due exclusively to endogenous factors, that is to say, to bad management of the available resources, corruption, misappropriation and other illegal practices.

Although I do not deny the importance and seriousness of internal factors which aggravate the problem, I think that at this point we can and will master them, provided that our governments have the political will to do so. As far as the exogenous factors, such as the international economic crisis and the world monetary system, which are the by-products of today's economic and monetary order, are concerned, they are beyond our influence and therefore we have no way of controlling them. Otherwise how could we explain that nobody asks our opinion when fixing the prices of our basic commodities on the world market? It is therefore easy to understand why our terms of trade are so changeable and are constantly falling. It is also easy to see why most African countries use most of their development earnings to service their debts. In fact they are left with nothing to put towards development and the functioning of the State. In 1984 an African country that I would rather not name found itself in a situation where the ratio between debt servicing on the one hand and income from the export of goods and services on the other was 204.6. In other words, it was using more than twice the sum of its export earnings to service its debt. Thus this country was borrowing even more than its export earnings, not to use for development purposes or for running the State but to cover its debts. During this period, the workers and the other levels of society that firmly believe in the virtues of democracy were living in misery. During the same period my country had to use 35.6 per cent of its export earnings to service its debt; the terrible situation it found itself in was much better than that being suffered by other countries on the same continent.

Thus the servicing of debts absorbs a large part of Africa's modest export earnings.

This is the situation at present. So is democracy that is gained after such a long struggle by the workers a mere illusion? Can it develop if is rooted in misery? Whatever the situation, the workers in my country are very worried and fear that the process of democratisation we and other countries are experiencing may come to a halt, for a man who is hungry is not a free man, as the head of an African State pointed out so aptly. Such a man is capable of anything and constitutes a permanent threat to democracy.

In conclusion, while waiting for the wind of democratisation that is blowing all around us to reach international economic and monetary relations, I cherish the hope that the ILO will fully accomplish its mission.

Mr. BERZINSH (Government delegate, Latvia) – First of all, permit me to congratulate the President on his election to such important functions. I am convinced that under his guidance the Conference will resolve all questions on this session's agenda and will attain positive results.

It is an honour for me to speak from this high tribune in the name of the Republic of Latvia. My country was deprived of the opportunity to do this for a full 53 years. Soviet occupation and the events which followed it isolated Latvia from the family of democratically developing States and, as a result, we now have to start all together afresh.

Whereas other countries have been able to develop their democratic institutions over decades, history has allowed us a limited time for this. Therefore, I am particularly grateful to the Director-General of the ILO for the most fortunate choice of the subject of his Report to the present session of the Conference.

My country has chosen the path of democracy as its basic endeavour. This may be seen from the fact that, simultaneously with the proclamation of the Declaration on the restoration of the Republic of Latvia as an independent State in May 1990, Parliament ratified eight fundamental ILO Conventions, namely Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 100, 105, 111, 122, 135 and 151. In addition, parliamentary commissions have now dealt with the issue of reviving 17 Conventions ratified by Latvia up to 1940, and have also examined and prepared for ratification a whole range of further ILO Conventions.

We recognise that the process of democratisation of society is the right path, although, having lived for so long under the conditions of a totalitarian State, we know this will be a rather difficult process.

If we are to talk about people, let me state that about 70 per cent of the population supports the process of democratisation of society, wishes to take part in it and is ready to bear the difficulties of the transitional period. However, the majority is also calling for the introduction of effective machinery for the social protection of the population. For our part, we are convinced that the measures aimed at setting up market relations machinery must be accompanied by such measures of protection if social conflicts are to be avoided. And the Government of Latvia, in spite of the worsening economic situation of the population, has managed up to now to preserve social stability in the country.

To characterise the economic situation I shall cite a few figures. While the GNP diminished by 8 per cent in 1991, in comparison with 1990, in the first four months of this year it has already fallen by 26 per cent over the corresponding period last year. The signs of crisis are at hand. What are the basic causes of this situation?

The first and principal reason in our view is that existing international agreements on the mutual supply of raw materials, processed goods and industrial products do not function any more in practice.

For example, we have an agreement with Russia on the mutual supply of goods but, for reasons unknown to us, it is not being implemented. As a result, many of our undertakings are suffering from a shortage of raw materials and consequently are on the verge of standstill and are forced either to work a reduced number of hours, or to put people on leave. Needless to say, we very much relied on these international agreements in the process of transition towards a market economy. In our view, if this situation is not settled, then towards the end of the year we shall have at least 14 to 16 per cent unemployment.

In the second place, in relation with the breaking apart of the established financial accounting system and in the light of some uncertainty in the wake of privatisation of the big state enterprises, there are no stable direct contacts at the level of enterprises. In Latvia today only small enterprises belonging to local collectivities are being privatised and private farm holdings are being created. It should, however, be added that we expect Parliament to adopt in the near future laws on privatisation.

Thirdly, the economic and political situation in Latvia is being destabilised by the presence of Soviet occupation troops which control a range of houses, land and military-industrial enterprises. These structures are being directly financed by Moscow and the Government of Latvia thus has no possibility of controlling the issue of money on the territory of Latvia or of fully guaranteeing the inviolability of property and investments.

And, lastly, as a result of the above and of the liberalisation of prices, there has been a sharp jump in prices of goods and services. Some prices have risen between 30 and 200 times, while the cost of the minimum consumer basket has risen by almost 700 per cent in the past year.

In these circumstances, the issue of preserving social peace takes a particular place. In the beginning of the year, Government and the trade unions concluded an agreement on their mutual obligations concerning the social protection of the workers; now, the newly created organisations of employers will join this agreement and tripartism will function as the basic principle for the achievement of coordinated action. Of course, there will be difficulties in this initial stage, if only because the specific weight of the private sector in our economy is still insignificant – altogether about 6 per cent of the workers are employed there. Nevertheless, the process of tripartite negotiations – the basic principle of the ILO's activity – is bound to develop in Latvia. That this is the right approach was evident to us already this year when we succeeded, through negotiations with the parties concerned, in averting sharp social conflicts and thus ensuring some movement forwards.

In our view, this movement calls for the effective introduction into our lives of yet many international norms and standards, and this endeavour is being carried on. Fundamental changes have been introduced in labour legislation, and in this process the international standards of the ILO have served and continue serving us as universal indicators, with which thinking and action are to be consequently aligned.

Parliament already has adopted, among others, Acts on employment, education and collective agreements. Indexation of the incomes of the population has been introduced by government decision. In the same way, the state employment service has been created; its staff is expected to increase over two-and-a-half times in the second half of the year. A system of retraining for the unemployed has been introduced.

At present, Government is giving great attention to the improvement of working conditions. An Act on the conditions of work is to be adopted; the creation of a labour inspection system is under way; an Act on insurance against occupational accidents and diseases is being elaborated. The actuality of this issue may be seen from the fact that about 34 per cent of all employed workers at present receive wage supplements for work in harmful and unhealthy conditions.

In all this work we experience the concrete help of the ILO, for which I wish to express our gratitude. I think that by joint efforts, with the help of the economically developed countries and the ILO, we shall succeed in coming to grips with the complicated problems of the transition period and of building a democratic society in Latvia.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – There are no further speakers on the list of this morning's sitting. However, there has been a request for the right of reply on the part of the Government delegate for Malaysia.

Before I give him the floor, would you allow me to remind you very briefly of the rules to which the right of reply is subject. The right of reply must be short, it may not exceed three minutes and it must deal solely with the subject which gave rise to the request and cannot be used to stray from this subject. The right of reply must be given in parliamentary language and, in keeping with practice in previous years, there can be no reply to the right of reply.

I now give the floor to Mr. Ahmad Mohamed Idrus, Government delegate, Malaysia, in reply to speech by Mr. Malentacchi, representative of the International Metalworkers' Federation, on 12 June 1992.

Mr. AHMAD MOHAMED IDRUS (Government delegate, Malaysia) – Mr. President, on behalf of the Malaysian delegation, I would like to thank you for allowing me this opportunity to correct the misinformation given by the International Metalworkers' Federation at this session of the Conference in respect of freedom of association, particularly on the issue of the unionisation of electronics workers.

At the very outset, let me state categorically that workers in the electronics industry are not denied the freedom to organise themselves. Just like workers in other industries, they are free to form trade unions. For the record, six trade unions have been formed and registered to date.

Unfortunately, some quarters have taken upon themselves the right to determine the type of union that should be formed by workers in the electronics industry in Malaysia. Their contention is that only a national union will be able to best serve the interests of workers. If this is the rationale, then enterprise-based unions ought not to be allowed to exist, which by itself would be contrary to the spirit of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

While the Government is aware of the sensitivity of the electronics industry, it is also equally aware that this has to be balanced in such a way that the interests of workers are safeguarded. Such a policy decision cannot be viewed in isolation and the Malaysian Government cannot be unfairly accused of violating Convention No. 87. Thus employment creation, sustained economic development and enhancing workers' incomes, thereby raising their standard of living, is the primary concern of the Government. It cannot be denied that any government has to act in the interest of its citizens. Any other approach would be suicidal. One has to study and diagnose the context of the situation before passing any judgement.

There are certain variables to be taken into consideration. Failure to do so results in more harm in the long run. It is also pertinent to point out that in Malaysia, despite being without a labour union for over 20 years, electronics workers are today among the most highly paid workers in the country. In terms of individual income, an electronics worker took home an average of 721 Malaysian ringgit a month in wages last year, including bonuses, allowances and other income in the form of mandatory monetary contributions. This does not take into consideration other non-monetary benefits like subsidised food, subsidised or free transport, free uniforms, hospitalisation benefits and free recreational facilities.

Unlike company-controlled unions elsewhere, enterprise-based unions in Malaysia are truly independent, enjoying the same rights, powers and privileges as national unions. The law does not make any distinction between national unions and enterprise-based unions. Enterprise-based unions are free and are as effective as the national unions. They are not…

Twenty-third sitting

Wednesday, 17 June 1992, 3 p.m.

President: Mr. Decosterd

Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General: Discussion (concl.)

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. Decosterd) – We shall now continue and conclude our discussion of the Report of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Arabic: Mr. SMAOUI (Minister of Social Affairs, Tunisia) – In the name of the God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like, first of all, to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and to wish him every success in his task. I am sure that the work of this Session will be crowned with success, thus further consolidating the ILO's activities and developing good relations in the interests of international solidarity.

I would also like to welcome the eight new member States who have just joined the Organisation; their membership will help to strengthen the ILO's role to strive for peace and global development, in accordance with the objectives and spirit of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The main subject of this Session is democratisation and the role of the ILO. Indeed, it is one of the main points dealt with in the Director-General's Report which discusses efforts the ILO should make to strengthen international cooperation so as to ensure economic and social growth based on the principles of democracy, social justice and the respect of human rights.

We are firmly convinced that the ILO, has, through its tripartite structure, been able to develop the concept of democratisation in such a way that it not only englobes the power of political institutions but also covers social matters – including dialogue between the various parties in the world of work. This I think is illustrated by the various Conventions and Recommendatins on industrial relations, the organisation of social dialogue and the protection of human rights. These instruments give democracy a social dimension.

Since the changes which occurred on 7 November, Tunisia, aware of the significance of democracy and human rights, has made a number of constitutional amendments and changed laws in order to promote freedoms and consolidate democracy, thereby enabling the Tunisian people to exercise fully their basic rights and contributing towards the establishment of a modern and just society.

In this respect, we consider that political changes only have a limited effect if they are not accompanied by significant changes in industrial relations, as political stability is dependent upon social peace – which is a prerequisite for a country's development and prosperity.

It is for this reason that Tunisia has sought to give greater importance to trade union action, to strengthen collective, constructive and responsible instruments for dialogue and to encourage the independence of trade union institutions and trade union freedoms.

The Tunisia of this new era is determined to promote the respect of human rights; indeed, it is at the head of the list of countries which have ratified most international conventions concerning the protection of human rights and attempts to combat all forms of discrimination. I should like to quote, in particular, the United Nations Conventions on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women and on the rights of the child. As we firmly believe that there are no human rights which are more important than others – either political or economic – we are striving for the respect of all these rights, especially those advocating equality of opportunity and attempting to create a climate propitious to true social justice.

It goes without saying that the Tunisian Government has been constantly trying to ensure that work is recognised for what it really is – a value of civilisation and, as such, the surest way to achieve true integrated development and democracy.

The events that we have been observing throughout the world, especially the increasing democratisation, have been an indicator to us of the radical changes taking place in these areas in favour of human rights and basic freedoms. But new forms of racism and extremism are now emerging and posing a real threat to democracy. These are often movements with the same objectives, which say one thing and mean another and try to dominate the political scene. The fact that these movements try, in some areas, to infiltrate the State machinery is further proof that they flout international legality and humanitarian principles.

In spite of the changes occurring on the international scene and the fact that democracy is expanding, we still have a long way to go; we still need solidarity and cooperation because democracy is not a standard solution that can be applied everywhere – neither is it an abstract principle. We are dealing with an ethical matter – a form of behaviour and attitude that requires deep reflection. Only then can democracy be adapted to economic and social conditions with a view to creating a civilised society based on justice, solidarity and freedom.

Original – Spanish: Mr NAVARRO CABRERA (Employers' delegate, Cuba) – In speaking before this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference I wish to congratulate the President for his election.

The Report of the Director-General develops the theme of democratisation and offers various definitions and concepts. I should like to refer to only two of these definitions. First of all, the general concept of democracy; and secondly, the role of the State in the economic arena.

As to the first I shall not dwell at great length on the matter; I shall merely point to what I consider to be a democratic concept, namely the system of institutions which comprise the organs of the people's power in my country. This system is based on the identification of interests between the Government, the administration and the masses, on the genuine participation of the people in the solution of their own problems, on the exercise of a free, equal and secret vote, on the accountability of delegates to the voters, and on the power of voters to rescind any mandate.

With respect to the second of these definitions, the Director-General says that "it is a striking phenomenon that democratisation is nearly always accompanied by a change of economic system or, at the very least, by a challenge to the role of the State in economic matters".

The words "at the very least, by a challenge to the role of the State in economic matters" call to mind the new prescriptions of neo-liberalism, an old theory with a new label, in the sense that the State is essentially inefficient and should withdraw from economic activities and give way to privatisation, because privatisation, private companies and market economies are in fashion.

If one wishes to be strictly logical, one would have to say that the market economy, private initiative and private property must come under one name, and only one name.

The truth is that this theory does not in any way eliminate or discard state action. In the final analysis, it is also a form of statism, different only in that it is to the benefit of certain classes or social groups. If the aim is to improve the management of enterprises, the problem is not one of property, but one of administration and management; even a private company can be inefficient if it does not have the proper management. There are many examples which we could quote of private companies that are inefficient or bankrupt, and which have been turned over to the State so that it may rescue them and later privatise them once more.

We could also give examples of highly developed countries which have based their development on strong state participation. In Latin America the country which has achieved the most significant industrial development has been Brazil; its major expansion took place in the sixties and seventies, when its economic policies involved strong state participation in national development plans and the considerable participation of the public sector.

This proves that these apparent truths do not tally with reality. Cuba does not accept this prescription because this is an old theory and it has always been based on private initiative, and on the assumption that wealth depends on private enterprise and a market economy. However, in that pure system, as pure as in the past century, there continue to be problems of poverty and social disaster. According to a congress on poverty which was held in Quito in 1991, there are 270 million poor in Latin America, and of these 84 million are indigent.

There are 20 million homeless children in Latin America and there are millions of school-age children who are working more than eight hours a day.

The death rate in Latin America among children is 60 for every thousand in the first year of life of the child.

Thirty to 40 per cent of the labour force is unemployed or semi-unemployed in Latin America. Malnutrition affects 30 million people and on average, life expectancy is under 70 years of age.

We are a country of scarce resources and facing very difficult times. However, we do not have these problems. In Cuba the child mortality rate is 10.7 per 1,000 children born.

Illiteracy disappeared quite a while ago. The phenomenon of malnutrition is insignificant. I do not think it can be said that there is no job for someone who wants to work, even in the present period.

More than 800,000 graduates higher or medium level schools have found employment. There is not one single mother who is not protected – all workers are protected by social security. The entire population has the right to free medical care.

The Cuban economy has not lost its capacity to develop despite the fact that we are facing major difficulties. This confirms that we have chosen the right path and that the people have kept their faith in the face of the present difficulties.

Whilst trying to improve our system, we are seeking ways to adapt our economy to the new conditions and assimilate foreign capital, which although not the basis of the strategy is an element of it. This process is different from the one taking place in other countries because our opening is based on given concepts guaranteeing the socialist order of our economy and our economic and social goals.

In seeking solutions, the most immediate task has been to extend and diversify foreign markets and to assimilate foreign capital which is not limited only to joint ventures, but also covers other forms of economic associations, such as cooperatives, marketing associations, and others.

This process began in our country in the field of tourism, but today covers other branches of the economy which focus particularly on exports, and supplementing our industry by contribution of capital, technologies and markets where required.

It is with considerable realism that we have opened up these possibilities and the different methods of economic association offer a great deal. This interest is warranted by the fact that we already have productive capacity and a skilled labour force at levels that few developing countries can boast today.

I think we can state today that the result of the initial investments has been advantageous. They have excellent returns and enjoy considerable facilities. The investors have found a well-prepared people with a high cultural level, and disciplined, when able to benefit from good organisation and experience when needed.

The facilities for repatriating capital are automatic and are functioning without any difficulties.

We have been opening up the doors. When there is no raw material in a factory and when the machinery and the labour force are available, the offers of raw materials and associations in the plant, or the marketing potential are analysed to see how mutually agreeable solutions can be found.

We have also made an important breakthrough in this field, as can be seen. So, the social system is not incompatible with economic and political integration.

The leader of the Cuban revolution, Fidel Castro, said in reference to Latin America when he attended the Summit of the Group of 3 in the Hotel Melia in Cozumel, Mexico, on 23 October 1991 that Cuba was prepared to analyse and discuss legislation, laws, whatever, to achieve unity, if a federation were to be suggested.

Mr. HULTIN (Employers' delegate, Finland) – Thank you for letting me take the floor on behalf of the employers of the Nordic countries – Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden.

First, let me join the previous speakers in congratulating the President. At this late stage of the Conference, however, not for being elected, but for so successfully presiding over the Conference and thus fulfilling the expectations that we all placed in his hands.

I would also like to compliment the Director-General for selecting such a timely theme as democratisation for his Report to this session of the International Labour Conference. It is timely because in the past few years many countries have decided to open up their societies from centrally planned and regulated economies to free market economies. It is timely because as the Director-General points out democratisation is nearly always linked to a change of economic system.

But most of all the Report, I think, deserves compliments not because of the complete and exhaustive analysis of democratisation – this is I believe not its intention – but for the thought-inspiring way with which the Director-General is soliciting our ideas to develop ILO activities and to prepare the Organisatin for the future.

This is justified. The world around us is changing rapidly. The world map looks different today from only two years back. There are countries that are finding their way as new democracies and the economic and structural changes interactively affect every country in one way or the other. In this complex and interdependent process of change the ILO has potential for playing an important role by contributing to a stable, social development.

It needs to be recognised, however, that the engine of social development is productive enterprise activity. Without this, in the long term there will be no sustainable economic growth. There will be no growth in employment and there will be no creation of wealth.

Businesses everywhere are facing constantly changing markets. Those enterprises that are able to follow and adapt to the changes will increase their business. Those who are not will be looking at a shrinking piece of the pie. The former creates jobs, the latter creates unemployment, and the difference between the two is flexibility.

The points that I want to make at this stage are, firstly, that sustainable social development can only be based on productive enterprise activity, and secondly, that enterprises require flexibility to be able t adapt to constantly changing markets.

We in the Nordic countries have extensive experience in collective bargaining systems. These systems while contributing to stable labour market developments, have also contributed to rigid, inflexible structures. Because of these, the enterprises and the societies in our countries are finding in increasingl difficult to adapt to changes, and this results in unemployment. It is a paradox that a system that work to establish workers' protection, at the same tim fails to consider the very basic needs of enterprises t create employment.

In the interest of flexibility, we must remembe that collective bargaining does not equate with central bargaining. It can, in fact, take place at any o three levels: central, local and enterprise. I refer t the Director-General when he points out in his Report on page 50 that: "... it should be possible t establish bipartite relations at enterprise level, because that is where ... the problems to be settled .. are to be found".

The principle of subsidiarity should be respecte We must have the courage to stand up against international regulation that are too detailed. We shoul leave it to the national authorities or even to th enterprises and their workers to find solutions tha reflect the national or local situations.

Where regulation is a tool for the establishment o basic social rights, deregulation should also be seriously considered as a means of vitalising enterpris activity.

The history of the ILO shows the positive contribution that tripartism can make to stable social development. However, here also it must be recognise that tripartism is not an institution untouched by th developments of time. Indeed, while it is a basic too for social justice, tripartism must take into accoun the market economy and work in the spirit of genuine entrepreneurship and strive to encourage investment in human resource management.

Well-functioning tripartism must comprise thre independent and equal partners. Each of these partners must have a distinctive role. Their most important mission is to serve the interests of their constituents. This is best ensured if organisations grow fron the needs of their members. The constituents mus also keep an incentive to follow, evaluate and guid the performance of their organisations. This is th prerogative of the members and of the member alone.

The members' relationship with their organisatio must also be voluntary. The right to organise doe not mean obligation to organise. The individual, a well as the enterprise, must have the right to choos freely the organisation through which he or sh wishes to be represented.

As I pointed out in the beginning, stable socia development can only be based on a well-functionin economy, the prerequisites of which are productiv enterprises and a flexible labour market. Therefor to be able to fulfil its mission, the ILO must build it future activities in accordance with the resolutio concerning the role of enterprises in employmen growth and the creation of full productive and freel chosen employment.

This resolution was adopted unanimously by al three partners in the Resolutions Committee at thi Session of the Conference. The prospects of bein able to promote employment, stable social development and sustainable economic growth along these lines is a source of excitement and motivation for the Nordic employers.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. MAVILA (Government delegate, Mozambique) – My first words go out to congratulate the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference unanimously elected to lead this distinguished forum.

The praise which has been lavished on his very rich political and professional experience by speakers before me needs no further echo from myself, since this experience is more than sufficient to guarantee the proper direction and success of our work.

May I be allowed to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the excellent choice of the subject of Democratisation and the ILO for Part I of his Report. This subject certainly reflects the realities and concerns of many delegates present here, including myself and my delegation.

In January 1987, the Government of my country approved a programme of economic recovery which comprises a set of measures for structural adjustment with a view to halting the weakening of economic activity in the country and progressively lead it to recovery, similar to the efforts being made to defend our country.

As a result of the implementation of these measures between 1987 and 1989, our economy showed a trend towards positive growth and achieved significant results in correcting the budgetary deficit and the adjustment in exchange rates, wages and prices. At the same time, the Government of Mozambique made great efforts to invest in the recovery of production and social infrastructures which have been destroyed by the war which has been imposed on us.

That being said, we must emphasise the fragile and conditional nature of this recovery. One of the effects of our dependency on the process initiated with our economic plan is that the external debt grows alongside our needs in terms of the foreign financing which is absolutely essential to compensate our shortage of resources. The application of programmes such as our economic programme does not result in structural change in the classic sense of the term but rather in the recovery of economic mechanisms which will condition the later phases of growth.

In Mozambique, the situation is even more complicated by the fact that the plan has to be implemented in a situation of war, and this has two important consequences: first of all, the considerable limitations on using the State budget for the production and social areas, because our priority is defence; and secondly, the difficulty of incorporating the agricultural population in market economy schemes, since these people have become isolated as a result of the war. For the same reason this situation prevents the free circulation of goods and, in particular, trade between the cities and the country.

From 1991 the economy of Mozambique has been going through a period of stagnation, with the growth in the GDP being lower than the growth in the population, leading to a reduction in the per capita GDP and employment opportunities.

I have already outlined the basic reasons for this situation, and to which must be added the drought and electricity cuts in 1990; the instability characteristic of any period of transition from state-owned enterprises to privately owned enterprises; the weak management capacity of the country, combined with insufficient training of the labour force and the shortage of skilled technicians to meet the challenge of competitivity posed by the market economy system.

To attenuate the social effects of the plan, the Government of my country has established and implemented a number of measures to alleviate the hardship of the most vulnerable sectors of the population.

The scenario which I have just described must be completed by reference to another phenomenon, which is not a direct consequence of the plan, but which has aggravated the economic situation – already difficult enough in itself – of Mozambique. I am speaking of the compulsory repatriation of approximately 16,000 citizens of Mozambique who worked in the former GDR, under an agreement concluded with Mozambique, and which ceased to apply following the recent unification of Germany.

In a country such as Mozambique, with one of the highest unemployment rates in the African continent, this situation has acquired the dimensions of a disaster, since with the privatisation of State enterprises and the rationalisation of the labour force, following the establishment of a market economy, the number of unemployed is increasing in frightening proportions.

At the internal level, we have not spared any efforts to find solutions to these problems.

Thus the Ministry of Labour, with assistance from the ILO and the World Bank, is applying with some success two employment strategies, one for rural areas and the other for the urban sector.

Mozambique, like other countries, has also introduced political, social reforms.

The Government has taken measures towards establishing basic rights and freedoms enshrined in the new Constitution of the Republic. In the same way, legal instruments have been adopted which, in accordance with the constitutional principles governing the consolidation of a State of law and the adoption of a market economy, place Mozambique amongst those democratic countries which are governed by the universal principles of democracy and social justice.

Special mention should be made in this context of the legislation respecting political parties, the right to association, the exercise of the right to strike, collective bargaining, employers' and workers' organisations. In the same way instruments have also been approved concerning the adhesion of the Republic of Mozambique to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Second additional protocol on civil and political rights as well as the Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

Since the application of the principles of democracy and social justice on the basis of tripartism still lacks solid institutions and flexible and efficient machinery in our country, the efforts of my Government are now concentrated on the establishment of conditions to promote and develop interest and responsible participation on the part of all parties which seek to promote the growth of democracy and the application of national development projects and programmes.

In this respect, we welcome the timely contribution by the ILO and its officials to strengthen tripartism and provide the necessary technical assistance to the Government and the social partners.

Because of the fragility of our institutions and the need to increase the occupational skills of our officials and technicians in the labour administration services, we would like the programmes of our Organisation to include specific technical assistance measures in the spheres of employment and vocational training, occupational safety and health, labour inspection and occupational relations.

Despite all the difficulties which my country is experiencing on the path towards the establishment of a democratic society, a State of law in which institutions, citizens, the Government and the social partners can contribute in a free and responsible manner to the social and economic process of our nation, I should like to conclude with a message of confidence in the future. Recent political developments in the region bring with them the hope that sooner or later the map of southern Africa will include a South Africa which is free of apartheid. The day is now not far when all the region will become reconciled and join its efforts and knowledge in the establishment of societies which are free and prosperous under the banner of human rights, democracy and social justice.

Mr. SMITH (Employers' delegate, United States) – I come here today to accept the invitation expressed by the Director-General for delegates to "state their wishes concerning action to be taken by the ILO" with regard to democratisation. To condense such a broad yet vital subject to ten minutes is a formidable task that necessitates the elimination of all the diplomatic niceties that have been traditional in this hall in past years, and for this I ask both your indulgence and your forgiveness.

First, let me strongly advocate that the International Labour Organisation commit a significant amount of its resources to the task of supporting and strengthening the worldwide movement towards democracy that is documented so well in the opening pages of the Director-General's Report. To support this recommendation, one need search no further than the opening paragraphs of the Director-General's conclusion. Let me quote: "Every human being aspires to freedom and justice, and these ideals can only be fulfilled by democracy." And in the following paragraph he says: "... for together with social justice, democracy is the sole guarantee of peace in the world."

Now, if freedom and justice can only be fulfilled and peace only assured by democracy, then clearly an Organisation like ours seeking social justice for all must make the attainment of universal democracy one of its most important objectives.

But what can an Organisation like ours actually do to help strengthen democracy where it exists and encourage its birth where it has been denied? Well, first, we must regain the moral high ground. We must place the great moral persuasion of our Organisation squarely behind those who are struggling to overcome authoritarian regimes, be they of the left or the right, or be they the religious zealots of whatever religion. I used the words "regain the moral high ground" advisedly because in the past this Organisation, in the name of universality, has not always been prepared to defend democracy.

The Director-General has explained our Organisation's willingness to ignore basic democratic principles, ignore the manner in which fundamental human rights were being trampled upon in some member States, as a pragmatic solution to preserve the universal character of the ILO. I submit that such pragmatic solutions did this Organisation a real disservice and, more important, did serious harm to millions of working people in those member States.

For most of the almost 40 years that I have been participating in this Conference, the Office, many governments and countless ILO Officials have pressured the Employers' group time and time again to recognise and accept as equals government bureaucrats who had been dubbed "employers" simply because they managed state-owned enterprises. Despite this kind of pragmatism, much of the world has come to recognise the vast difference between state-owned enterprises and the companies and corporations that make up the private sector. Witness the movement that continues to gain momentum in many countries to privatise the industries that had been nationalised in earlier years and, as we all know, the complete collapse of communism in Central and Eastern Europe during the last three years. Why have so many ILO officials and delegates to the Conference been willing to violate the spirit of tripartism written into the Constitution of this Organisation by insisting that the Employers' group accept into its councils inviduals who were clearly part of government?

Instead of weakening tripartism in this manner in order to preserve the universal character of the ILO, our Organisation should have taken the alternate path. We should have sought to strengthen tripartism and democracy by insisting that those member States which were unable to send non-governmental delegations that were truly independent, should have limited their participation to the government section of this tripartite body. The events of the past three years have dramatically demonstrated the hypocrisy and the folly of ignoring basic principles. It is not too late to change! There is still a small number of member States, some with the monolithic structures of centrally planned economies, others with the equally monolithic structure of a single party authoritarian regime, that cannot legitimately send independent non-government delegations of workers or employers. If we are really intent on strengthening democracy, if we really believe in the importance of tripartism, we need to ask ourselves how much longer we can go on pretending that it is appropriate to allow government-controlled delegates to masquerade as employers or workers.

But enough of past errors and present mistakes. Let us look to the future. What should the ILO do if it is really intent on playing an important role in the world movement towards democratisation?

The ILO should recognise and support the basic fundamentals and institutions that make a democracy possible. Time does not allow me to even list all of them so I will only speak about economic freedom, because without economic freedom, political freedom is impossible and without political freedom there can be no democracy.

Economic freedom requires a free market system, a system which has proved to be the most efficient method ever devised to allocate, in the interests of the people, the limited resources of a nation or indeed the entire world. A free market system requires many institutions that those of us who have lived within a market economy take for granted. Institutions such as private banks, stock markets, freely convertible currencies, a code of commercial laws and regulations and an impartial judiciary to enforce and interpret such regulations. To function properly in the interests of the consumer, a free market must also have competition, and lots of it. The more competiters there are seeking to sell their services or products in a free market, the better it is for the consumers and the more efficient the market place can be.

Few of us really like competition for ourselves, but it is absolutely essential to the market system. In most of the countries now in the process of democratisation, particularly those in Central and Eastern Europe, few if any, of these institutions are present.

The ILO should use its unique tripartite structure to give guidance and help to these nations in establishing the institutions that are essential to a market economy. We have experienced employers, experienced workers' representatives and many fine government officials who can help in the establishment of these institutions.

Altogether too often, governments or institutions like the ILO are tempted to interfere in the working of the free market in order to carry out some quite appropriate social objectives. Even in this Conference some delegates are already urging restrictions on the free market, but let us not be misled by this siren song. Although such interference appears to bring short-term benefits, more often than not the long-term results are disastrous. A decision to put a ceiling on the price of bread, for instance, usually means that the ceiling very quickly becomes a floor and in the long term less bread is available, not more. A decision to set a high minimum wage usually results in fewer jobs, not more. Rent controls usually result in poor quality housing and less of it. The free market, when it is allowed to function without interference, automatically adjusts to the needs of the people. If there is a shortage of bread, for instance, the price will rise and as the price rises more bakers will be attracted to the market, eventually bringing the supply of bread into balance with the demand for it. If, however, a ceiling price is established for bread, thus preventing the market forces from establishing the proper price, this natural correction does not take place.

Of course, the free market works just as effectively in the opposite direction: when the supply of a particular product or service is greater than the demand from consumers, the price will fall, thereby discouraging production as the more efficient producers reduce their schedules and the less efficient go out of business. Again there is a great temptation for governments to interfere by providing subsidies to the less efficient in order to maintain employment. Inevitably this kind of interference is equally disastrous as it results in the continued production of products for which there is no market.

In a free market economy the customer is sovereign and the ultimate customer is the individual consumer. When the consumer is pleased with the product or service being offered, the entrepreneur or company will prosper and grow. And when the consumer is unhappy for any reason – poor quality, undependable service, obsolete products or excessive prices – the entrepreneur or company will see its business shrink and if corrections are not made on a timely basis, such an enterprise is doomed to go out of business. Now what I have referred to as "corrections" is frequently referred to as "structural adjustment", particularly here in the ILO.

I have been dismayed to learn that in the Committee discussing adjustment and human resources development, some speakers believe that there are two kinds of structural adjustment – voluntary and involuntary. Nothing could be more erroneous. Structural adjustment is a constant necessity in every enterprise, and those who fail to make timely corrections of deficiencies are doomed to failure – failure that not only destroys the enterprise but eliminates all the jobs that the enterprise would otherwise provide.

I cannot close my remarks today without commenting on the address of our old friend, His Excellency the President of Zambia, Mr. Chiluba. Despite his ninteenth – century description of employers, his call for cooperation between workers and their employers is the very best legacy that he could have possibly given to his many friends in this Organisation. Unless and until workers and their employers work together cooperatively to fulfil the wants and desires of the real boss of all enterprises – the customer – there can be little hope for the steady growth in opportunity that we all seek.

Original – French: Mr. AGAGUSEINOV (Workers' delegate, Azerbaijan) – In the course of the work of the current session, the success of the choice of our President and our Vice-Presidents has been confirmed. I should like to take this opportunity to express my satisfaction with the choice of Officers and congratulate the President, as well as the delegates who chose him, on his election.

For the first time, the workers of Azerbaijan have made their voice heard in this assembly. This has been made possible thanks to the far-reaching political changes which have recently taken place in my country, re-establishing its sovereignty and independence. Azerbaijan has reiterated its irrevocable commitment to democratic reform.

That is why the Report of the Director-General is of particular interest to my delegation.

As this is the first time I've been given the floor, I should like to take this opportunity briefly to explain the main problems that we are encountering along the path on which we have embarked, which is aimed at ensuring democratic, non-denominational government and a solid system of protection and social security.

The single-track development of our Republic's economy which in the past was used by a totalitarian government simply to supply itself with fuel, has led to a drop in the growth of national income. Other harmful effects have been felt in connection with social problems, the standard of living and the development of the Republic's agriculture, which has been dominated by cotton monoculture. The high concentration of oil production and of petrochemical industries in the country, together with the extensive use of various chemicals for the treatment of cotton, have left certain towns and regions on the brink of ecological disaster. Pollution continues severely to affect the health of workers and the general population alike. Solving all the problems before us will be all the more difficult because the current transition to a market economy entails problems of its own. Only the international experience in the standards of international law and the assistance of the ILO can stop our country from falling prey to uncontrolled capitalism. Basically, we must develop legislation to ensure a social security system and to establish standards for the conditions of employment, the work of women and children, job security and protection and a minimum wage.

The use of human resources which are not engaged in the public sector of the economy remains a major problem. The development of social relations in a market economy constantly raises the question of how to provide employment for the population. According to our forecasts, the closure of unprofitable, debt-ridden enterprises will lead, around 1995, to massive dismissals.

Moreover, we now face a new and unexpected problem – that of caring for refugees. The war unleashed by Armenia on our territory and the expulsion of Azeris living in Armenia have deprived hundreds of thousands of people of their rights to the inviolability of the person, to employment and to education. They have lost their salaries, their work documents, their children's birth certificates, their passports and their savings. They have even been refused emergency assistance. Their urgent needs for housing, clothing, food, vocational training and employment must be met. This situation reflects the profound complexity of the social problems imposed by the current circumstances.

To a great extent, the solution of these problems will depend upon the adoption of laws and standards that define the status of refugees in accordance with the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. To draw them up we will need the assistance of the international community and of the ILO.

The social policy at present in effect in Azerbaijan is hardly capable of improving conditions of employment of women. The percentage of women employed in difficult circumstances has remained practically unchanged, particularly in the cotton industry, the tobacco industry and in viticulture, where women are the majority of the labour force. The low level of mechanisation and unhealthy and difficult working conditions have adverse effects on women's health and on pregnancy.

Moreover, the growth of the female labour force, although it has definitely increased significantly, has not been matched with increased specialised training for women. Generally, women are engaged in activities that do not require skills and are uninteresting. As far as the standards of the ILO are concerned, we still have to improve existing standards and draft new laws in this field, based on international experience in the field of the employment of women.

With regard to another matter, the social support mechanism suffered from serious deficiencies. So far, in the industrial sector, the amount allocated to cover salaries and social benefits has been no more than 9 or 10 per cent of all expenditure. Now a new law has been adopted, under which a minimum budget is established to cover social expenditure. In the past, wage and benefit rates were the fruit of centralised decisions. This year, an important reform of the remuneration system is under way. From 1 January this year, a minimum wage has been guaranteed by the Government. On the other hand, there is no longer a wage ceiling.

Nevertheless, these measures are being carried out at the cost of economic development, because they disrupt economic recovery and slow down the pace of production. In the current circumstances, we require the help of qualified experts and consultants as well as economic advisers rich in international experience in the implementation of various economic reforms. Moreover, we have to prepare our own national economic specialists by utilising the possibilities offered by foreign training centres.

Apart from the reform of the remuneration system, the most important tasks before us are to find new approaches to labour relations based upon the principles of social partnership and collective bargaining, and to establish a tripartite system.

Among the social problems of concern to our society, no doubt the most important will be to create a solid and effective social security system to improve the population's standard of living and especially the standard of living of the most disadvantaged groups. This reform cannot disregard the particular demographic traits of our Republic, in which the birth rate is high (two children per family) and large families (four or more children) are common.

In nominal terms, household income has risen. Nevertheless these increases are being rapidly outstripped by the rise in the cost of living.

Mr. RACHMAN (Workers' delegate, Indonesia) – I should like to begin by expressing the Indonesian workers' appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO for his valuable and comprehensive Report on the subject of Democratisation and the ILO, not only because the issue of democratisation has now become a global concern, but more particularly because it represents the highest priority that we, as trade unions in developing countries, are striving for.

Secondly, I would like to share with you the experience of the Indonesian workers and explain the position we have adopted in this respect.

The fact that Indonesia has set itself free from 350 years of colonialism makes it quite obvious that Indonesians are aware of and fully understand the issue of human rights. For that reason the promotion and protection of human rights are important priorities in our State's ideology and Constitution.

In so far as democracy is concerned, we in Indonesia believe that a person is not a mere individual, but is also a part of society with social obligations as well as rights, and that these rights must also be respected. In other words, freedom to exercise rights must always be counterbalanced by social obligations.

In this context, we, in Indonesia, think that the concept of human rights and democracy should be developed in the light of, and on the basis of, our State's ideology, tradition and culture, taking into account the ethnic plurality and the different languages of our society and the multi-racial people who make up our nation.

As to the implementation of human rights and democracy in the trade union movement in Indonesia, I would like briefly to furnish you with the following information.

Until 1973, we had 21 national centres, each of which was in competition with the others. So sharp was the competition between them that industrial peace could not be achieved. In line with our national economic development plan, all 21 centres were merged in 1973 into one federation which therefore consisted of 21 industrial unions.

As I have mentioned, we developed human rights, workers' rights and democracy in line with our political experiences and our national development plan. Twelve years later, in 1985, we changed our trade union structure from that of a federation to one that is "unitary", in which the unit at plant level is expected to be the spearhead. In this structure, the coordinating tools at national level were known as "departments". Now, as the result of our last Convention, the structure remains the same, that is, unitary, but the role of the departments has been changed to allow them more autonomy, in the hope that they will take over the functions of industrial unions under the National Executive Board of the All-Indonesia Workers' Union (SPSI). In the current structure, "departments" have become "sectors".

One might conclude from this that there had been a U-turn in 1985 and raise the question as to why it was allowed to happen. But this is exactly what we are trying to demonstrate and where democracy comes in: the decision of the Congress, as the highest body in the organisation, had to be respected.

However, there are other matters: 80 per cent of the labour force in Indonesia at the moment is educated only to primary-school level.

I would like to indicate here the difference between "interference" and "cooperation" in the context of Indonesia; I think it is important from the point of view of the Indonesia Workers' Union, since we have had such difficulty in making ourselves understood.

When we cooperate with our Government within a tripartite partnership, in conformity with the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) – which we in Indonesia have adapted to our laws and traditions – we have always been seen to be under the control of the Government. If we ask the employers to cooperate in setting up our units, as provided for in our regulations, that has been interpreted as allowing the employers to interfere in union business. For your information, the Tripartite Body was established in Indonesia in 1967, that is, nine years before the adoption of Convention No. 144.

In line with what I have just presented, I should mention the positive impact of trade unionism in Indonesia, as the result of tripartite consultation. The number of SPSI units has increased to 10, 750 in 1992. Similarly, collective labour agreements have risen to 6,500 this year.

In conclusion, I hope that the Conference this year will adopt Recommendations or, if possible, Conventions, that will improve more effectively the welfare of workers in developing countries.

Mr. PILARSKI (Employers' delegate, Poland) – On behalf of the Polish Employers' Confederation, I have the pleasure of congratulating the President on his election to such a responsible post.

The Polish Employers' Confederation was established four years ago. In June 1991 it was recognised by the International Organisation of Employers as one of the first in the post-communist countries. We saw this recognition as a result of our achievements in the relatively short period of our existence. It showed confidence in our active role in the process of transforming our economy into a market-oriented one.

In this connection I would like to emphasise that the Confederation is the only representative body of the Polish employers to which 24 regional and branch organisations are associated, both private and state ones. Therefore the Confederation should be, and is, an important element in the new social and economic infrastructure of our country. It influences all economic changes in the country and establishes an adequate model of labour relations.

The Confederation is particularly interested in developing trilateral institutions and mechanisms, as well as collective bargaining at all levels. I am convinced that this is an important component of the emerging democratic system in my country.

It is clear that the interests of all the social partners in a democratic system should be adequately represented and that all social actors should play their appropriate roles. Strong and effective employers' organisations are both in the interest of the government and the trade unions. Without them, it is impossible to maintain social peace and appropriately regulate employer-employee relations.

We strictly observe the rule of tripartism which, based on the democratic mechanism and on dialogue among the three parties concerned (government, trade unions and employers), strives to preserve social peace. It has a synergistic effect which is very beneficial to the development of our economy.

The Confederation is playing an important role in transforming our economy into a market-oriented one. In particular it is participating in: the privatisation of our economy and the establishment of its legal base; the training of managers and specialists who are indispensable for our economy; the training of negotiators who facilitate relations among employers and employees; promoting the real image of employers and their role in the free-market economy.

We are endeavouring to achieve an as yet unseen level of privatisation. We have privatised 90 per cent of the trade sector, 75 per cent of the construction sector and 85 per cent of the agricultural sector.

We have gathered considerable experience in this area which we could share with other countries which are transforming their economies. We expect that in future the privatisation process will increase in other countries as well. The outcome of this process will affect the future social and economic well-being of those countries. Therefore, we strongly advise the ILO to examine the social consequences of the transition process at its regular sessions.

We consider that the requirement to standardise products, which will come into force on 1 January 1993, is also of great importance for democratic and free-market economies. I would like to say that these standards will determine future access to markets, international labour division as well as development and social relations. And thus I think it is worth considering the possibility of discussing this issue here at the ILO.

The above comments go to show the important role played by employers' organisations in the socio-economic changes taking place in the post-communist countries.

It is obvious then that strengthening their position and importance is not only in the interest of employers, but also in the interest of governments and trade unions. This should also hold true for their active involvement in the international community.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MORENO PRECIADOS (Workers' delegate, Spain) – We congratulate the President for his election, and we congratulate the Director-General for his Report, Democratisation and the ILO.

We have witnessed a blossoming of democracy in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe; although the process is not yet complete, and though there are still contradictions and tensions, this is a very positive phenomenon for the extension of democracy and basic social and civil rights.

Whilst in other countries there are worrying signs of xenophobia and racism, which are in flagrant contradiction with the essence of democracy, the European Trade Union Confederation chose as the theme for 1 May celebrations the struggle against xenophobia and racism.

This wave of intolerance is accompanied in many countries by electoral gains on the part of far-right movements and parties which would return to the most sinister totalitarianism and openly challenge the survival of civil freedoms.

Therefore, it is necessary and urgent, now more than ever, to strengthen and develop political democracy.

The Director-General is right in saying that "it is quite true that [democracy] is not just a matter of placing a ballot paper in a ballot box. It can only survive if the entire population participates and maintains its interest in public affairs. Without this participation", the Director-General adds, "democracy would be powerless to satisfy people's aspirations; it would be no more than an empy shell."

Participation and democracy must go hand in hand. Neither has any meaning without the other.

In Spain for some time we have been stunned to witness a constant denigration by the Government and major employers of concepts as basic as participation, solidarity or the right to employment.

On 3 April the Government published Royal Decree 1/92 concerning urgent measures to foster employment and provide unemployment protection, which involves a reduction of 40 per cent in unemployment protection, and in some cases, the total elimination of the benefits for unemployment.

This Royal Decree was approved and published, and entered into force the day after its publication, not only without negotiations or consultations with trade unions, but, and this is even more serious, with deception. Indeed, as the Spanish trade unions became aware, through the press, of the intention of the Government to approve a bill to reduce unemployment benefits, we asked for consultations; our request was publicly rejected by the Government. When the Decree was published we protested to the Government, but the Government dismissed us and accused us of assuming a confrontational posture.

This reduction in unemployment benefits is taking place at a time when the level of unemployment in my country is nearing 16 per cent. The reason given by the President of the Government for this cut-back in benefits is that unemployment has got out of hand. In recent years the Government has generously given subsidies to the employers hiring temporary workers. The result is that 38 per cent of the jobs in the private sector in my country are precarious. Now the Government claims that the unemployed should pay for the deficit resulting from the subsidies so generously given to the employers.

Very recently, on 22 May, the Council of Ministers submitted to Parliament a Bill on strikes.

When the Government convened the trade unions to inform them of this bill, it expressly said that it was not a question of negotiating or bargaining, but only of hearing our opinion. The result was that none of our suggestions were taken up. On the contrary, once our opinion was voiced, the changes to the Bill made it even worse.

In Spain the right to strike is governed by the Decree of 4 March 1977, which pre-dates our democratic Constitution. This Decree was opposed in 1980 by the parliamentary group of the Spanish Socialist Workers' Party, which was then in the opposition, because it considered that it was harmful to the right to strike. And now, the Socialist Government is submitting a Bill which is even more restrictive than the above-mentioned Decree.

When a party in power does exactly the opposite of what it promised to do when it was in the opposition, in terms of social matters, it is harming democracy and causing bewilderment and scepticism among the citizens, as evidenced by the recent drop in voter participation.

In protest against restrictions on unemployment protection and the right to strike, and in support of a reindustrialisation policy, we the Spanish workers held a general strike for half a day on 28 May; it was widely observed and took place without any violent incidents despite the fact that the Government made the unusual move of deploying political forces.

The CEOE, the employers' organisation, in violation of ILO principles of tripartism, asked insistently for the general strike to be declared illegal and for trade union pickets to be banned.

In addition to police action, the Government undertook a propaganda campaign under the pretext of guaranteeing the right to work. It is paradoxical for the Government and the employers to invoke the right to work only when there is a strike, while the rest of the year they take no notice of the 2,556,000 unemployed persons who are looking for work, even though this problem should be a priority in the Government's European convergence policy.

The Spanish trade unions solemnly appeal to the Spanish Government to negotiate. We want to negotiate in the manner highlighted by the Director-General: "Participating in such consultations means not just presenting and defending one's position, but also listening to the other side and honestly seeking solutions that do justice to the interests of all."

The European Trade Union Confederation, which supports the Treaty of Maastricht as a starting point for European union in the social, economic and political fields, has rejected the Spanish Government's convergence plan and urged other European Community countries not to use it as a model.

Finally, just one word about the situation in some countries which typify anti-democratic situations found in many countries.

In our neighbouring country, Morocco, political and trade union freedoms are repressed violently by the State itself. Proof of this is the recent detention and trial, without adequate guarantees, of the Secretary-General of the CDT, Nubir El Amavi, and the Regional Secretary of the UGTM, Driss Laghinimi.

In Peru, it is the President of the Republic himself who has violated the Constitution by suspending democratically elected institutions and concentrating power in his own hands, and at the same time engaging in a harsh and repressive campaign against the trade union organisations, which are already seriously threatened by the terrorism of the Shining Path.

The situation of Guatemalan workers is tragic. They are persecuted, tortured and assassinated by the military and paramilitary and their leaders an threatened with death.

Finally, the Spanish workers observe with interest and hope the development of the negotiations initiated in Madrid between the Government of Israel and the representatives of the Palestinian people and the Arab governments; we hope that they will lead to a satisfactory result with the restitution of the territories occupied in 1967 and mutual recognition of the States of Israel and Palestine.

Mr. ROBERTS (Employers' delegate, Fiji) – I have the honour to present to the President the congratulations of the Fiji Employers' Federation on the occasion of his election to chair this session of the Conference.

I report with pleasure the return to the International Labour Conference of a full delegation from the Government of Fiji after an absence of some six years. The reasons for the absence have been explained by the leader of our Government delegates to an earlier sitting of the Conference and as time is short I shall not duplicate his efforts.

Suffice it to say that the Fiji Employers' Federation is delighted to be again with the International Labour Conference and to renew friendships with former colleagues. We look forward with confidence to continuing to play our part in the deliberations of the session on an annual and ongoing basis.

The Director-General's Report has proved to be a most provoking document, containing many references of critical interest to those concerned with the ongoing development of human resources. The ILO's commitment to broad-based development in this area has to be one of the most significant programmes of all the international agencies and finds a sympathetic chord with our organisation's objectives.

The question relating to democracy is appropriate in the case of Fiji. Whilst we applaud the tremendous growth in the number of countries participating in the democratic process, I am particularly happy to report that my country completed its free elections only 17 days ago after a five-year period under an interim government appointed after military coups in 1987.

The new members of Parliament have subjected themselves to the public scrutiny of the electors at the ballot box and, while Parliament has not yet been assembled, we can state with confidence that the democratic process is alive and well in Fiji.

There has been criticism of our new Constitution, adopted in 1990, with some people demanding its revision to remove the parliamentary superiority given to ethnic Fijians. One hopes that the critics of Fiji will now be silenced as they see the parliamentary process again take effect.

Fiji has a mixed population of diverse backgrounds and cultures and yet we generally manage to get along pretty well together. In Fiji, neighbour helps neighbour, regardless of colour or creed – certainly an enviable attitude when one views the intolerable relationships existing in many other parts of the world and which are daily vividly brought to our attention by the electronic media.

While we expect that there will be understandable delays and readjustment as the new administration finds its feet in its new democratic environment, undoubtedly Fiji is headed for a period of new and sustained growth.

With the successful passage of the elections, we can look forward to increased investment from both local and foreign sources as investor confidence is assured. There is sustained interest in the tax-free factory scheme, encouraging export-related enterprises. This assists in continued employment creation.

Before the elections, the interim government set in motion plans to establish a wider taxation base through the introduction of a value-added tax and lower personal and corporate tax rates through major financial reforms. The introduction of these measures is welcomed by employers and it is to be hoped that the new government will persevere with the plans. The fair repayment for effort is essential to the promotion of increased productivity.

A further dramatic move was the corporatisation of several government departments, including the lucrative telecommunication and postal service.

I refer to anticipated sustained growth patterns in our economy, but I should give an account of Fiji in the intervening years since the bloodless coups.

The coups were as much a shock to us as to our neighbours, but it must be acknowledged that they arose not through anarchy or social turmoil or financial disaster but through unease and disquiet at the prospect of the indigenous race losing control of their country's destiny – a fear not unique to Fiji.

In the face of a rapidly declining economy caused by the coups, the interim government initiated radical programmes to overhaul the economy. Previously entrenched protectionist systems were removed in a total commitment to deregulation, and in the recovery process all sectors of the economy were encouraged to adopt free-market philosophies.

The policies paid off at a time when many other countries were experiencing general economic recession. These policies gave Fiji advantages including: foreign reserves in excess of five months' imports; a GDP which at current factor cost has increased by F$576 million, or slightly in excess of 40 per cent in the past four years; a GDP per capita which at current cost factor rose by one third to more than F$2,600; in the same period, a total external debt which fell by F$121 million, or 22 per cent; a recorded paid employment which rose by 26 per cent, from 71,000 at the end of 1987 to in excess of 90,000 at the end of 1991; a number of registered employers which increased by 20 per cent to 11½ thousand.

The interim Government recognised that, if its deregulation policies were to succeed and if Fiji were to maintain its international competitiveness, there had to be a corresponding adjustment to correct the industrial malaise which over the years had perpetrated a rigidity of processes inside and outside the tripartite system.

The setting of statutory guidelines was abandoned and free collective bargaining reintroduced. Workers were free to demand what they thought they were worth and employers were free to pay what they thought the workers were worth. Clearly, the aspirations on both sides do not always coincide and machinery is in place to help solve differences.

Labour reforms were introduced, not popularly received by the trade unions, although full access to the consultative process was given to them, as to employers, through the tripartite Labour Advisory Board. The reforms resulted in the power of a few very strong trade union leaders being effectively reduced and control of the trade unions being handed back to the rank and file members.

Since some trade unionists entertained significant political ambitions and cherished thoughts of redress and revenge against those involved in the earlier coups, it suited their agenda to rush off around the world crying injustice and inequality, whereas in real terms the labour reforms had made them more answerable to the membership they presumed to represent.

They attempted to muster support for their opposition to the reforms in Australia, New Zealand, the USA and UK, Brussels and, dare I mention, also in Geneva.

Many overseas unions heeded the cries of their brother unionists without first checking the realities of the situation, and felt justified and empowered to undertake misguided industrial action against Fiji, thereby creating problems predominantly affecting their brothers in Fiji.

While there remains a complaint against Fiji in the ILO system, Fiji's employers hope that the matter will be satisfactorily and speedily resolved.

I propose to mention some features of the labour reforms to indicate to delegates that we are not referring to severe and draconian measures.

The compulsory aspect of the collection of union dues by the employer was removed, and the voting processes on matters such as the election of officials, decisions to take industrial independent scrutiny by officials.

As a result the bargaining position between employer and trade union is now on a more realistic basis than ever before, and employment numbers continue to rise, contrary to international trends.

While it is perhaps appropriate for some union officials to present circumstances in a manner which disguises their bias, there is no doubt that there have been severe distortions of circumstances in reference to Fiji.

The real facts that some trade unionists have chosen to gloss over or ignore, is that the tripartite system in Fiji has continued, although modified from the earlier full-blown embrace of the mid-70's institution called the Tripartite Forum, by Government, employers and workers. In its time the Tripartite Forum attracted much favourable international comment.

There are many government bodies, statutory and other organisations administered by boards of non-executive individuals appointed by one or another government minister.

For years the appointments made to these boards have included trade union leaders and this practice has not varied, although individual posts may have changed at the end of their mandate.

To illustrate further that tripartism continues in Fiji, I advise that immediately following the close of this session of the Conference, the entire Fiji delegation travel to Singapore to meet with another tripartite team from Fiji for the purpose of studying Singapore's Flexiwage System of productivity-related wage-fixing mechanisms. Here I would like to recognise the kind co-operation of the Singapore National Employers Federation, the National Trades Union Congress, and the Singapore National Productivity Board, and the financial assistance of the ILO's subregional office in Fiji.

The purpose of this tripartite mission is to determine whether Flexiwage offers a better method of adjusting annual increases in wages and salaries.

There has been no difficulty in attracting senior trade unionists to participate in this programme, demonstrating a clear willingness on their part to ignore personal political advantage to the benefit of their trade unions and their members.

I believe that as tripartism has existed in Fiji in one form or another for many, many years, perhaps there may shortly be a move again to recognise the system of a more formal manner. I believe that our presence at the ILO this year is the beginning of that procedure.

Original – French: Mr. LOUNIS KHODJA (Employers' adviser, Algeria) – On behalf of the General Union of Algerian Employers, we would like to greet all delegates present here and to congratulate the President most warmly on his election to the Chair of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We are sure that he will be successful in this high office, given his proven abilities and his great experience in the world of work.

We would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne for the remarkable Report which he has drawn up this year on the subject of democratisation. We are particularly happy to extend our deep thanks to him and to share in his extremely lucid analysis of both the general guidelines and the major objectives on which the ILO's future activities should hinge. We will try, at least in part, to respond to what has been said by the Director-General of the ILO based on our own experience.

In difficult socio-economic conditions, Algeria is seriously and with conviction trying to build a State based on the rule of law, as part of a process which involves a transmission from a planned to a market economy.

Today our country is fully committed to a wide-ranging reform programme which affects all areas of national life and which is designed to avoid the resurgence in any form of violations of human rights, the stifling of the freedoms and rights of the press, freedom of expression and of organisation, the curtailment of the spirit of initiative and creativity and the right to free enterprise, discrimination based on sex, age, religion and political opinion or attacks against the security of property or persons.

This innovative programme, which is a programme of democratisation and in line with international trends towards the eradiction of the last bastions of authoritarianism, totalitarianism and racism, is not an easy one – given the fact that the democratic, economic and social aspects of development policy are intrinsically linked and, indeed, are inseparable.

It is a very complex process hampered not only by the pervasive effects of an unprecedented economic crisis, but by the unnatural coalition which has arisen between fundamentalism and outdated forces which are hostile to the current reforms.

Because we are well aware of what is at stake in terms of the democratic and republican future of Algeria, we call on the international community to take a stronger stand in its attitude to organisations which not only advocate but actually employ violence and terrorism to impose political change.

Today Algeria stands in great need of solidarity and help if it is to make lasting progress along the path to democracy. It is to be hoped that misunderstandings which have arisen here and there will rapidly disappear.

In the case of Algeria, we must realise that fundamentalism is the product of the anti-democratic single party single creed system, a planned economy and society and the extreme marginalisation of young people who feel that they have no future.

That is why the consolidation of our democratic achievements, which are still fragile, will have to be accompanied by institutional and socio-economic support to restore hope and trust to both workers and employers and to particularly vulnerable social groups.

And what can Algeria do? We are country which has formidable assets in terms of mineral, energy and human resources, perfectly solvent in the medium term and yet we have to spend, in this period of structural adjustment, three-quarters of our export income on the servicing of the debt.

How will it be possible for us, with a population of 25 million people and only 3 billion dollars left after paying our debts, to satisfy the vital needs of our people in terms of food, clothing, housing, education, training, health and employment and at the same time ensure that our production and service enterprises can operate correctly when those enterprises are dependent on external markets for almost all their inputs?

We see here the development gap which exists, reflected in the divorce between the economic and social aspects of development.

This kind of contradiction, which is not at all an easy one to resolve, is an everyday fact of life in developing countries.

We are convinced that it is impossible to resolve this problem unless the international community makes a collective effort. It is vital to do this and such a move will testify to the fact that humanity is moving towards a future of democracy, progress, justice and peace.

In the light of what I have said, we feel that the ILO is at the moment at the crossroads. The ILO has to be ready to shoulder all its tasks in the very difficult international economic situation which prevails and in which, as the Director-General has forcefully and rightly pointed out, the ILO has to act without delay so that the serious dangers which threaten democracy during periods of transition or during the structural adjustment programmes can be removed rapidly.

Hence we are looking to the ILO to reconsider the priorities which it has identified and to adapt them so that its activities can be more efficient and more credible.

It should in particular strive towards: setting standards which are both realistic and flexible so as to take account of the serious restraints which affect employment, productivity and production in terms of both quantity and quality; encouraging further ratifications and respect by all of the ILO's fundamental Conventions, particularly Nos. 87, 98, 111 and 144, which lie at the very heart of the democratisation process; working for the expansion of truly free and independent workers' and employers' organisations; promoting the spirit of enterprise and helping in the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises; promoting multi-faceted education and training programmes which develop human resources and do what has to be done in terms of industrial restructuring and manpower redeployment – vital to structural readjustment; and being further involving in the international aspects of development, by correctly assessing the serious economic problems which have to be resolved – problems whose continued existence will adversely affect social justice in the future.

We need the ILO to be more present, more active and more dynamic on the international stage.

We need the ILO to be more enterprising and to bring greater pressure to bear so that international solidarity, which is so much needed by developing countries, becomes both a moral and an economic imperative.

We need the ILO to establish links with such important institutions such as the IMF and the IBRD on an organised and sustainable basis, because this will help to bring about fruitful cooperation which can release our countries from the burden of crushing foreign debt and from the tragic restrictions we face in terms of access to credit.

We need the ILO to have up-to-date and properly adapted methods, and to integrate its objectives and tasks as greatly as possible, thereby ensuring the smooth operation of all its structures and subsidiary bodies – particularly the International Training Centre of the ILO in Turin has to be looked at very carefully.

We need the ILO to continue everywhere to defend fundamental rights and a more active contribution to eliminating trouble spots and hotbeds of tension which affect the international scene.

We call for a continuation of the ILO's efforts in the final dismantling of apartheid and also hope to see justice done to the Palestinian people and to their just cause; indeed, we feel that greater and stronger solidarity has to be shown in this respect. The ILO has already achieved a great deal but it should now continue to support the peace process which is under way and should discourage all those in Israel and elsewhere who are trying to see this process fail.

We must strongly support the combat which is being fought by the Palestinian people under the leadership of the PLO in order quickly to arrive at a lasting peace ensuring the existence of all the States in the region within safe, recognised and guaranteed frontiers....

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Decosterd) – I must ask you to interrupt your speech. I give the floor to Mr. Elgar, Government adviser, Israel, on a point of order.

Mr. ELGAR (Government adviser, Israel) – I think the speaker knows quite well that the Selection Committee decided that the special sitting which took place yesterday would be devoted to the question of the Palestinian workers in the territories. This has already taken place.

At the same time the Selection Committee decided – and this was approved by this Conference – that no further mention would be made of this subject during the general debate. So I ask that the speaker be instructed accordingly.

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) – Mr. Lounis Khodja, would you please now continue with your statement, bearing in mind what we have just heard, that is to say refraining from referring to the subject discussed yesterday.

Original – French: Mr. LOUNIS KHODJA – In conclusion, we would like to say that we are very proud to belong to the ILO and that we hope to see it playing a larger role in the future and meeting the challenges which have to be met, thus enhancing its credibility, its moral authority and its influence throughout the world.

Mr. ESAU (Workers' delegate, Namibia) – At the outset, allow me to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to high office at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that under their enlightened leadership, our work will be crowned with success.

My congratulations are also addressed to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for the quality of his Report, devoted to democratisation and the role which the ILO is called upon to play in linking the process of economic development and social justice.

It is correct that democracy is strengthened by the institutions which facilitate and encourage participation in public affairs. It is equally correct that democracy is not able to function properly in an economic order that is not capable of satisfying the basic needs of a nation.

With the global change to democratisation, hopes for greater well-being and better security of existence has been the order of the day.

Namibia's attainment of national independence was a passport to democracy which took root during the first quarter of 1990. We can proudly say that the product of our long and bitter struggle has brought about an environment conducive to a democratic transformation, from a colonial to a democratic sovereign society.

Democracy has gradually gathered momentum and strength with the scrapping of discriminatory and racial legislation in Namibia.

It is with pride that I mention that the new legal order guarantees trade union and human rights to all Namibians, irrespective of gender, religion, colour of skin or ethnic origin. Having enjoyed those trade union and human rights, it is our wish that they should be shared by all the working people of the world. It is in that light that as members of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council (SATUCC), the National Union of Namibian Workers (NUNW) would like to join in the call for the guarantee of trade union and human rights and the immediate release of brother Chakufwa Chihana the Secretary-General of SATUCC, who is presently detained by the Malawian authorities.

It is imperative to share with you some of the developments related to labour and human resources development in Namibia.

The NUNW has been a partner in the process of drawing up the new Labour Code of Namibia, which was promulgated by the Namibian Parliament in March 1992. This being a document that came through consultations and consensus, the union is determined to give it a chance as a way to stimulate development through economic growth.

Having completed the Labour Code, we have embarked on a new process of consultations and negociations to draw up legislation on affirmative action While the Consutution of Namibia calls for the application of affirmative action in employment, there is still misinterpretation in certain quarters as to its meaning. The new Act will give us procedures for implementing affirmative action without destabilising the socio-economic system.

Here again the workers, as a social partner, are prepared to give their constructive advice to the process.

The Namibian workers have been part of the tripartite team in drawing up the vocational training bill which is now in the process of being tabled in our Parliament.

Other work involved the drafting of the nationa vocational training policy and the national vocationa training testing and certification system, which hav been approved by our Cabinet.

While enjoying the goodwill and recognition of th Namibian Government, we are aware of the arduou task before us. Having just emerged from a situatio where a trade union movement was part of the liberation movement, we are faced with new realities first and foremost, to stand as a trade union movement and to build capacities.

Further, the Constitution of the Republic of Namibia has established the basis for the rule of law i compliance with universally acceptable judicial practice. It further established institutions which independently represent each of the three branches o government and paved the way to a political multiparty system and equality before the law for all citizens.

The workers of Namibia, as social partners an pillars of democracy, express their great concer about the slow progress of economic developmen The Namibian economic order is still strongly affected by the ills of the apartheid South Africa economy. The Namibian economy has been developed as a "fifth province" economy of South Africa This means that our economy is not independent bu closely connected to that of South Africa. For example, South African banks and financial institution are operating in Namibia, due to the fact that Namibia does not have an independent monetary polic and control.

Together with Botswana, Lesotho and Swaziland Namibia is part of the Southern African Custom Union which controls imports and exports to thes countries. Therefore, we are still subjected to th regulations of the Southern African Custom Unior These stringent regulations prevent Namibia fron starting industries which will compete with South African industries. It also prevents foreign investment and the opening up of new markets for Namibian products.

Our goal is to consolidate our young democracy by improving the quality of life for our people. This includes health and social welfare, housing for all, land redistribution, enough food for all, job creation, and education and training. Our people need to be empowered to take control of all aspects of their lives; and we need to promote greater equality between men and women.

Presently, Namibia is still suffering from the legacy of apartheid and colonialism as well as the consequences of the war of national liberation. Market forces alone will not be able to overcome those legacies. We need the international community to play an active role in securing the maintenance of the democratic systems in Namibia and to enhance economic development so as to address the social injustices which have been inherited from colonial South Africa.

The Namibian economic order is still characterised by a high rate of unemployment, high inflation, low economic growth and a high rate of population growth.

The Director-General's Report makes reference to the fact that employment is the principal means of providing for immediate needs, of satisfying the desire for personal development. The working people of Namibia are stongly committed as social partners to play their role actively in giving material effects to all the challenges that are faced by our fragile democratic culture.

This Conference should take note of the fact that Namibia's only deep sea port, Walvis Bay, is still under the illegal occupation of the colonial apartheid South African regime. The immediate and unconditional return of the deep sea port will constructively contribute towards the fight against the obstacles to Namibian economic development: we regard these obstacles as a factor of democratic destabilisation. This port, if in Namibian hands, could be at the disposal of the landlocked neighbouring States, thereby enhancing regional cooperation and economic development.

To this end, may I conclude by saying that assistance should be extended to new democracies in order to make it possible for every person to obtain a job and to carry on independently an occupation in which skills are acquired through training.

I would also like to extend our profound gratitude to the ILO on the tremendous assistance to the working people of Namibia since independence. The assistance ranges from the reduction of gross inequalities dereived from the past racial discrimination with respect to access to socio-economic opportunities and productive employment; workers' education; occupational safety and health; equality of opportunity in employment; employment of women; and social security and protection.

Finally, I wish to air the voice of the Namibian workers to all peace-loving peoples in calling upon the apartheid South African regime to remove all obstacles towards a democratic interim government which will lead the country to a democratic non-racial South Africa.

Lastly, I hope that this session of the Conference will help to bring about a worthy ideal.

Original – French: Mr. BONGELI (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Zaire) – At the outset I should like, on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Zaire, the delegation which I have the honour to preside, and on my own behalf, to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to head the work of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am fully convinced that under their inspired leadership the deliberations of this meeting will be successful.

I should also like to thank the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and all the offiicals of the ILO, for the constructive work they are accomplishing in the service of the world of work in order to promote peace and social justice on our planet.

Part I of the Director-General's excellent Report refers to a topical matter on which we are all focused, namely the role of the International Labour Organisation in the democratisation process.

The delegation of the Republic of Zaire believes that the changes that have occurred in the world over the past few years have created new challenges for the ILO. Certainly the political liberation of the Eastern European countries has brought about immediate results, particularly earth-shattering for the monocratic regimes in the developing countries, and especially for those in Africa. These regimes are currently confronted by an unexpected explosion of their peoples who are clamouring for liberty and democracy. As a result, the transition period in Africa is studded with violent incidents which have caused a number of observers to speak of the danger that is threatening democracy.

Indeed, the exercise of true democracy requires effective measures that work and are heeded, to strengthen the unity of the people and their ability to judge and to choose. It also requires the appropriate means to carry out credible opinion polls, and the legal means to ensure respect for democracy.

Zaire believes that the ILO should reinforce its action in the field of training people for democracy in order to help the people in the countries concerned to cope with the problems involved in democratisation through dialogue, concerted action and compromise.

We also believe that the ILO should contribute to the establishment of tripartism in the countries which are at present restructuring their social and economic structures, particularly through contacts with professional associations and trade unions that are now emerging. Our Organisation should defend, as far as possible, the values of liberty and human dignity and contribute to the reduction of tension throughout the world by ensuring, at the highest possible level, continuous cooperation amongst its members in the pursuit of its aims.

It is therefore with just cause that the delegation of the Republic of Zaire greets the initiative taken by the Organisation of African Unity who convened last month in Dakar, the Pan-African Conference on the mastering of democracy. The principal objective of this conference was to direct and shape the evolution of the process of democratisation in certain countries where the transition is the cause of daily confrontations.

Since 24 April 1990, and after popular consultations, Zaire has been involved in the process of democratising its political and social institutions. In this connection, important reforms restoring political pluralism and trade union pluralism have been carried out in order to respond to the numerous aspirations of our people.

This political adjustment was accompanied by many violent clashes. The most crucial was the systematic destruction of the national industrial establishment carried out in September and October 1991. The consequence of these unfortunate acts accentuated the crisis of an already ailing economy and resulted in a massive loss of jobs. In other words, on the economic and social level, Zaire is in a very serious state.

However, in view of the unshakable desire to create the foundations for a new, more democratic, society, the people of Zaire have now gathered in a national, sovereign conference to reflect upon their destiny.

This forum, which will define the foundations on which to build the third republic, has already begun its examination of our 32 years of independence.

However, the people of Zaire are conscious of the fact that democracy cannot be instituted with the mere wave of a magic wand. It is a process that is long and sometimes difficult, and one that has to be worked on every day. We believe that the present situation in our country is proof of our need for greater assistance from our partners in order to support our democratisation efforts.

Zaire adheres fully to the principle of the International Labour Organisation whereby the main requirement for socio-economic democracy is the existence of trade union and employers' organisations, alongside the Government.

To this day, some 60 trade unions have been registered at the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare.

In this connection, with the help of existing occupational organisations, my Government has initiated various measures to permit the setting up of new unions throughout the national territory. Elections are also due to take place after the Sovereign National Conference in order to determine the most representative trade union.

The second part of the Report of the Director-General, concerning the activities of the Organisation in 1991, sets out the achievements during this period in different parts of the world.

The delegation of Zaire is happy to note that, as in the past, more than half of the expenditure on technical cooperation has been devoted to Africa.

Zaire hopes most sincerely that the ILO will be able to diversify technical cooperation projects for Africa and thus increase the ordinary budget devoted to it as most of the countries of the African continent are now facing an economic crisis with dramatic social implications.

But in my own country already, the Government has reacted to the consequences of diminishing employment by consultating with the social partners to establish special measures to stimulate the economy, including even tax relief for those economic operators who have been damaged by the painful events of September and October 1991. However, because of the immensity of the problems, the Government's action is scarcely perceptible.

In the face of this challenge, Zaire is continuing to develop the informal labour sectors.

This is the setting in which we expect assistance through international cooperation so as to stimulate and give support to the employment possibilities that are being created throughout the national territory.

This is the case of non-governmental organisations and mutual societies which reflect the dynamism of the people of Zaire but which have need of financial assistance to survive and to provide training for the managers of employment-generating projects.

The other question on the agenda will be examined in detail at the level of specialised committees of the Conference. However, I should like to refer briefly in the assembly to some of them.

As to the draft project for a Convention on the protection of workers' claims in the event of insolvency of their employer, Zaire has already solved part of the question raised by article 91 of its Labour Code. It did not consider it necessary within the framework of current conditions to adopt Part III of the draft with reference to a creation of a guarantee institution.

As to prevention of industrial disasters, the delegation of Zaire believes that, in order to minimise the risk of major disasters and to protect the worker, the population and the environment, well-defined measures must be taken. To this end, a compilation of practical directives for the prevention of major industrial accidents published last year by the ILO remains a very important reference document.

As to the adjustment and use of human resources, we should note the perverse effects of structural adjustment in the employment sector in so much as many enterprises that are subject to productivity criteria reduce the number of jobs on account of lack of new investment, with resulting practically generalised unemployment in the country.

My Government believes that the specialised training of workers must be given special emphasis, as without appropriate training the redeployment of a worker who has lost his employment is not an easy thing.

Zaire expects our Organisation to be its interpreter and advocate with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in order to alleviate the conditions for the obtaining of credit.

That is why we are convinced that each member country of our Organisation should profit from its specific situation to generate employment and protect its workers through the adoption of appropriate statutory texts.

As to the implementation of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, Zaire is convinced that the pursuit of internal negotiation and the support of the international community will overcome this odious system so as to achieve a just and prosperous multiracial society in that country. My country remains favourable to allowing the professional organisations of that country to join the International Labour Organisation with a view to assisting it to become a state of law.

May the current session of the Inernational Labour Conference reaffirm solidarity between nations with a view to constructing a world that is more just, wherein reign social peace and human dignity.

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) – We have come to the end of the debate of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

You were 299 who participated in the debate. This is an absolute record in the annals of our Conference.

On behalf of the Officers and the President, I should like to thank you all for two reasons. Firstly, the quality of your statements which were in conformity with the directives recalled by our President at the outset of the Conference, and secondly, we have appreciated the fact that you facilitated our task by respecting the limit in the length of speeches. You have therefore confirmed the saying that the longer a speech the less depth it has.

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE. Tomorrow, we shall hold a special sitting on apartheid. This sitting will take place throughout the day. On Friday, theoretically, we should not have a plenary sitting. I would ask you nevertheless to check with the daily bulletin as to eventual changes.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ACTION AGAINST APARTHEID: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We now come to the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. I would like to invite Mr. Hernandez, Employer member, Philippines, Employer Vice-Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Brett, Worker member, United Kingdom, Worker Vice-Chairman of the Committee and Mr. Halinen, Government delegate, Finland, Reporter of the Committee to come up to the rostrum.

I request Mr. Halinen, the Reporter, to be so kind as to present the report of the Committee.

Mr. HALINEN (Government adviser, Finland; Reporter of the Commitee on Action against Apartheid) – Allow me first of all to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

As Reporter of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, I have the honour to present to the Conference the Committee's report, which is found in Provisional Record No. 21.

At its opening sitting the Committee elected as its Chairman Mr. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare, Zimbabwe, and as its Vice-Chairmen Mr. Hernandez, Employers' adviser, Philippines, and Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom, and myself as Reporter.

The Committee set up a tripartite Working Party of 15 members with equal representation to prepare the conclusions of the Committee. I acted as Chairman of the Working Party.

In accordance with its mandate, inter alia, of monitoring action against apartheid, the Committee examined the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa. A further document complemented the Special Report and provided a brief summary of the principal events concerning labour matters which have occurred in South Africa since the preparation of the 1992 Special Report.

The Committee also had before it information supplied by governments and by employers' and workers' organisations on action taken against apartheid; it also had the conclusions of the meetings of the Group of Independent Experts, the report of the Committee on Discrimination, and the report of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa which took place in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 5 to 8 May 1992.

The Committee held six sittings in which it heard over 30 important and thoughtful interventions. The debate focused on the assessment of the situation in South Africa and was comprehensive, open and frank in nature. The report reflects the Committee's deliberations and contains specific conclusions adopted by the Committee.

The Committee's report and conclusions can be seen as a resolute condemnation of apartheid and a clear call for the creation of a non-racial, democratic South Africa. The conclusions express concern of the fact that negotiations on CODESA II have failed to lead as yet to an agreement on a new Constitution for South Africa, and that recent developments in South Africa have not been conducive to the negotiations called for by the United Nations General Assembly resolution 46/79A. The conclusions urge the parties concerned to make every effort to conclude such an agreement and to set up as soon as possible a non-racial democratic interim Government.

Without going further into details of the content of the report and its conclusions, I should like to mention that the conclusions take note of the report of the ILO's Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, held in Harare, and endorse the conclusions contained in that report. There are some further supplementary conclusions which appeared to be warranted by the developments since the Harare Conference.

The Committee adopted the report by consensus. At the request of the Government of the United States, the conclusions were adopted by a vote. The vote resulted in 922 votes for, 20 votes against, and 60 abstentions. The United States Government voted against the conclusions and the Governments of Portugal, the United Kingdom and Finland abstained.

As Reporter, I commend the report and its conclusions to this Conference for adoption.

Finally, I would fail in my duties if I did not extend my warm thanks to the Committee's skilful and patient Chairman, Mr. Nkomo, for his leadership and ability to conduct the work of the Committee. I also thank most warmly the determined Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Hernandez and Mr. Brett, the members of the Working Party, the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Abdel-Rahman, as well as Mrs. Perret-Ngûyen, Mr. Rubin, all their colleagues, and the secretaries and interpreters whose competence and tireless efforts are profoundly appreciated.

Mr. HERNANDEZ (Employers' adviser, Philippines; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – I convey most sincerely our warmest congratulations on Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues' election to the Presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference and express our best wishes for fruitful and successful deliberations. Once again the Committee on Action against Apartheid has worked hard to produce, not without some difficulty, a set of conclusions that to our minds will send an urgent message to the South African authorities to take all the necessary specific measures to speed up the process of negotiations toward the total and final eradication of apartheid and the creation of a truly democratic non-racial Government in South Africa.

At this juncture I would like to pay special tribute to all the members of the Committee, and in particular Mr. Nkomo, the distinguished Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe, Chairman, Mr. Brett, Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Halinen, Government representative of Finland, Reporter, for formulating and adopting the Committee's report and conclusions which most respectfully and most earnestly I commend to you for unanimous adoption.

In its report and conclusions contained in Provisional Record No. 21, the Committee expresses the hope that the parties concerned in South Africa will speed up and continue their negotiations and conclude an agreement on a new Constitution for South Africa within the shortest possible time-frame. Expressing its aversion to violence and its concern that turmoil and violence may impede the negotiations, the Committee expresses the hope that all segments and sectors of South African society will heed the call of the international community for the avoidance and cessation of such violence.

Like the marathon runner who pulls out all the stops and burns up all his energy as he nears the finishing line, the constituent members of this noble Organisation, all lovers of freedom and social justice, should strengthen their solidarity and redouble their efforts to help put an end to a regime of racism and inequality.

As the last mile is about to be completed it behoves the International Labour Organisation and the social partners to maintain the Declaration on Action against Apartheid and the Programme of Action, and to support the Committee's report which includes the Conclusions of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, held in Harare, to assist in the transition from discrimination to democracy in South Africa.

The sanctions in the Declaration on Action against Apartheid and in the Programme of Action must be maintained. Having said this, I request you to take note, as in previous years, of the reservations put forward by a very small minority of employers from such countries as the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany, the Netherlands, France, Italy, Switzerland, Israel and the Nordic countries, in respect of specific sanctions mentioned in the Declaration on Action against Apartheid and in the Programme of Action.

I must hasten to add, however, that these reservations do not indicate in any way a dilution or a diminution in employers' support, which I can certainly guarantee. There is a universal resolve to continue with renewed vigour the war against the abominable political system of apartheid.

In conclusion I appeal to all the members of the International Labour Organisation and to the constituent members present here today to adopt by consensus the Committee's report and conclusions and to relay to the Government and people of South Africa an urgent message that reaffirms our fidelity to the fundamental principle enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity" in a message that defines in clear, unmistakable terms the desire of the prestigious and respected International Labour Organisation to set up a strong infrastructure of democracy, freedom, equality and social justice in South Africa.

Fellow delegates, I associate myself with Mr. Halinen, the Reporter of the Committee, in asking for unanimous approval of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid contained in Provisional Record No. 21.

Mr. BRETT (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – I would like to begin by adding my voice to those paying tribute to our Committee Chairman, Mr. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of the Republic of Zimbabwe, who presided over our deliberations with experience and wisdom. He had to return to Zimbabwe on Tuesday but was unfailing in his desire to obtain a consensus in the Committee and more particularly in this Session of the Conference. I would also like to express the gratitude of the Committee for the services of our Reporter, Mr. Halinen. His was a difficult task, particularly during the deliberations of the working party, but he brought to that task the experience of logic for which our Nordic colleagues had been rightly commended over many years. I would also like to pay particular tribute to Mr. Hernandez and his colleagues in the Employers' group. They were a tower of strength and without their contribution we could not have arrived at the conclusions we are now putting before you.

The Committee had as its introduction to the debate the conclusions of the Harare Tripartite Conference held in Zimbabwe from 5 to 8 May, the breakdown of the Codesa II talks, and the report of the Director-General.

The Committee was clear in its deliberations. The responsibility for the breakdown of the CODESA II talks lies with the National Party of South Africa and its refusal to accept compromise on the question of the majority required in a constitutional assembly.

In an era when many constitutional changes require no more than a majority decision of the citizens of a country and a two-thirds majority is the norm for those decisions considered to be of overwhelming constitutional importance, the South African Government's demand for a 75 per cent majority clearly demonstrates in our view their unwillingness to subject themselves to the democratic test and to accept the will of the electorate. There is a suspicion, nay a fear, that the South African Government wishes to see the removal of the appearances of apartheid while retaining the power and privilege gained through the apartheid system. Therefore our Committee on Action against Apartheid, after lengthy discussion, has arrived at the conclusion that maximum international pressure and sanctions in line with United Nations resolution 46/79A must continue until the apartheid system has been fully eradicated.

I am sure everyone in this hall wishes to see the end of apartheid. We only divide into the optimists and the pessimists. The employers are to be numbered amongst the optimists in that they believe this might be the last sitting of the Special Committee on Action against Apartheid. Some governments can only be described as super-optimists in that they are so confident they have already removed sanctions.

The Workers' group can be accused of being pessimists, though we would claim the mantle of realists. We see nothing to date that would persuade us that sanctions should not be maintained. A view we share with Mr. Mandela, who voiced similar sentiments during his recent visit to Scandinavia when he called for the maintenance of sanctions until a democratic government has been established in South Africa. On 8 June 1990 Mr. Mandela stood on this rostum and asked that we walk the last mile with him. Two years later that mile has not yet been completed and it is the de Klerk Government that is putting obstacles in the way of the completion of our journey. Our countermove to that obstacle should be to redouble our determination to see the total abolition of apartheid and I would wish to note that the policy of apartheid would not, in the workers' view, end with the scrapping of the apartheid laws, nor with the election of an interim government. There will still be work for the ILO to do.

As spokesman for the Workers' group, allow me to express our high appreciation to the Director-General on his excellent Report on the application of the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid in South Africa. The revelation of the Director-General that 14 apartheid laws remain on the statute book constitutes a severe denial to those who said that the pillars of apartheid had been removed. Among the remaining laws figuring prominently are the Electoral Act of 1979, which makes no provision for the voting rights of the Black population, and the Bantu Homeland Citizenship Act, whereby people living in the so-called Bantustans are foreigners in their own country of birth. The other discriminatory Acts relate to the discrepancies in the compensation for injury and sickness laid down by the Mines and Works Act; to education with more spent on Whites than Blacks; to welfare, with Whites receiving large pensions and other social services while their Black colleagues receive little or nothing.

The report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association concerning the Republic of South Africa draws attention to the serious problems caused by the existence of 11 different sets of labour-related legislation in the various territories into which South Africa is currently divided. The Commission urged the Government to address these problems with a view to ensuring that workers and employers throughout these territories enjoy the basic rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining.

The South African Government should take urgent measures to implement the conclusions and recommendations of the Commission, and we urge the Director-General to follow up and report on progress made in this direction to the Economic and Social Committee of the United Nations.

For the Workers' group there is not a shadow of doubt that apartheid still remains in place, and I need not repeat the arguments developed by the representatives of COSATU and NACTU who addressed our Committee and pleaded for continued support by the ILO in their struggle against apartheid. There are a number of facts that we believe need re-telling.

Firstly, despite the agreements signed between the parties concerned, there are still, by our estimate, some 450 political prisoners held in South African prisons.

Secondly, the failure of the South African Government to take appropriate measures in accordance with the provisions of the National Peace Accord and curb the violence has left 14,000 people dead. That, in our view, demonstrates a lack of commitment on the part of the South African Government to take its full responsibility as a Government to ensure peace and security in the townships, and indeed the whole country.

This latter assertion is confirmed by the 100-page report of Amnesty International on the security forces' complicity in torture and political killings from 1990 to 1992. This report was released just after the termination of our general debate within the Apartheid Committee, or I am sure it would have featured largely in that discussion. It goes on to say that from March 1990 to the end of March 1992 alone, when indeed the world's media were focused on the drama of political negotiations, more than 7,000 people were killed, victims of large-scale attacks on communities, of targeted assassinations, of attacks by mysterious killers on commuter trains, of unprovoked shootings by the security forces. In March of this year, 400 people died during a surge of political violence which was particularly marked in the run-up to the 17 March all-White referendum.

The Amnesty International document relates the police involvement in the torture and death of detainees and the killing of unarmed demonstrators in the so-called independent homelands. It also details Security Force complicity in killings by Inkatha Freedom Party supporters in Natal and the Transvaal and their involvement in torture and political killings in the context of the Cape Town taxi war.

Other evidence of police involvement in the violence is the judgement delivered in April 1992 by the Natal Supreme Court on the Trust Feed massacre, President George Andrew Wilson concluding that Captain Brian Mitchell and four police special constables carried out the cold-blooded politically motivated murder of 11 men, women and children in 1988.

The Amnesty report concludes that ultimately, however, it is the Government which controls the resources and the security forces, and so it is under the obligation to take all possible steps to ensure that people can live peacefully and without fear within their own communities.

If the authorities continue to fail to intervene effectively and impartially when there is violence, and to make security forces accountable for their actions, then the prospects for a democratic transition in South Africa are seriously threatened. The hardening attitude of the Government is forcing the ANC and COSATU to revert to mass action, including marches, demonstrations, strikes, factory occupations, etc. In an attempt to shift the negotiating deadlock of Codesa, the ANC organised a mass rally last Tuesday to commemorate the 1976 Soweto uprising. The Government replied by asking half a million reservists to be put on stand-by in a move to intimidate the ANC, pushing the confrontation further. The Government also introduced a law in Parliament which would give the police extended powers to detain people without charge for interrogation purposes and the Attorney General authority to deny bail.

We believe it is important not to send the wrong signals from this Session of the Conference to the South African Government. During the work of the Committee we also examined, as I have said, the work of the Group of Independent Experts. Our Committee noted, with regret, that there was a decrease in the number and standard of replies to the ILO questionnaire. We regret that the European member States in particular declined to fulfil their responsibilities, and in that sense restricted themselves to a common reply. We all need to retain vigilance and determination, such as was shown in earlier years, and if we do so then we will shorten the last mile to be taken, with signals from this Session that will be taken quite clearly as disapproval of the South African Government and a call for further and urgent negotiations.

The conclusions and recommendations of the Commiteee on Action against Apartheid, we believe, reflect the aspirations of the majority of the population of South Africa. In measuring the value of our report, we can look at both the strength of the language and the breadth of support for it, because we believe it is crucial that our report has the broadest support. We have, with the assistance of the Employers, made a number of concessions in the text of the report to meet the sensitivities of the government. However, it remains a powerful indictment of the present situation in South Africa and a clear signal for the way forward. We would render the greatest service to democracy if we were to adopt the report and its conclusions unanimously. In doing so we would demonstrate our resolute condemnation of apartheid and endorse a clear call for an early negotiated political settlement, leading the creation of a unified, non-racial and democratic South Africa.

Finally, I would like to place on record the appreciation of the Workers' group for the effort of all members of the Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Abdel Rahman, his colleagues in the secretariat, and the interpreters. Their competence and devotion were an essential ingredient in the work of our Committee.

Finally, may I refer you to the final paragraph of our report, which is not a conclusion but an appeal, actually made in Harare on behalf of a trade union colleague, Mr. Chihana, incarcerated in Malawi without charges: a living reminder that injustice knows no boundaries. We ask you to join us today in demanding his release.

I commend to you the report and conclusions.

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT – Before we open the discussion on this report, I should like on behalf of the Officers of the Conference to express to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Nkomo, the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Hernandez and Mr. Brett, and to the Reporter, Mr. Halinen, our sincere thanks for the excellent work they have carried out.

Their work has been most fruitful and they have submitted a report of high quality.

We now move on to the general discussion.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity) – I would like, on behalf of African workers and the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, to express our appreciation to the Director-General for the high quality of his Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa.

I also congratulate the Chairman, Officers and members of the Commitee on Action against Apartheid for their report and conclusions.

Any unbiased person will see that some small progress has been made in South Africa on the eradication of apartheid since last year.

In appreciation of this small progress, the international community has awarded the de Klerk Government with more than it deserves by the partial lifting of sanctions. We are, however, concerned about the unnecessary haste with which some governments with vested interest in South Africa want the rest of the sanctions against it to be lifted, even when the de Klerk Government has little to show for it.

Need we remind those governments that the removal of apartheid laws from the Statute books in South Africa has not destroyed apartheid on the ground – even within the communities in housing, education, health and in governance.

The de Klerk Government is still minority, White, racist, undemocratic, corrupt and therefore illegitimate. The question of violence has not been properly addressed and reports hold the de Klerk Government as not only being responsible for the violence but also the chief financier and promoter. Violence is used by the minority regime of South Africa to delay the democratic process. We cannot therefore understand how a government that is reputed to be the best-armed in Africa, assisted by an array of security apparatuses, can claim to be powerless in stopping the township violence in South Africa. How can the minority Government of South Africa explain why there is an unprecedented increase in violence only in the Black communities that have offered the most resistance against the regime, like Soweto, Sharpeville, Sebokeng and Alexandra?

We are happy to note that in spite of attempts by the White judge who inquired into the cause of violence in South Africa to "whitewash the de Klerk Government of complicity in the township violence in South Africa", the recent report of Amnesty International on South Africa laid the blame for township violence securely on the de Klerk Government.

The other important aspects of the situation in South Africa that should be taken into consideration are the fact that the majority of South Africans still have no vote today and that there is no agreement on the mechanisms for the transfer of power.

The premature lifting of sanctions and the absence of sustained international pressure have contributed immensely to slow progress towards a non-racial democracy in South Africa. In order to move South Africa toward the final death of apartheid and the emergence of a non-racial united and democratic South Africa, the following steps should urgently be taken by the minority regime and all the parties and groups involved in the CODESA negotiations: an immediate end to township violence; the immediate formation of an interim government with a Black majority; an election of a constitutional assembly by all South African adults of voting age to draft a new non-racial, democratic Constitution for South Africa; the adoption by referendum of a new South African Constitution; and, finally, the non-racial election of a new South African Parliament based on the new Constitution.

Part of the existing sanctions can be lifted by the United Nations and the international community progressively as the above steps are taken in South Africa. It will then be left to the new non-racial, democratic South Africa to tackle the enormous social and economic problems brought about by decades of oppression and exploitation of the Black majority through apartheid – these include education, housing, health and employment.

We are proud that the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity affiliates, namely, COSATU and NACTU, have played and continue to play a very active part in the process of the destruction of apartheid and the restoration of democracy, social and economic justice in South Africa. COSATU and NACTU should work fervently for the unity of the South African labour movement, so as to facilitate the early achievement of the above noble objectives.

We commend the ILO for its assistance to the workers and democratic trade unions in South Africa. We ask for an increase in ILO's technical assistance to these organisations at this critical juncture in South Africa's history. A non-racial, democratic South Africa will be a welcome member of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) and one of the main pillars of Africa's economic integration.

I, on behalf of African workers and the OATUU, support the adoption of the report and conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and commend it for your adoption.

Mr. KAILEMBO (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – On behalf of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, representing 110 million members from all over the world, I would like to express my overwhelming support for the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

I hope that the report of the Committee and its conclusions will be adopted by consensus, so as to send a message in clear and unmistakable terms to the South African Government that apartheid must be dismantled and replaced by a unified, non-racial and democratic South Africa.

I would also like to congratulate the Chairman, Mr. Nkomo, and members of the Committee for their dedicated work to advance the noble cause and ideals of freedom, democracy and social justice for the great majority of people still suffering under the abhorrent system of apartheid. Over the years, the work of this Committee has contributed significantly to consolidating further the ILO as a true abode for those who are struggling against exploitation, injustice and violation of trade union rights.

Unfortunately, the negotiation process at the Convention for a Democratic South Africa (Codesa) came to a halt on 15 May. The reluctance of the South African Government to hand over power to the majority and its proposal to entrench minority power to veto decisions in an elected Constituent Assembly were largely responsible for the breakdown of negotiations. Reinvigorated by the Whites-only referendum of 17 March, the National Party and its allies adopted a rigid position at the negotiating table and made proposals which would ensure that they continue to rule the country under the cloak of democracy.

The ICFTU, therefore, will continue to vigorously campaign against the South African regime and to call on the international community to exert maximum pressure, including sanctions in line with the United Nations resolution of 13 December 1991, in order to bring about an early abolition of apartheid. The ICFTU and its affiliates have been in the forefront of the struggle against apartheid. We have consistently supported the negotiation process, but have also emphasised that there can be no guarantee for the outcome of a genuine, non-racial democracy until a new Constitution, drawn up by the elected representatives of the people of South Africa, is in place.

Last year on this platform we said that the changes taking place in South Africa had not, as yet, affected most of the fundamental basis of apartheid. We warned the international community against too much optimism. Events have proved us right. We are dealing with a shrewd and vicious Government. But let me explain why we took that position and we still maintain it today.

Although a few apartheid-related laws have been repealed, some important ones still remain on the statute books. These include the Constitution Act of 1983, which provides for the tricameral Parliament, the Social Pensions Act, which lays down that White pensioners are paid more than Black, the Bantu Homelands Citizenship Act, which made Blacks alien in South Africa, and laws which continue to provide for racial, segregated education. Even the Population Legislation Act, a key legislative law for the application of apartheid, was only partially repealed in June 1991. Furthermore, the Internal Security Act was only amended; a person can still be detained for ten days without trial.

Hence, it is clear that apartheid has by no means come to an end. Mr. Cunningham Ngoukana, General Secretary of NACTU, told the Committee that it was important to maintain the existing measures against the regime as an indication that the international community would not be satisfied until apartheid was eradicated totally and a democratic constitution was in place. The determination of democratic trade unions in their fight against the brutal system of apartheid is remarkable and they deserve our fullest support.

After the collapse of talks at Codesa II there are signs of growing impatience and resentment among the workers. Mr. Jay Naidoo, General Secretary of COSATU, informed the Committee that his organisation had decided to embark upon a programme of mass action as from mid-July in order to break the political deadlock, based on its demands for an interim Government of national unity by the end of this month. The ICFTU fully supports the democratic trade unions of South Africa in their action to force the Government to abdicate power. It is perfectly understandable for voteless masses to demonstrate in the only ways available to them. If the Government does not respond to reason, it will have to respond to strong pressure which in turn should be supported by the international community.

The lack of good faith of the Government is further exemplified by the delaying tactics being used by it regarding the granting of basic workers' rights to its own employees in the public sector, and to the farm and domestic workers. Extension of labour legislation to cover farmworkers was one of the undertakings given by the Government in 1990. This commitment implies the extension to farmworkers of four basic pieces of legislation: the Labour Relations Act; the Basic Conditions of Employment Act; the Wages Act; and the Unemployment Insurance Act. Up to now, no concrete action has been taken by the Government. Hence workers in these three sectors continue to be denied basic rights.

Moreover, there have been numerous acts of violence and intimidation against trade unionists. The ICFTU strongly condemns the South African Government for its failure to take appropriate action to arrest and bring to justice the perpetrators of these acts of violence. Let me quote just a few examples of such cases.

In January, the house of NACTU's General Secretary, Mr. Cunningham Ngoukana, was raided by the police. Mr. Ngoukana was reported to have been threatened and his property damaged by the police. In March, police arrested and detained NACTU's President, James Mndaweni, for several hours. In February, the General Secretary of COSATU, Jay Naidoo, was reported to have made public substantial evidence of a plan by security forces to assassinate trade unionists. A key target was Moses Mayekiso, General Secretary of NUMSA. On 2 February, a grenade attack on the home of Sam Ntuli, an official of NUMSA, caused injuries to five people; Ntuli was subsequently killed by a group of gunmen on 29 September. A man was killed when the house of Sipho Cele, COSATU's Northern Natal Regional Secretary, was attacked in April. COSATU is reported to have said that there had been repeated attacks on Cele. Organisers of NEHAWU, Mike Myembeze and Humphrey Maxegwana in East London, claimed that they had been abducted in February at gunpoint.

There has been a series of collective arrests of trade unionists in the course of disputes, particularly following the November strike launched by COSATU and NACTU to protest against the introduction of VAT on basic foodstuffs. An estimated 175 members of NUM and SACCAWU members were arrested, mostly for participation in illegal marches, and 83 more NUM members were detained for alleged intimidation. On 18 November, 19 members of the chemical workers' union, SACWU, were arrested while picketing a Cape Town warehouse. The following day, 33 shop stewards of SACCAWU were held after a sit-in at the head office of Pick'n Pay. These, as I said, were only a few instances where freedom of association and trade union rights came under severe attacks. Hence, trade union organisation and recruitment activities were seriously undermined.

I wish also to share the concern of the Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the wave of violence which is sweeping the country. The failure of the Government to act effectively to curb the continuing and intensive violence, which has cost the lives of 14,000 people, has raised doubts about the Government's commitment as a responsible partner in the negotiation process. Only the day before yesterday, ten more people were killed in Soweto where the ANC was holding a mass rally to commemorate the 1976 uprising in an attempt to put pressure on the Government to resolve the political deadlock. Violence, which is becoming a common feature in South Africa, is claiming the lives of ten people every day. The ICFTU strongly condemns the South African Government for its unwillingness to take measures in accordance with the National Peace Accord to deal with the question of violence.

The ICFTU reaffirms its support for the legitimate struggle of the Black people of South Africa to abolish apartheid and to establish a united, non-racial and democratic South Africa in which all its people, irrespective of race, colour, sex or creed, will enjoy the same fundamental freedoms and human and trade union rights. Ending apartheid means majority rule in an undivided society.

Through the ICFTU Coordinating Committee on Southern Africa, which meets twice a year, with the participation of COSATU and NACTU, the ICFTU coordinates and maximises all forms of assistance to the independent trade unions, such as organisational, educational and institution-building projects which are sponsored at the request of democratic trade unions. Around 30 projects were implemented last year and will continue this year. The total annual budget for the ICFTU-coordinated programme in South Africa is around 18 millions rands.

The ICFTU also maintains a consolidated legal and relief fund for assistance to imprisoned and restricted trade unionists, for workers undergoing hardship during strike action against recalcitrant employers, to assist the unions fighting legal battles against employers who exploit apartheid and its laws, employers who dismiss workers en masse, the victims of violence. This fund has, over the years, enabled trade unions to fight and win recognition battles and win precedent-making cases which have assisted in the overall fight against apartheid.

The ICFTU Congress in Caracas, Venezuela, in March this year, adopted a resolution reaffirming our longstanding pledge and commitment to give maximum support to the democratic trade unions in South Africa, and to maintain maximum pressure as a lever to advance the process of change until a non-racial democratic government is established.

The Congress also called on the international community to respond positively in the transition and post-apartheid period to the need for a parallel programme of affirmative action to stimulate economic growth and job creation, and stressed that priority should be given to workers' education and training. The ICFTU supports the democratic trade union movement in the process of negotiations in a tripartite economic forum intended to restructure the economy and to attract new investment. Transnational corporations seeking to invest in South Africa should agree to abide by an investment code. This unified and comprehensive code, incorporating the minimum international labour standards, should assist in reconstructing the economy. The need for such a code was discussed at the last ICFTU Coordinating Committee meeting held in Geneva on 5 and 6 June with the participation of representatives of COSATU and NACTU.

The key to the successful transition to a democratic order lies within the country and is being determined by the Black majority. However, international pressure has had and continues to have a significant impact on the developments in South Africa. The ICFTU appeals to the international community to increase its material, financial and other contributions to the victims and opponents of apartheid to help them address the socio-economic inequalities in the fields of education, health, housing and social welfare.

I wish to take this opportunity to express our grave concern to the Malawi Government for the arrest and detention without charges of Chakufwa Chihana, Secretary-General of SATUUC since 6 April. We fully support the recommendation of the Committee that the Conference should send an appeal to President Kamuzu Banda, asking for the immediate release of Chakufwa Chihana and the opening of SATUUC offices.

In concluding, I would like to place on record my organisation's full support for the request expressed by Mr. Bill Brett, Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, that the report as contained in Provisional Record No. 21 be endorsed unanimously by the Conference to give the clearest possible message to the South African Government of the consequences of resisting the demand for a sovereign interim government now and a democratically elected Constituent Assembly by the end of this year.

Mr. GOMOMO (representative of the African National Congress) – I would like to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General for the tireless work the office has undertaken to make this meeting possible.

COSATU represents 1.5 million paid-up members and is the largest centre of organised workers in South Africa.

To all those committed to democratic change in South Africa, apartheid is not dead. Apartheid is still in place. The legacy of decades of White minority rule continues to devastate our people and the country. Political violence lays waste to our country, killing innocent men, women and children. Because of the partiality of the security forces, people have completely lost faith in the capacity of the police to act against the perpetrators of violence.

Therefore, our country continues to be wracked by violence of state-sponsored third-party vigilantes and conservative political organisations and the counter-violence of people who have to defend themselves. This comes amid major evidence of government involvement in murder and corruption.

The Government continues to restructure the economy unilaterally, increasing industrial conflict, as tens of thousands of workers are retrenched into the unemployed pool that already comprises 40 per cent of the workforce and is close to 6 million.

Linked to this is the political logjam in which the present regime blatantly pursues proposals at Codesa which are designed to perpetuate White minority rule. The notions of forced coalitions, revoking presidencies, veto rights for minority parties, make a mockery of universal principles of democratic transformation.

COSATU, the ANC and other democratic formations and our people as a whole will not accept the continued economic and political domination by a White minority. Two years have passed. Millions of our people live under the scourge of political violence and starvation. There is an urgency to our need for fundamental transformation.

We are demanding the establishment of an interim government of national unity and the holding of democratic, non-racial elections for a constitution-making body in this year.

If the present regime refuses to reach agreement with our negotiators by the end of June, then we are left with no option but to take a national mass action to break this political logjam. NACTU and COSATU are going to be at the forefront of this action.

This International Labour Conference has an important role to play in the final stage of our struggle against apartheid. International pressure, including the maintenance of existing sanctions, must be continued to compel the present regime to negotiate in good faith with the leaders of our people.

Secondly, technical assistance must be extended to those non-racial democratic organisations to ensure that the legacy of economic apartheid is addressed and that the playing field is leveled. We cannot allow a situation led by de Klerk to be both a play and a replay during the transitional phase. We are determined to ensure that these inequalities are addressed through a programme of economic reconstruction that involves bona fide negotiations between the key players in the economy.

Thirdly, economic development in South Africa can only be within a framework of the present respect of trade union and human rights. The report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Committee of the Governing Body is a prerequisite for establishing such a framework of labour standards. This is certainly a concrete role for the ILO to play in the future and even in the post-apartheid era.

In relation to foreign investment, COSATU has proposed an investment code for multinational companies to ensure that there is respect for such labour standards.

In conclusion, we wish to pay tribute to the ILO for all its work in support of our struggle for democracy in South Africa.

Our people are determined to win their freedom now. Nothing is going to stop our march to freedom, certainly not the intransigent de Klerk Government.

The challenge for those who support our just and legitimate struggle is whether you back our efforts to remove this crime against humanity – apartheid – from the face of the earth. Every delay, hesitation or reluctance means the difference between life and death for thousands of innocent men and women and children in South Africa. I wish to call upon the Conference to adopt the Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

Ms. PEDERSEN (Worker's delegate, Norway) – My address to this assembly is first of all to declare, on behalf of the Nordic trade unions, our support for the adoption by the Conference of the report and the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. It is our sincere hope that this report will be adopted by consensus.

As stated in the Special Report of the Director-General, a strategy is needed to deal with the realities of the present situation, and to face future challenges.

The report and the conclusions of the Committee represent a comprehensive approach to face the threats and the obstacles that still will have to be overcome in the process of change, and to give direction and assistance for the creation of a new, non-racial, democratic society in South Africa.

Although there have been some positive developments in South Africa, the apartheid system still remains. No major and irreversible change has taken place as regards the eradication of apartheid.

The South African Government is responsible for the standstill in the negotiations, reflecting their hardened attitude since the holding of the all-white referendum.

It is therefore important still to put maximum international pressure on the Government to ensure both the creation of an interim Government and the adoption of a new and democratic Constitution. In this regard, sanctions should be maintained, especially in respect of arms, oil and finances, in line with the policy of the United Nations. We are convinced that sanctions and international pressure, coupled with domestic, democratic opposition, have led to progress in terms of changes. The lifting of sanctions by industrialised countries, before the necessary conditions have been met, is to be regretted.

The Committee on Action against Apartheid underlines in its conclusions that a climate of free political activity cannot exist in an atmosphere of continued violence, such as exists in South Africa.

This violence is a human tragedy and a serious threat to the work for positive change in the country. The South African Government must take its full responsibility and introduce measures to fight violence and put an end to the bloodshed.

The South African authorities must further ensure the immediate release of all remaining political prisoners and provide for the unhindered return of political refugees and exiles.

The Special Report of the Director-General warns that "while changes have occurred, racial discrimination will undoubtedly persist until a new and democratic Constitution is in place; even then it is likely to take decades before the scars of apartheid are finally healed".

In a transition period and in a future post-apartheid South Africa, international assistance will be needed to ensure the reflection of political change into the economy and in social life.

In this respect, the conclusions of the Tripartite Conference in Harare form an important basis for future action.

They include the need to support the democratic trade unions and to strengthen workers' educational programmes; the establishment of a tripartite system and a tripartite body for negotiations; assistance in labour and industrial relations matters; and the development of a Code on Investments for South Africa. In this work the ILO has an important role to play.

Priority should also be given to a comprehensive programme for education and training of the black population to enable it to occupy crucial positions in different institutions and organisations in a non-racial and democratic country.

We fully support the conclusions relating to the social, economic and labour aspects of sub-regional integration in post-apartheid southern Africa. Here we want to emphasise the development of cooperation, in particular the cooperation between the trade unions in this region.

It was with sorrow that we learned of the arrest and detention of Chakufwa Chihana, General Secretary of the Southern African Trade Union Coordinating Council and the closing of the SATUCC office in Lilongwe, Malawi. We strongly support an immediate call from this Conference for his release and for the reopening of the office.

The Nordic trade unions have long taken an active interest in the work against apartheid; together with many other unions, we have been in the forefront of those supporting the building of strong, democratic trade unions in South Africa, an essential part of the South African anti-apartheid movement.

We will walk along with our friends in the trade unions and other democratic forces in South Africa in their efforts to put an end to the apartheid system, and will assist them in healing the scars from a brutal and repressive regime.

Let us all join in this effort.

Mr. MAKHANDA (representative of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania) – On behalf of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania (South Africa), I should like to congratulate Mr. Nascimento

Rodrigues on his unanimous election to the presidency of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I join the previous speakers who have lauded his reputation for diplomacy and his ability to foster consensus, which I believe he shall achieve.

Allow me also to extend our deep appreciation to the Director-General and the ILO for the unflinching and generous support we have always received in our struggle to eradicate apartheid. My delegation welcomed the observation the Director-General made on our situation when he delivered a statement in Addis Ababa recently.

May I now thank very much the Chairman of the Committee on Apartheid, the Honourable Mr. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe. His leadership both here and at the recently concluded Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa has been rewarding and very gratifying. He has evinced the qualities that have made him the true freedom fighter that he is. My thanks and appreciation extend further to Messrs. Hernandez and Brett, for whom I have great respect, and to those governments, especially of the front-line States like the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe, who have championed our cause. I would also like to express my special appreciation to Miss Hak, Employer representative from the Netherlands. Her interventions in the Committee have convinced me that she has the interests of all our people at heart. Last, but not least, permit me to thank the members of the secretariat and the Officers, who are always ready to help.

We come here before you once again, not as a people with a righteous disposition, but as victims whose cause we have found to be just and worthy of international support. We come to report what has transpired in the search for justice, peace and equity, which you have always supported for so many years. We, as victims of a policy that the majority of mankind has declared a crime against humanity, have rightfully made preference for its peaceful eradication, a preference which has always been ours from the beginning of our struggle. We have accepted this method hoping and believing it will redress centuries of dispossession and deprivation.

To this end, we called a gathering of all organisations and leaders in our country from 25 to 27 October 1991, to map out a peaceful strategy for negotiations that would enjoy national support. I should mention here that this call went even to White organisations and leaders of our country, who responded positively to the invitations.

On the said dates, 92 organisations composing a Patriotic United Front (PUF) met in Durban, South Africa. They represented political, labour, business and traditional leaders, Bantustans, and many other organisations and groups. It was the most historic and representative gathering that has ever been assembled under one roof in our country. For three days, open discussions were conducted under the full glare of the local and international media to formulate a National Programme for Peaceful Negotiations with the de Klerk regime.

At the end of the three days of public debate, a National Programme for Peaceful Negotiations was adopted unanimously without reservations by the 92 organisations. The salient points of the Programme are:

- an endorsement of negotiations;
- a call for negotiations to take place in a democratic forum with participants having a national mandate;
- a call for negotiations to be convened by a neutral party and at a neutral venue, and with the inclusion of independent facilitators;
- the objective of all these negotiations is to be the transfer of power from a minority regime to a democratically elected majority government;
- the mechanism for obtaining such a mandate and transfer must be through a constituent assembly, elected on the basis of one person, one vote, using a common voters' roll. This constituent assembly would then draw up a new non-racial and democratic constitution which will reflect the will of all the people of South Africa.

Having adopted the National Programme, the 92 organisations mandated the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania and the African National Congress to meet with de Klerk and work out details based on this programme.

On 29 November 1991 such a meeting did take place with the de Klerk regime. Aware of the united action of the oppressed, the regime sought to divide it by inviting its puppets from the Bantustans, 14 in all, to this meeting. The regime itself was represented by two delegations – the National Party plus the Government. De Klerk therefore managed to prepack this meeting with 16 votes on his side, votes of puppets that have never been recognised by the international community to this day. One of these Bantustans – the one administered by the military under General Holomisa – has since indicated that it is ready to have the Transkei reincorporated into South Africa after a referendum. We have welcomed this position, and we held our very successful Third Congress in its capital. De Klerk and his cohorts subsequently rejected the National Programme for Negotiations.

It would be of particular interest to this august body to know that at the 29 November 1991 meeting, the Pan-Africanist Congress, once it realised that de Klerk wanted to use numbers to thwart the people's will, demanded that both COSATU and NACTU, two of the national federations in our country who participate in an advisory capacity in the Committee on Action against Apartheid, be invited to participate in the meeting and in other subsequent meetings. This was outrightly rejected by de Klerk and his cohorts. We therefore had no option but to pull out of CODESA.

For a detailed report of the CODESA proceedings, please see my intervention made in Harare, contained in Provisional Record No. 4, 79th Session, paragraph 36.

We were convinced then, as we are now, that CODESA can never deliver a democratically elected government as it is currently constituted and operating. The failure of CODESA II vindicated our analysis. In essence, de Klerk in CODESA is playing the roles of judge, jury and prosecutor all at the same time. I want to inform you, however, that the PAC has continued bilateral talks with the regime, in accordance with the mandate of the Patriotic United Front. On 12 April 1992, at Abuja, Nigeria, under the auspices of the OAU Chairman, President Babangida, the PAC met with the de Klerk regime.

These talks are continuing so that we can get back to the national programme.

Allow me now to give the regime's position in its own words. Speaking in Parliament on 21 May, de Klerk's Deputy Constitutional Development Minister, Dr. Tertius Delport, had this to say regarding the breakdown of CODESA: "The breakdown of CODESA II had not been about mere percentages, but about basic differences of opinion over federalism and the representation of minority parties in the government executive." He further went on to say that "it is clear that the Government regarded federalism as an important basic principle that would have to be agreed to by CODESA and could not be left to an elected constitution-making body to decide".

In the above statement to the racist minority Parliament we therefore find the central attitude towards negotiations of the de Klerk regime. They do not believe in the rule of the majority. This is not to say that de Klerk has made a secret of this position. No, he has openly repeated it many times. During the White-only elections, pamphlets distributed on behalf of CODESA made this very clear. They stated: "If you are afraid of majority rule, vote yes on 17 March." We all know the yes vote received over 62 per cent of the White vote.

We can now see clearly why de Klerk and some of his international supporters do not want to conduct negotiations in a neutral venue under a neutral chairperson and with impartial facilitators. Such conditions prevail in negotiations concerning the Palestinian, Angolan, Cambodian and many other questions.

All of a sudden, the champions of democracy, the practitioners of due process, seem to want to abet and condone one who defiantly wants to be the judge, the jury and the prosecutor. In this case he even wants to go further, hand-picking those who are going to be the spectators in his court.

As for the conducive climate being created for negotiations in South Africa, all agree that nothing even approximating such a climate exists. In the Committee I pointed out that at the rate our people are being killed everyday by faceless murderers, by the year 2000, only eight years from now, we will have lost 54,000 men, women and children since 1984. Our United Nations representative, Dr. Motsoko Pheko, has aptly described the situation in South Africa as "a place where there is genocide by the regime, the country is a field of rotting corpses and weeping orphans and widows."

The adage that one sows the wind and reaps the whirlwind does not seem to be limited in space or time. It would be a sad epitaph indeed to all of mankind, which has spent three decades devoting its energies, time and resources so resolutely and commendably, if it ended up with nothing to show for all of its efforts but corpses, scarred bodies and ashes.

We want peace – not the peace of the graveyard, but peace in which man's God-given genius and creativity can blossom, to make our country and world His kingdom, a kingdom in which government, worker and employer can truly approximate the Holy Trinity of three-in-one. This concept is very much plausible in this tripartite and august body the ILO – where each complements the others to create stability, prosperity, harmony and peace, so truth can reign.

For these reasons, my delegation would recommend, with all the humility it can muster, that this august gathering adopt the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid which reflect the genius and the creativity I mentioned above.

Mrs. CARR (Workers' delegate, Canada) – It is an honour for me to stand before you this morning and speak to you as a worker on behalf of my country, Canada.

The economic future of post-apartheid southern Africa will be influenced by a variety of factors, including the policies adopted by a new South African Government. A progressive South Africa could become the motor for economic growth of the region. But it could also become a sponge which absorbs raw materials and cheap labour and dumped manufactured goods, thus further exacerbating the uneven economic development in the region.

South Africa's economic weight, as well as its own glaring disparities, provide strong arguments for regional coordination; that is, extending the SADCC approach to southern Africa as a whole, including a democratic South Africa.

If South Africa can now aspire to democracy, non-racialism and non-sexism, there is no excuse for continuing human rights violations on the part of any other country in the region or around the world.

Drought, division and human rights violations do not bode well for equitable post-apartheid regional development. But this region, with democratic, non-racial and non-sexist South Africa as its engine, could become a model for the rest of the continent, and is that not what we are striving for? It has the people, it has the resources and it has the will. It now needs creative cooperative mechanisms, a little respite from Mother Nature, and a lot of help from its friends around the world.

Organised labour has been the driving force for democratic reforms in South Africa. And the giant federations of COSATU and NACTU are poised to play a leading role in the economic integration of the whole southern African region, and particularly in South Africa. A seminar on this subject was recently organised by the ILO in Harare, with very impressive results.

And now we all look forward to the date or the day, which we hope will be very soon, when an interim Government will be constituted and a Constituent Assembly, a new Constitution and a democratically elected Government in South Africa will be there once and for all. The diverse and imaginative South African people will find a way, and I am sure, I am absolutely positive about that. And we hope that it is very, very soon. And we must continue to make sure that that comes about.

Let me just share with you that Nelson Mandela, when I met with him in his office in Johannesburg last month, assured me that he saw the trade union movement as having played and is continuing to play a key major role in his vision of a new South Africa, a proud South Africa. A South Africa for all people who live there. A South Africa that is democratic, non-racial, without discrimination, without hate, without violence. That is the vision that we all have to share in this hall. And that is a vision that we have to make sure happens in South Africa as quickly as possible. And while you are in this hall and you are speaking from this podium, you must have that in your heart just as well as they do, because without that kind of feeling you will never be able to survive anywhere else in this world if you are not part of making sure that South Africa becomes free and democratic and very soon.

That is why we give a commitment as we do. The ILO's excellent record on dealing with South Africa took a great step forward recently with the publication of the report of the ILO Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association concerning the Republic of South Africa, entitled: Prelude to change: Industrial relations reform in South Africa. The report urges the Government of South Africa to undertake vigorously reforms to its industrial relations system in order to guarantee the basic rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining as vital attributes of a free society.

The Special Tripartite Conference in Harare in May of 1992 dealt with the social, economic and labour aspects of subregional integration in post-apartheid southern Africa. The Conference considered it was premature to remove existing sanctions or to review at this time the ILO Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid and agreed, after strong interventions from both COSATU and NACTU, that the green light not yet be given for opening an ILO office inside South Africa. The Conference did agree, however, that ILO activities inside South Africa should begin as soon as the proposed democratic, interim Government is in place, and we hope it will be by the end of this year.

I was encouraged by the high-level agreement between the Workers' and the Employers' groups at this Special Tripartite Conference. We were able to agree that for some ILO projects inside South Africa, preparatory work can already be undertaken and that this preparatory work can take place in or outside South Africa.

I was also able to brief Nelson Mandela during the course of the Special Tripartite Conference, as I have said, on the progress that we were making, and I reported also to the Conference that the ANC President expressed his appreciation for the stand that the ILO was taking and also for the stand of those countries that continue to support the Declaration and of those that are fighting inside South Africa for democratic freedom. He was very much appreciative of that and will always continue to be.

The labour movement fully comprehends the need to strengthen economic fundamentals through productivity and growth, but certain basic rights must clearly be respected: the right to know, the right to participate, the right to security within change, and the right to share in the benefits, and inside South Africa these rights also have to be applied. The Canadian Labour Congress, at our last Congress held last month, adopted this as part of our Congress decisions.

In our international policy statement that we adopted unanimously, we stated in part that "the Canadian Labour Congress joins with African workers in applauding the movement of many single-party States towards more pluralistic democracy. We continue to pledge our support to work in solidarity with trade union organisations throughout the region to achieve an end to poverty and social and economic injustices. We salute the heroic efforts of the independent black trade union movement of South Africa led by COSATU and NACTU."

Their courage has been one you cannot comprehend unless you have been part of it. The fact that they are prepared to give us their lives in the street fighting for democracy and freedom is one you cannot comprehend unless you have been part of it. You in this hall have a feeling that even I cannot comprehend because I have not been there inside to be part of it. But we have to stay with them during this process which is now so clear. In their continuing fight against the oppression of apartheid and its aftermath, we must pledge our ongoing support.

We note, however, that the so-called referendum, which excluded black voters, stands as a reminder that apartheid and its masters and its disenfranchisement of people still exist in South Africa. Progress has resulted from the steadfast efforts of the ANC and South African workers and their union with the support of the international trade union movement through its continued pressure for sanctions, and we call upon the Government of Canada and all governments of the world to support, through appropriate sanctions along with other measures, the ANC and the long-suffering disenfranchised of South Africa as they walk the last mile to freedom, to peace, to the release of the political prisoners, to the end of violence and to equality, equality in their own country, equality before the law and equality amongst all people around the world.

My Congress absolutely supports the recommendations and conclusions contained in the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. I must say one more thing. There have been rumours amongst the people in this hall that perhaps this should be the last time that the Committee should meet on this question. I would suggest that it would be a very very serious mistake to consider to have its work ended before we make sure the democratic process is in place.

Mr. LESCAULT (Workers' adviser, United States) – Thank you for allowing me to speak from my seat. I apologise that I cannot rise to the platform.

On behalf of the Workers' delegation from the United States and our organisation, the AFL-CIO, we are pleased fully to support the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. Our endorsement of this report is based on the Director-General's Report on last month's tripartite conference in southern Africa, events in South Africa this past year and our discussions with the trade unions in South Africa. Taken together, we are saying yes – a movement towards a democratic, non-racial South Africa is occurring. This movement, however, has not been fast enough. It continues to need a strong push from the international community and it definitely needs our continued attention and vigilance.

To expand on that, we can all applaud the formation of Codesa late last year. The failure of Codesa II, however, was a direct result of foot-dragging on the part of the South African Government. We reject the notion that the Government's position in Codesa II was merely a negotiating tactic of tough talks. This is not the time for posturing showmanship. This is a critical period, a time to allay fears, satisfy aspirations and institute the foundations of democracy in a country ravaged by apartheid.

In 1983, it did not take the White Government two years to establish a tricameral government. Immediately, that small gesture towards democracy omitted the majority population and minimised the role of the Asian and Coloured communities. That tricameral Parliament, however, was put in place not in two years, not in one year, but in a matter of months. The procrastination of the de Klerk Government is a costly exercise in entrenching factionalism, promoting violence and maintaining the inequities of apartheid to gridlock diplomacy. The consequence of this policy is the escalation of violence in South Africa. There is no question that security and protection of life and property are responsibilities of the State. The inability of a government to provide that protection is a single, most serious indictment against the State. In South Africa, the question is not the ability of the police or the security forces to maintain law and order. Collectively, they have a proven record over many years of protecting the interest of the White community. That protection was based on controlling the Black population. It is not a great leap forward to change this mandate to a policy of protecting the interests of all South Africans by controlling the violent elements in South Africa.

We would like to congratulate the ILO and the participants to the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa held last month in Harare. The AFL-CIO fully supports and endorses the conclusions in paragraph 62 of that report. We believe the significance of Harare lies both in the conclusions reached and the timing and place of the meeting. The conclusions accurately reflect the events in South Africa and the appropriate course of action necessary to address those events. Of importance is the issue of trade union rights and extending those rights to all workers, particularly farm, domestic and public sector workers. We in the labour movement are increasingly concerned that the gains made by the trade union movement will be abrogated in favour of political expediency and either change will be derailed or delayed as other problem areas consume a new government. We fully support the trade union movement and its efforts to establish the appropriate forms to pursue these issues as quickly as possible.

It is particularly relevant that the meeting was held in Harare, that is at the doorstep of South Africa. It is also fitting that the ILO is prepared to enter South Africa with its vast technical expertise when the opportune time arises. We fully support the constructive role the ILO could play in a new South Africa. Of particular significance in both Harare and the report of this Committee are the considerations for the future. The report asks this Conference to support the future needs of South Africa in the areas of education, training, regionalisation and investment. There is no doubt that the education policies of apartheid have created a dual system of privilege and poverty. We all know that equal education is the first criterion in promoting equality of opportunity. The task before the international audience is providing that equal education. It will not be easy. It will take the same commitment and resources that went into the entire apartheid campaign. The training needs of South Africa are shared with other industrialised countries and compounded by the practices of apartheid. Technological change and economic displacement are making the skilled worker of today the unemployed unskilled worker of tommorrow. The situation for Black South Africans is more dire as the unskilled worker becomes the unemployed at a faster rate, with less prospect of returning to the labour force. The AFL-CIO fully supports education and training as an ongoing programme, as essential components of democracy and development.

This Session of the International Labour Conference is being asked to urge the ILO to increase its support and assistance to neighbouring and frontline States. The world has changed rapidly. We tend to look at Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union when we consider these changes. Southern Africa in less than three years has undergone an almost complete change. I would submit that only two countries in the region had not undergone any significant political change – Botswana and Malawi. Botswana because it enjoys a history of democracy; Malawi because it has not changed since its independence.

The stabilisation in southern Africa can only be ensured, however, by assisting these countries by policies and programmes that promote growth and minimise unhealthy competition and hostilities.

For the first time, I believe, this report recognises the importance of investment in South Africa during the transitional and post-apartheid period. We fully support the initiative to design and implement and investment code for South Africa. Such a code negotiated and written by appropriate bodies in South Africa will serve to establish recognisable standards, that level the playing field in the area of industrial relations in that country.

I would like to conclude by commenting on paragraph 50 of the report regarding the situation in Malawi. The AFL-CIO attended the trial of the SATUCC Secretary-General, Chakufwa Chihana. As everyone knows now, Chihana did not appear in court as scheduled on 6 or 7 May. He did not appear again on 2 and 3 June. Since being arrested on 6 April 1992; Chihana has not been charged with any crime. He has been arrested for 73 days now.

Reminding you at this Conference of this year's theme of democracy, I would like to relate the incidents of 6 April 1992 in Malawi. Chihana, arriving by plane, was arrested immediately at the airport. By the end of the day Chihana was in jail; five staff members of SATUCC were in jail; the regional organisation was closed; documents seized; Chihana's lawyer had his passport confiscated; and two other SATUCC staff members in Zambia conducting a regional trade union workshop effectively became and remain de facto exiles from Malawi. All these actions occurred because one man – Chakufwa Chihana – promised to return to Malawi and utter the words "we want democracy". I can ask the question: Is Malawi the model we are striving for or is Malawi the model we are striving to get away from?

With these comments, the AFL-CIO respectfully supports the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and hopes that it be unanimously supported by all.

Mr. MPANGALA (Workers' delegate, United Republic of Tanzania) – I stand here on behalf of the workers of Tanzania to support the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, contained in Provisional Record No. 21, and call on this Conference to adopt this report.

It is not a long time ago since Zimbabwe hosted the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, with particular reference to the question of apartheid in South Africa. That Conference, as this Conference too, was privileged to hear testimony from the workers of South Africa, represented by COSATU and NACTU. That testimony clearly underlined mixed feelings on changes taking place in South Africa owing to the de Klerk Government's failure to live up to its promises to undertake a series of reforms, including the reform of labour legislation, which will end apartheid in South Africa. In fact, it would appear that the Government of South Africa has hardened its attitude since the March All-White referendum.

It is obvious that the Codesa talks are encountering some difficulty in reaching a promising solution to the question of majority rule in South Africa. Violence in South Africa is still claiming many lives, without any visible efforts on the part of the Government to contain such a situation. There is evidently an urgent need for this situation to be kept in check if we are serious about dismantling apartheid. That is why there can be no room for disagreeing with those who consider that the ILO Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid is still valid. But those who consider that this Declaration is out of date can only convince us to review it if in doing so we will come up with a much harsher declaration which would quicken the dismantling of apartheid in South Africa.

My delegation would like to make it abundantly clear that this is no time to relax the pressure on the de Klerk Government in the application of sanctions, especially in respect of arms, oil and financial relations, in line with the United Nations policy. I would like to make a special call to this Conference to discourage all those countries which may be tempted to allow migration of labour from outside southern Africa.

Comrade Mandela has made a call to all people of good will to walk with him this last mile to freedom and the dismantling of apartheid. This last mile is apparently a very difficult mile. It is a long mile, longer than usual, and indeed this mile is bound to show who merely pays lip service to the dismantling of apartheid and who is truly serious and sympathetic to the cause of the majority of South Africans.

We are witnessing countries which are over-anxious to cover this last mile, not with Mandela but ahead of Mandela. One is bound to ask why. The answer is not hard to find. It is, in my opinion, out of greed to get there first, ahead of other countries. Greed is a vice and countries which are rushing to reach Pretoria before Mandela can but be looked at with great suspicion. We all know that these same countries are bound to be the great beneficiaries of peace and tranquillity which will be the results of the dismantling of apartheid.

Apartheid is not only evil but sinful, and I call upon all governments to assist South Africans to dismantle apartheid and do it now.

Another disturbing situation is the eventful violation of human and trade union rights by the Government of Malawi. This Government arbitrarily arrested Mr. Chakufwa Chihana, a Malawian who is in the service of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council as its Secretary-General. he was arrested for calling for democracy in Malawi, though such words were uttered not on Malawian soil but outside Malawi. He is thus suffering from such a brute detention for no sin, but because he is a national of Malawi who wishes to express his feelings freely wherever he may be. This arrest, and the arrest of other staff members of SATUCC, culminated in the closure of SATUCC offices.

Malawi is a member of the Organisation of African Unity. It is also a member of the Southern African Labour Commission, the ILO, the United Nations, the Commonwealth and SADDCC. Malawi subscribes to the constitutions, rules and regulations of these important bodies, yet it accords little respect to such regulations. The gross violation of human and trade union rights by the continued detention of Mr. Chihana must not be condoned or tolerated. My delegation fully supports the Committee's conclusion regarding Mr. Chihana and the Malawi Government. I strongly appeal to this conference to endorse it without any reservation.

Finally, I call on this Conference to resolve to bring pressure to bear on the Government of Malawi in order to bring about the immediate and unconditional release of Mr. Chihana, the reopening of the SATUCC Office in Malawi and the guarantee of free movement of the staff of SATUCC who are Malawi nationals by restoring to them the necessary travel documents.

Mr. WOJCIK (Workers' delegate, Poland) – On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Poland I should like to declare our continuous support to the struggle of our sisters and brothers in South Africa against apartheid.

Over the past few months we have noted several encouraging developments in connection with the abolishment of the inhumane system of racial segregation. We welcome the steps taken by President de Klerk to dismantle apartheid, especially the abolition of the basic legislative pillars of apartheid.

Nevertheless, there are also signs that give rise to serious concern; they are already existing and newly emerging symptoms and they stand in the way of the total dismantling of apartheid.

We feel that the measures taken and announced by President de Klerk are encouraging but not entirely sufficient. A good part of the racially determined legislation and the institutional apparatus perpetuating apartheid remains intact. While it remains in force, the world community should not take the progress made towards the elimination of the apartheid system for the finally accomplished deed.

In the field of labour legislation one should note with optimism the amendments made to the Labour Relations Act, which removed serious legislative impediments to the enjoyment of trade union rights. No less significant is the fact that the amendments translated into law the provisions of agreements reached by the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) and the National Council of Trade Unions (NACTU) on the one hand and the central employers' organisation, the South African Employers' Consultating Committee on Labour Affairs (SACCOLA), on the other. The progress in labour relations has also been reflected in moves to restructure and reform the National Manpower Commission (NMC) with view to transforming it into a genuine tripartite platform.

However, there are still serious legistative restrictions on trade union freedom which will have to be removed to ensure that all labour laws in South Africa meet the standards of the ILO. In particular, labour laws should be extended to the groups of workers who have previously been uncovered: farm workers, domestic servants and public employees. The right to collective bargaining should be respected and guarantees for basic labour standards strengthened.

We are following developments in South Africa with particular attention since the struggle of the Solidarnosc Trade Union and that of COSATU and NACTU have much in common in terms of goals, structural background and strategy. Our experience shows that trade unionism cannot remain indifferent to a wider background of political and structural impediments to its existence and development. There are no genuine trade union rights without respect for representative democracy and human rights. We find that our experience is therefore of relevance to the situation in South Africa. We have deliberately chosen for ourselves in Solidarnosc the peaceful and non-violent methods of struggle for independent trade unions, democracy and human rights. Consequently, we appreciate the fact that over the past years the struggle of Black workers for self-determination has continued virtually without resorting to violence. Therefore we are deeply concerned about increasing tensions and violence between different groups of the Black population.

Since Solidarnosc contributed essentially to the erosion of communist regimes in eastern and central Europe, we hope we have at least a moral right to call on the non-racially oriented population of South Africa to show its collective wisdom in its search for ways to avoid interracial tensions and conflicts.

Solidarnosc fully subscribes to the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and supports the adoption of the report, together with its conclusions.

Mr. KAIBARA (Workers' adviser, Japan) – It is a privilege and honour for me to have been given the opportunity to speak on behalf of the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (RENGO), with a membership of 8 million, on the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

First of all I want to say that I support the adoption of the report and its conclusions.

It may be true that in South Africa several policies related to apartheid have been revised in the course of the past few years, thanks to strong international pressure including that of the ILO, not to speak of the struggle in South Africa itself. It may also be true that a certain degree of dialogue has taken place between the Government of South Africa and the representative organisations of the people of South Africa. But this is just a step towards a true and necessary solution to an abhorrent problem that is called apartheid. The door may have been opened but there is still a long thorny path in front of our friends there before they can reach the house of democracy. The dialogue for the establishment of an interim government, supported by the majority of the people, is still under way, but the progress is too slow, darkening the prospect of formulating a democratic constitution and of elections held on the basis of one vote for one person in the near future. The Government of South Africa is not discharging its duties in enforcing effective measures to put an end to the appalling violence that still prevails in South Africa. A substantial number of political prisoners still remain incarcerated in South Africa. Bantustans which constitute a basic sub-system of apartheid have not yet been incorporated into the South African State, in spite of the recent commitment by the Government of South Africa.

Apartheid in South Africa must be totally eradicated and the international community should not be misled by measures that may well be cosmetic. Over the course of many years RENGO has promoted various activities in demanding the complete elimination of apartheid in South Africa and has called for international sanctions against South Africa.

We have repeatedly advocated that until the policy of apartheid is completely and immediately abolished, sanctions should not be lifted. At this stage, we once again appeal to the international community and to our Government not to slacken sanctions against South Africa so that the Government of South Africa is not misled to believe that the international community can be easily deceived by pretentious policy measures. I say this because this is the desire of our brothers and sisters there, because people who might be the direct victim of sanctions dare to say, in spite of possible pains and agonies, that they want the sanctions for the sake of freedom and democracy, which constitute the cornerstone of the human life.

We have to express our regret that some governments, turning a blind eye to reality, have been premature in lifting such sanctions. I regret to say that when the Japanese Government, decided to lift sanctions and to establish diplomatic relations with South Africa, the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (RENGO) had to make a strong protest against it. The sanctions were lifted by the Japanese Government with the excuse that South Africa is already in the process of democratisation.

The Japanese workers, represented by RENGO, demanded that the Japanese Government be vigilant concerning the move initiated by the Government of South Africa and maintained that the touchstone of such an initiative is the acceptance of an interim government by the Government of South Africa. So long as our fellow workers in South Africa ask us for the maintenance of sanctions against South Africa we should respect their wishes.

Furthermore, President de Klerk visited Japan recently at the invitation of our Government, and it is reported that our Government and the business community offered the head of the South African Government positive economic cooperation. But we, on the labour side, expressed our opposition to such an offer.

The Japanese workers have been supporting the democratic trade union movement in South Africa. It is the democratic trade union movement in South Africa that has made a significant contribution to the fight against apartheid. It is our wish to continue to support our fellow workers in South Africa. We have also cooperated with the liberation movements in South Africa by extending assistance morally and financially, and will continue to work closely with the African National Congress through it office in Tokyo.

The conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid presented before you have been worked out after intense discussions, and adopted by the Committee by an overwhelming majority after a record vote. I fully endorse the position taken by the Workers' spokesman in his discussion on the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. In this context, I hope that the conclusions of the Committee will be adopted unanimously by the Conference.

Taking this opportunity, I would like to pay my sincere respect and express my heartful thanks to Mr. John L. Nkomo, Chairman of the Committee, and to the two Vice-Chairmen, especially to the Worker Vice-Chairman, Brother Brett, for their hard work in the important and difficult work of the Committee.

Last but not least, I would like to make a strong appeal to the Government of Malawi to take immediate steps to release Brother Chihana, General Secretary of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council and to reopen SATUCC offices there, as mentioned in the last paragraph of the conclusions of the Committee.

Mr. DA SILVA (Government delegate, speaking on behalf of the European Community) – I have the honour to take the floor, on behalf of the European Community and its member States, in our debate on the Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

We would like to congratulate the Director-General for another excellent Special Report on the application of the Declaration of Action against Apartheid in South Africa, which we have read with interest.

The Community and its member States continue to follow very closely developments occurring in South Africa. We have consistently maintained that the abolition of apartheid must be brought about peacefully, through negotiations, and we have therefore welcomed, and support fully, the Codesa process. We call on all concerned to work actively to put an end to violence in the country, sharing in particular the concern of the Director-General that this violence should not continue to compromise the talks. We welcome the commitment of all parties to continue the complex negotiating process and urge all the representatives of the South African people to make a renewed and determined effort to finalise arrangements for the transitional period, including an agreement on the establishment of an interim government. The Community and its member States will continue to support the creation of a democratic and non-racial South Africa and the well-being of all its people.

In recognition of the fundamental changes which have taken place in South Africa, the European Community and its member States have lifted most of the restrictive measures they had imposed in 1985 and 1986.

In May, we approved another report on the application of the EC Code of Conduct for companies from the EC with subsidiaries, branches or representation in South Africa. The report showed that the EC companies are increasingly reaching agreement with unions on direct recognition and collective bargaining. Ninety per cent of the companies reported specific policies of employing and promoting black Africans into supervisory/management jobs.

In respect of the Conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid which the Conference is asked to endorse, the European Community and its member States have a number of reservations. In general, we are disappointed by the negative tone of these Conclusions, which in our view do not do justice to the positive developments over the past year or reflect the more realistic and forward-looking attitude which prevailed at the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa in Harare. The European Community and its member States can endorse most of the Conclusions of the Harare Conference but must dissociate themselves from Conclusion 10. As we made clear at this time last year, we regard certain aspects of the updated Declaration and Programme of Action as obsolete.

Furthermore, the European Community and its member States would like to state that they interpret conclusion 11 of the Harare document as referring to the mandatory arms embargo imposed by the Security Council and to the provisions of other Security Council resolutions on the import of arms from South Africa and the export of equipment and technology destined for military or police purposes in South Africa.

In our view, failing to lift trade and investment sanctions now can only disadvantage the poorest in South Africa and the country's long-term development potential.

Finally, I should like to end by expressing our full support for the proposal, brought forward from the Harare Conference, that the ILO should begin now to prepare projects for technical assisance in South Africa. We hope that the early establishment of an interim government will enable the rapid implementation of such projects.

Original – Chinese: Mr. HUANG (Workers' adviser, China) – I should like, first of all, to pay tribute to the Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid submitted to the Conference. This Report, which reflects the present stage of the anti-racist struggle of the South African people and notes the changes that have occurred in the past year in South Africa, stresses that the governments, employers and workers of the various countries must continue to put pressure on the South African authorities to force them to abolish apartheid as soon as possible.

During the past year, the South African people have scored remarkable victories in their struggle against racism. Thanks to the untiring efforts, over many years, of the Blacks to acquire their rights to existence and political status, and thanks to the political and economic pressures brought to bear by the international community, the South African authorities have been forced to repeal the legal pillars of apartheid – thus paving the way for a political settlement of the South African problem. However, we believe that a piece of paper is not enough; and that the South African authorities will have to make considerable efforts to dismantle the system of apartheid.

The most serious crime of apartheid was to deprive the Black South African majority of their political rights. Consequently, any racist measures applied by the South African authories have always been violently condemned by the Chinese workers and their trade union. What is more, the latter have always given their support to all the workers and people in South Africa fighting against racial segregation. In our opinion, the South African authorities should: first, put an end to arbitrary arrests and trials of Black trade unionists and all other anti-racist activists, immediately release political prisoners still detained and allow all exiles to return to their homeland; second, adopt all measures to eliminate discrimination against workers and the Black population as regards education, employment, housing, medical services and others, as quickly as possible; third, allow the South African people to conduct normal political activities and take the necessary measures to prevent any repetition of violence; fourth, remove any obstacles to constitutional negotiations in such a way as to bring about as soon as possible a new constitution based on racial equality, with a view to dismantling the abominable system of apartheid.

We must be realistic and realise that certain forces in South Africa are clinging obstinately to their racist positions and will never be able to accept defeat, engaging in obstructive activities and sabotage. Constitutional negotiations in South Africa will therefore continue to be stormy in the future and many difficulties could still arise along the tortuous path of progress. But we believe that if the multiracial people of South Africa continue to work together, a new, united, democratic and non-racial South Africa will soon come into existence.

Original – Arabic: Mr. MAATOUK (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Unions) – We were hoping, as did several other delegates, that the process of change would be speeded up in South Africa. We had much hope in the negotiations which had begun, but, to date, we have seen no sign that apartheid will soon disappear. The racist Constitution, which excludes the participation of the Black population from social life, is still there, it still exists. The sequence of several years of segregation still exists in the various aspects of the social, ecomomic and cultural life of the country.

The International Confederation of Arab Unions shares the concern for the violence which is threatening the negotiations, which are already slow enough because of the opposition expressed by the White extremist minority and, in particular, the national peace agreement is still far from reaching its objectives. We reiterate here the need for a guarantee, expressed by the Government of South Africa, to do away with violence and to distribute resources justly and to put an end to the remaining racist laws, including the laws which deprive the Africans of the right to vote, and citizenship in the Bantustans, in an attempt to remedy the results of many years of apartheid.

As we read the Director-General's Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, we see that there is still a gap between the different standards of life between Whites and Blacks, and that attempts are still being made to establish family planning for Blacks, it being said by some that the Black population is a bomb with a time fuse. It is therefore clear that the assurances of change are not sincere, be they at the social, cultural or economic levels.

We also note, with satisfaction, that there is now a great awareness among black Africans which only strengthens the trade union movement, the process of democratisation and the respect for the legitimate rights of peoples. We condemn all direct and indirect pressures exerted against the trade union movement in Africa, of whatever origin. We condemn the detention of prisoners and the terrorist activities spying against African unions and African trade unionists. We note that the situation is not respectful of the United Nations resolutions and we ask all the unions to take whatever steps are necessary to respect the resolutions of the United Nations and to maintain sanctions against the South African Government until the full and total elimination of apartheid is achieved.

Finally, we would like to confirm the full support we give to the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and the decisions and resolutions of the Special Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa in Harare.

Mr. HAMERNIK (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) – On behalf of the World Federation of Trade Unions I want to declare our full support for the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and particularly for its conclusions.

As I stressed in my statement at the Harare Conference, many changes have occurred since the last International Labour Conference, both in South Africa and at the international level, in respect of developments in the southern African subregion. Several UN bodies considering the apartheid question reached the conclusion that there is a need to encourage dialogue in South Africa with a view to establishing an interim government and creating a non-racial society where all citizens enjoy equal rights and duties.

A foundation of democracy and social justice is crucial for any country and South Africa cannot be an exception. Dialogue to establish a non-racial society has been unfortunately jeopardised by a recent wave of violence. As the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa underlined, violence took place not only in communities, but also in factories and mines, thus seriously affecting the activities of trade union. It is regrettable that although the Government has adequate resources to deal with the major outbreaks of violence, little has been done to prevent this violence. Therefore, many questions have been raised about the Government's commitment to end these regrettable events.

When we arrived in Harare, we were full of optimism since talks in Codesa II were about to begin. Unfortunately our optimism was dashed when we recognised that these talks failed to reach a substantive conclusion over how decisions should be taken in the elected body which would draw up a post-apartheid Constitution.

Nevertheless, taking into account the statement of Mr. Nelson Mandela here in Geneva at the end of May, where he noted that considerable progress had been made, even though not all the proposals put forward by the ANC had been realised, the statement endorsed the general expectation that mutually acceptable compromise can be found. We are deeply convinced that the present negotiations have come to a point where dialogue has already prevailed.

Patience and determination are needed in order to bring results and to prevent the country from descending into further violence. The delay in bringing about the end of apartheid could make the country then ungovernable. In this connection, we cannot ignore the significant influence which has been exercised by South Africa in the subregion. South Africa is still, despite all the problems and difficulties, an economic and military power and the most developed country in the subregion.

But, at the same time, we cannot ignore the fact that post-apartheid South Africa will face many serious challenges. One of them is increasing foreign debt. This fact may significantly complicate the task of a future democratic government, which will be faced by a lack of finance to address the inequalities created by apartheid. There are serious crises in housing, education, health and employment, that will require billions of dollars to redress.

The Special Report of the Director-General, therefore, rightly pointed out that a strategy is needed to deal, not only with the realities of the present changing situation in South Africa, but particularly to face up to future challenges. I think that it should be our main preoccupation in the near future.

Finally, I would like to draw attention once again to the remaining effects of the destabilisation caused by South Africa to neighbouring and front-line States. In this connection I must say that we cannot accept that the South African Government continues to occupy illegally the enclave of Walvis Bay and to exploit Namibian workers under apartheid laws there.

Original – Arabic: Mr. DERBY (Government delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, speaking on behalf of the Arab States) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like to quote a verse from the Koran: "O mankind, we have created you male and female, and appointed you races and tribes, that you may know one another. Surely the noblest among you in the sight of God is the most godfearing of you. God is All-Knowing, All-Aware."

These are the teachings of the All-Powerful and we will remain upon this path of righteousness until the day of last judgement.

However, in spite of these heavenly teachings, some obsolete entities are trying to maintain racist political regimes in South Africa and in occupied Palestine and this is in violation of the teachings of God the Almighty and in violation of the principles of equality and justice and freedom and equity between peoples without discrimination. But these are the people who have disobeyed God.

For almost 30 years and in particular since 1963, subjects such as racial discrimination and apartheid in South Africa have been examined by the International Labour Organisation, and addressed by the International Labour Conference, which published a Declaration which has been revised several times with a view to making it more effective in line with developments which have occurred.

It is thus clear that humanitarian subjects of this type are of interest to this Organisation because it is the conscience of the world and the struggle against apartheid is the backbone of the activities of the ILO, because apartheid violates fundamental human rights and freedoms as enshrined in the Declaration fo Philadelphia and in international labour standards.

It is clear that the group of Arab States which I am representing does not wish to enumerate exhaustively all the violations which have been perpetrated blatantly before the eyes of the whole world, violations in the area of education, housing, teaching, and other barbaric acts. Solidarity between Arabs and Africans in the struggle against apartheid has already been tried and tested and all the Arab peoples feel solidarity with the struggle of the peoples and workers of South Africa. This is solidarity based on a matter of principle, the unity of the struggles of peoples, and goes well beyond simple solidarity and declarations and slogans. It is a principle which is translated into specific action and assistance.

In this respect, we commend very highly the work being done by all the international organisations, including the ILO, and by national organisations, and the part which they have been playing in speeding the elimination of this abominable regime, which is a blot upon the history of mankind. We know that there is still a long, hard struggle ahead and we must not flag in our efforts to assist the people of South Africa until it recovers its sovereignty and free will.

Within the group of Arab States, we pay tribute to the people of South Africa for their having achieved certain measures, but we believe that total elimination of apartheid can be achieved only with the establishment of an interim government which represents all the different sectors of the population, and in particular the ANC. The objective of such a government would be to implement democracy, justice and the respect of human rights in conformity with the basic principle of one person, one vote.

In this context, if the supreme goal of all the fighters is to be achieved, we feel that any relaxation in the sanctions in the spheres of arms, oil or financing would only hinder the application of measures. In other words, international pressure against South Africa must be maintained until that regime bows to the will of the workers.

The Arab group is happy to see that dialogue has begun between the various parties. However, the repeal of some apartheid laws does not necessarily entail the demise of the regime because we might merely be witnessing a subterfuge against the Black peoples. There are still 14 racist laws in force which must be repealed promplty.

The Group of Arab States fully endorses the resolutions, recommendations and conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid contained in paragraphs 48 and 49. This is the minimum which everyone should accept until the total elimination of this regime, which must be eliminated, along with the other dictatorial regimes throughout the world.

We feel that the ILO still has a part to play because the post-apartheid era will be one in which reconstruction, training and retraining will be required so that those sectors of the population which have been affected by apartheid can finally enjoy a decent life after all the injustice and repression which they have suffered over so many years.

We would like to be able to come back here next year to say that apartheid has come to an end and to welcome the advent of a non-racist regime. Moreover, we would also like to see an end of the Israeli regime so that the people of Palestine can enjoy their rights. The ILO would then be able to assume its social and economic responsibilites.

Original – French: Mrs. FAUCHERE (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) – In spite of the abolition of the laws which were the pillars of the apartheid system and in spite of present negotiations aimed at creating a non-racial and democratic South Africa, the WCL considers that there should be no relaxing of pressure. Action and sanctions should continue. This is one of the main priorities of the WCL, aimed at the total, absolute, irreversible eradication of this unjust and heinous system.

Changes made to legislation by the de Klerk Government fall far short of solving the problems of the black majority in South Africa. The obstacles to an agreement between the different parties to the Convention for a Democratic South Africa (Codesa) demonstrate that the Pretoria regime is not ready to grant serious concessions to the majority of the country. Therefore, the chances of a new constitutional order are extremely hypothetical. This situation continues to perpetrate flagrant discrimination in the spheres of education, vocational training, health, housing and access to jobs, etc. On the question of land ownership, 87 per cent of the country is still reserved for the white population. The areas for black inhabitants do not even have running water or electricity.

The WCL condemns the atmosphere of violence that continues to reign in South Africa, particularly in the factories and in the mines. It denounces the active and passive complicity of the police and the South African army in the massacres which take place in the black townships, which have claimed thousands of victims.

With regard to employment and the standard of living, 50 per cent of the population presently lives below the breadline. Six million people, that is 42 per cent of the job market, cannot find work in the formal sector. According to surveys carried out by the ILO, some 60,000 children between the ages of eight and 14 work as farm labourers, which is one of the highest rates in the world.

Racial imbalances can be found at all different levels of the economy.

According to statistics, the percentage of blacks in the professions is very low, for example 0.1% account for engineers, 6% lawyers and less than 4% for enterprise managers. The consequence of this, WCL supports the call from the unions and particularly COSATU, for the creation of a national centre where workers, employers and public authorities can meet to negotiate the major economic questions that will be arise during the transitional period.

The economic and social situation resulting from discrimination and negligence has shown is characterised by high inflation, and large numbers of dismissals of workers. There have been token gestures, and investment aimed at compensating for the inequality suffered by the black population are in fact insignificant and have made no visible improvement.

The functioning of the unions is obstructed by indirect and direct pressure on the part of the Government, the police and a network of private militia. Union premises are raided, union members arrested, legitimate strikes declared illegal, etc. Serious violations of workers' fundamental rights are committed South Africa.

Black workers are still working under extremely difficult conditions. We see that there is a clear lack of will to implement safety and protection measures for the health and well-being of the workers in different sectors of activity. Thus the number of occupational diseases and accidents is increasing every year.

Regarding social justice and democracy, we condemn the failure to honour commitments taken by President de Klerk to free all political and trade union prisoners, and the refusal to grant the right of return to all political exiles. We deplore the fact that many countries have lifted sanctions and have restored diplomatic relations and trade links with South Africa while the signs of apartheid are still very visible.

The WCL demands that sanctions be maintained and that governments cease their aid to South Africa until a new, democratic, non-racial constitution is in force, enshrining the principle of one man, one vote.

The WCL calls on the ILO at this august assembly not to relax its efforts to do away totally with apartheid. Accordingly, we demand that the Committee on Action against Apartheid remain in place, for it is indispensable that the ILO continue its mission for the establishment of a just and democratic society in South Africa.

The WCL also would like the mandate of the special group of experts to be extended to bring the situation in South Africa completely to light. It also would like to ask ILO to increase its cooperation with non-racist South African trade unions during this difficult period of transition.

And finally, the WCL subscribes to the conclusions of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa which took place in Harare in May, and in which we participated. We would ask this assembly to adopt the Report that has been submitted to it.

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

Twenty-fifth sitting

Thursday, 18 June 1992, 3.15 p.m.

President: Mr. Mugalla

Ratification of Conventions by Switzerland

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have pleasure in informing the Conference that the Director-General of the ILO has registered the ratification by Switzerland of the following international labour Conventions: the Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119), and the Asbestos Convention 1986 (No. 162).

This brings the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 5,693.

Report of the Committee on Action Against Apartheid: Discussion (concl.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Mugalla) – We shall now resume our discussion of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

Mr. SHAMENDA (Workers' delegate, Zambia) – Mr. President, since I am speaking for the first time, I would like to join the others in congratulating the President and Vice-Presidents on their election, and to say that I am impressed with the manner in which they have conducted the proceedings of the Conference.

On behalf of the Zambian workers and those of the Southern African Coordinating Council, I wish to pay tribute to the Director-General and his staff for the very impressive and down-to-earth report on the situation in southern Africa and on apartheid in particular.

I also wish to pay tribute to the international community for the pressure and action it has taken against South Africa, which I have no doubt contributed greatly to the changes now taking place in that country.

The struggle has been difficult and bitter. The South African regime has made friends fight among themselves, made friends quarrel, made friends bitter, and to some extent, has turned some friends into enemies. But we all agree that apartheid is evil.

We all have an obligation to humanity to see to it that apartheid is completely eliminated. I would, therefore, like to associate myself with those who have spoken previously in endorsing the excellent report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. I would have liked to have seen tougher conclusions; nevertheless, in the spirit of tripartism, I have no doubt that this Conference shall adopt all the conclusions in total.

This issue of apartheid is consuming a lot of time and a lot of resources. Therefore, we have to be extremely cautious in our final approach. The situation in South Africa has improved, but that is not good enough. The situation has got to change. All of us come from countries where people are free; the majority of them can determine their own destinies. How can anyone, in this century think of reforming apartheid rather than eliminating it completely?

We demand an interim government in South Africa. We demand the immediate release of all political prisoners in South African jails. We need peace in our region. Look at the destabilisation South Africa is causing for its neighbouring countries. Some of us do not just read about the tragedy: we witness it and we feel it.

While a small group of people are living a comfortable life inside South Africa, the majority are starving. A good number of people are dying everyday. A lot of our people, even outside South Africa, have died and are still dying. The majority of our people are living in poverty. Why? Because of the evils of apartheid.

The South African regime is encouraging and spearheading violence in that country in order to misdirect the focus of the international community and delay democratic change in that country. We must fight against these tricks and continue with the pressure on South Africa.

As President of SATU, let me now turn to the conclusion dealing with the detention of our Secretary-General, Brother Chakufwa Chihana. Chakufwa Chihana is a well-known fighter for human rights and secretary for many years to the Committee on Actions against Apartheid. Once more I would like to commend the ILO and its Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa which met in Harare from 5 to 8 May this year for their firm stand in demanding the immediate release of Chakufwa Chihana and the reopening of our SATU offices in Lilongwe, Malawi.

The violation of human rights cannot be condoned anywhere. We cannot condone it in South Africa, and we cannot allow it to show its ugly face in free Black Africa. Is this the price Chakufwa must pay for all the years he spent at the ILO fighting for other people's freedom and human rights?

I pay tribute once again to this Committee for its recommendations on Brother Chakufwa and the SATU offices, and I call upon the Conference to support its conclusions. I further appeal to member States of the ILO to put pressure individually on the Malawian Government to respect human and trade union rights. The Malawian Government is a signatory to the Social Charter of SALC and should therefore respect its obligations.

Let me conclude by paying special tribute to the ICFTU and other affiliates of the ICFTU for the role they have played in this matter. If it had not been for the ICFTU mission to Malawi, Chakufwa's lawyers and indeed his wife would not have been able to see him in jail.

This Organisation, the ILO, was established to promote and protect human and trade union rights.

Miss HAK (Employers' delegate, Netherlands) – This year two important and significant meetings took place in Harare. It is difficult to judge which one was the most important. The outcomes of both meetings were encouraging and give rise to hope. Whilst some people expressed optimism about recent political developments in South Africa during the sittings of the Committee on Apartheid last week, others were not so optimistic.

I would like to inform you, as I informed the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa held in Harare in May, about the actions taken by employers to form a new non-racial democratic employers' organisation in South Africa, as recommended by this Conference at its last two sessions. To follow up on this recommendaton, a seminar on "Prospects for the creation of a representative body of employers in South Africa" was held in Harare on 1 January 1992. At that meeting, representatives of the Foundation of African Business and Consumer Organisations (FABCOS), the National African Federated Chambers of Commerce (NAFCOC) and the South African Employers' Consultative Committee on Labour Affairs (SACCOLA) expressed their agreement on the principle of creating a unified and representative non-racial umbrella organisation of employers in South Africa which was able to represent and defend the common interests of its constituents while preserving their specificity and identity. These organisatons unanimously agreed to work towards this objective by reporting on the proceedings of the seminar to their respective organisations and by recommending to them that a joint Working Party be set up as soon as possible to study the various aspects of creating such an organisation.

Following the seminar, an employers' mission visited South Africa and it can now be reported that a Working Party was set up and has held several meetings. As indicated, the ultimate goal will be the formation of a new non-racial, democratic employers' organisation, officially supported by all the employers' organisations in South Africa.

This principle of such an organisation is not in doubt, but the outcome of the discussions has to satisfy all the constituent organisations. The Working Party has made progress and next July a plenary meeting will be held in order to bring together the leaders of all the employers' groups concerned. As for us, we are willing to give further support and assistance where necessary. A study tour by employer experts to South Africa is scheduled as well as a study tour by South African employers to Africa, Geneva and some European countries.

Employers in South Africa have a role to play, and are playing it in the on-going restructuring process in South Africa. Progress has been made by the social partners in South Africa in the establishment of social and economic institutions where they themselves can play a key role. In this connection, the restructuring of the national manpower committee and the establishment of an economic forum, both constituted on a tripartite basis, should be mentioned. Employers have an important role to play in the establishment of sustained economic growth.

For us in the ILO the time has come to look to the future rather than contemplate the past. The ILO can and should play a role in establishing a new democracy in South Africa. Through its tripartite expertise it can contribute significantly. I join others in expressing the wish that next year, after an interim government has been formed, South Africa will once again become a member of the ILO. We will do out best to help South African employers to play their role not only at the national but also at the international level.

Original – Arabic: Mr. EL-AMAWY (representative of the Arab Labour Organisation) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! The Arab Labour Organisation, which is taking part in this Session devoted to the discussion of the Director-General's Special Report on the applicaton of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa, has, thanks to cooperation between Africa and the Arab world and to the united efforts of those who fight every type of discrimination anywhere in the world, followed the positive developments taking place in South Africa as a result of the international pressure which has obliged the regime of South Africa to abandon its discriminatory policy which is against all international laws and traditions, and in addition is against religious doctrine which condemns all discrimination based on racial or any other criteria.

We have also followed the developments of the Harare conference which gave very satisfactory results of interest to all the international community and particularly to the ILO.

In particular we would like to draw attention to the conclusions which state that it is premature to change the declaration of the ILO concerning the fight against apartheid and certain sanctions should be kept in force against South Africa in line with the resolutions of the United Nations.

Having studied the recommendations and conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid contained in its report, we note that the Committee endorsed the conclusions of the Harare Conference. We therefore congratulate the Chairman, the Reporter and the members of the Committee for their work in this respect.

We in the Arab Labour Organisation share the concern of the Committee on Apartheid over the obstacles set up by the regime of South Africa, which is trying to rid itself from international sanctions so as to recover what it has lost as a result of the fight against apartheid led by Nelson Mandela.

We consider that any obstacles to the establishment of the interim government are a form of discrimination, and any non-ratification of the Constitution will lead to more casualties and will result in the postponement of the setting up of a system based on social justice and equal participation by all members of society. Moreover, there is no valid reason for the delay in releasing prisoners, when the parties in conflict are negotiating to establish social peace. Our Conference has done well to take up the resolution to keep the selective sanctions concerning finance and oil so that the regime of South Africa will submit to the will of the international community.

The South African people are commemorating the anniversary of the events of Soweto, which led to a large number of victims. We share with them their feelings of grief. We also share the feelings of the Palestinian Arab people, who are suffering from colonialisation, discrimination and all forms of atrocities.

We call on the ILO and the international community to support these peoples so that apartheid is eliminated from South Africa. We appeal once more to the ILO to establish a programme of assistance to the South African people when this regime has ended. We also appeal and invite all delegations which have expressed reservations to abandon their reticence so that we may come to an unanimous resolution in support of the measures taken by the ILO since 1964 to put an end to this regime of discrimination and apartheid. We shall in this way respond to Nelson Mandela, who appealed from this very hall for us to "walk the last mile" together towards the elimination of apartheid.

Mr. HALINEN (Government adviser, Finland, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries) – On behalf of the Governments of the Nordic countries – Denmark, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and Finland – I have the honour to address the International Labour Conference on the question of apartheid.

The Nordic Governments agree with the importance which the ILO attaches to the issue of apartheid. The system of apartheid has seriously impeded the development of labour relations and the employment situation in South Africa. Apartheid is a gross violation of human rights – institutionalised racial discrimination constitutes a denial of the most fundamental human rights affecting everyday life in South Africa.

Consistently, the objectives of Nordic action against apartheid have been the complete dismantling of apartheid through peaceful means and the institution of a united, democratic and non-racial South Africa.

During the past few years we have seen considerable progress in South Africa towards the creation of a non-racial society and democratic form of government. The convening of Codesa in December 1991 marked a turning-point in the political process. The outcome of the referendum in March was encouraging. The Nordic countries look forward to the parties agreeing on establishing transitional arrangements, which will be the next step on the way to a democratic, non-racial South Africa. These developments have been duly taken into account in the Nordic countries' cooperation with South Africa; we expect the process to continue without unnecessary delays.

The profound changes in South Africa were acknowledged in resolution 46/79A adopted by consensus at the United Nations General Assembly in December 1991. These changes also have implications for the decisions and activities of the International Labour Organisation. It is obvious that the ILO Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, as well as the Programme of Action annexed to it, have become obsolete in many respects.

The ILO has long been in the forefront in the struggle against apartheid. To maintain this position in the present situation, it should be able to work in South Africa within its mandate. The Organisation has over previous years given valuable support through its programmes to the victims of apartheid in exile. Today the people of South Africa need the ILO's contribution and in particular policy advice in the labour and social field.

The Nordic countries continue to provide assistance to the victims of apartheid and we urge all countries to do likewise.

Today we are deciding on the conclusions reached by the Committee on Action against Apartheid. We very much regret that, despite serious efforts by all parties, full consensus was not reached in the Committee.

In our view, some Committee's conclusions unfortunately do not respond to the current situation in South Africa.

The Nordic Governments trust that the way has been irrevocably charted for a democratic and non-racial South Africa. But one must bear in mind that the legacy of apartheid cannot be dismantled overnight. We are seriously concerned about the violence which claims new victims every day in South Africa and we urge all parties to work actively in order to reverse this cycle. The international community should be prepared to support these efforts in a manner agreed upon by the main parties in South Africa.

The Nordic Governments express their strong hope that the ongoing political process may continue uninterrupted. They will welcome a new South Africa in which all its people, irrespective of race and colour, will enjoy the same fundamental freedoms and human rights.

Original – Spanish: Mrs. AROSTEGUI MEDEROS (Government adviser, Cuba) – At a time when some powers are attempting to submit before this Conference a very optimistic picture of the process of dismantling apartheid, I would like to call the attention of all the member States of the ILO to the fact – although there have been positive changes in South Africa – that the crime of apartheid is very far from disappearing. A proof of this is the escalation of violence in the Black neighbourhoods, the abuse of authority by the security forces, the death squads, the repression of students and trade unionists, the policy of forced labour by the population, the bantustanisation, the restrictions placed on freedom of expression and the lack of medical care and education suffered by the Blacks in South Africa.

We would like to salute the fact that the spirit which has prevailed in the meetings of the Committee on Action against Apartheid has been favourable to the maintaining of the political and diplomatic isolation of South Africa so as to accelerate the process of change in the country. Along these lines, we must point out that the Government of Cuba does not maintain any diplomatic, consular, economic, financial or military relations with South Africa. It considers that the policy of maintaining sanctions is a very important form of dissuasion and that it is the fundamental link in the fight against apartheid.

My country wishes to express in this form its solidarity with the just cause of the South African people and its total endorsment of the ANC's struggle and its desire to hold a Constituent Assembly and to achieve the creation of an interim government which will lead to a free, united and democratic South Africa.

We recognise the role played by the ILO in the task of abolishing apartheid and contributing to a just and equitable social order. But, as the Director-General has so aptly pointed out in his Special Report before this session of the Conference, it is necessary not only to identify a strategy which will enable us to confront objectively the new situations in South Africa, but to begin now to ask objectively, and with realistic and substantial solutions in hand, what problems will have to be faced in a future South Africa without apartheid.

We believe that the effects of this very brutal and repressive regime will extend for many years the work which the ILO will have to carry out in South Africa within its field of competence, particularly because the solution of this problem may be delayed by the complicity and support given to this regime by certain powers.

Mr. FREEMAN (Government delegate, United States) – South Africa is changing rapidly – much of the apartheid system has been dismantled and negotiations are under way to create a non-racial democracy. The Committee on Action against Apartheid is not keeping up with these changes. In this report the Committee clings to outdated rhetoric and obsolete tactics. The conclusions in the report still endorse sanctions in several places. Sanctions are yesterday's tactics.

Today the United States Government cannot accept any reference to sanctions other than the United Nations arms embargo. We also reject the ILO's antique Declaration and the Programme of Action, both of which are endorsed by this report, because they call for comprehensive sanctions and the severing of all relations with South Africa. Further, the United States Government has concerns about the language used in the conclusions which state without reservation that "a substantial number of political prisoners remain incarcerated" in South Africa and that there is not a free political climate there. For these reasons we called for a vote in committee and opposed the conclusions, although we strongly support some of them. For example we welcome plans to send the ILO staff to South Africa to organise education and training programmes for non-racial workers' and employers' organisations. We fully support the last conclusion protesting against the arrest and continued detention of trade unionist Chakufwa Chihana by the Government of Malawi and we join with the Committee in urging Malawi to release him.

We recognise that negotiations have temporarily stalled. We urge both sides to get on with the essential job of making a democracy. The time has come to focus international attention on the need to encourage the ongoing negotiation process and to channel assistance to the majority population in South Africa. The time has come for all of us to work together to achieve a truly free and democratic South Africa.

Original – French: Mr. MUTOY (representative of Pax Christi International) – It is with genuine pleasure that I, on behalf of Pax Christi International, take the floor at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference to join with all those who have expressed their determination to strive for a new social order in South Africa.

Pax Christi would like to pay tribute to the report submitted by the Committee on Action against Apartheid. We will not enter into details on its contents but would simply emphasise the fact that it faithfully reflects the actions undertaken – and which remain to be undertaken – by the ILO in this field.

As we all know, the announcement of the equality of political rights is wishful thinking if it does not go hand in hand with specific action to implement it, most specifically in terms of access to employment, training, and freedom of association; indeed, this action is a pre-requisite for the implementation of an equal opportunities policy. This requires a number of activities, including a fair training policy taking into account the unfair situation among those of different races in South Africa.

Social and economic apartheid are direct results of political apartheid and are more difficult to overcome than other forms of discrimination. Changes at present under way in South Africa must therefore include the social dimension. Social inequalities, poverty and the working conditions of non-White workers are not unrelated to the wave of violence currently characterising inter-community relations.

Pax Christi International is aware that the impasse in the process leading to the total elimination of apartheid is due to the refusal of those who will not give up the privileges they now enjoy under the existing situation and who are determined to resort to violence and crime to maintain the dictatorship of the White minority. But it also takes account of the fears of those who are prepared to follow the dictates of their conscience and sense of justice but are not fully reassured as to their future when the system has been totally dismantled.

Tremendous efforts in education for peace must be made alongside the political negotiations. The union associations and movements promoting human rights and peace are, with the Churches, the architects of a climate of confidence. Pax Christi International therefore asks the Conference to adopt the recommendation of the Committee concerning the release of Mr. Chakufwa Chihana, Secretary-General of the SATUCC, and the re-establishment of trade union freedom in Malawi.

Mr. SALIMIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – Apartheid is taking in its last breath, its countdown has started, so it is our duty, as Mr. Nelson Mandela has said, to walk the last mile on the way to the end of apartheid.

We believe that this devil has been seriously wounded, so maximum pressure must be exerted for its eradication from the soil of the earth.

A number are of the opinion that the wicked apartheid regime is in the process of handing over power to its legitimate owners, but the actual fact is that the racist regime has failed in its efforts. In the political field, due to the pressure exerted by the oppressed people of South Africa and the growth of political activities and struggles of the African National Congress and because of the weakening of the activities of the international organisations as a result of the influence of the friends of the South African Government, such as the United States and the United Kingdom and the regime which is usurping the occupied territories, this South African regime has gradually been pushed to the point of desperation.

In the military field, due to the failure of its military activities in Namibia and its defeat in the front-line African States as a result of the admirable resistance of the people, the racist Pretoria regime was forced to withdraw and compelled to change its policies.

There are some events which must be emphasised. The Government of South Africa has adopted delaying tactics to destabilise the democratic transition by promoting violence and social disorder. The Government has been exposed for using State funds to promote violence and acts of cold assassination which have left 11,000 dead since 1984.

In one COSATU branch, 75 trade unionists have been murdered in the last two years. This continuous violence has threatened the lives of the Black inhabitants and resulted in further intervention by the security forces. We believe that it is a major threat to the peace process and remain convinced that Codesa is the forum for the peaceful transition to democracy.

The referendum of 17 March indicated that 69 per cent of the White voters favoured the continuation of political reforms and constitutional negotiations, but the deadlock in Codesa II has shattered these expectations. The ANC has shown a spirit of openness by accepting a 70 per cent majority to resolve the dispute on the majority required to amend the Constitution. The South African Government is compromising the Codesa talks by the high level of violence within the country.

We are of the opinion that the continuation of sanctions concerning arms, oil and finances, etc., is essential; they must be continued until apartheid has been totally dismantled. It is regretted that some governments have been too quick to lift some sanctions, before any major changes have occurred concerning the eradication of apartheid.

Although President de Klerk has announced the official death of apartheid, the Special Report reveals that at least 14 apartheid laws are still in force, such as the Electoral Act, which gives rights to Whites, Indians and Coloureds, but exclude Blacks. The labour legislation does not yet cover farm workers, domestic servants and public employees, in contravention of the Laboria Minute, agreed upon in 1991. We believe the abolition of some apartheid legislation was the result of the unyielding pressure by the oppressed people of South Africa and the vigorous support of the international community. So strenuous efforts are still required to bring about the eradication of apartheid.

Under these circumstances it is very dangerous, out of simple-mindedness or a misplaced belief that any basic change in the policy of this racist regime has occurred, to consider that proper attention has been given to the Black majority by the abolition of some apartheid laws. In the long run, this could result in the worst possible conditions. The tyrannical history of South Africa could repeat itself if the concepts of "majority government" and "democracy" are disregarded.

We are of the opinion that the world movement and the popular uprising of the front-line States, especially the oppressed people of South Africa, must continue the search for effective ways to bring about the downfall of the apartheid regime. The economic isolation of the Pretoria regime, effective sanctions by the Organisation of African Unity, especially by the front-line States, real international sanctions, especially by the Western world, are all measures which, if implemented, would bring the racist regime to its knees.

The loans and business transactions of the Western countries are like blood reaching the dried blood vessels of the apartheid regime. If the sanctions were effectively implemented by the United States and West European countries, the people of South Africa would have achieved their independence and legitimate rights years ago, and the problems of apartheid would have been solved for ever.

The people of South Africa clearly know which powers and governments are responsible for the continuation of their government of horror. They also know that countries like the United States and some others in West Europe, which are indirectly involved, are a party to the murder of so many people over so many years.

The true leaders of the people of South Africa clearly know that the retreat of the racist regime had been at the cost of numerous sacrifices in the form of torture, imprisonment or death. Therefore, any negligence and compromise would be unforgiveable.

I fully support the report and the conclusions adopted by the Committee on Action against Apartheid, and hope that they will be adopted unanimously by the Conference.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – It is for me a great privilege to join all the other distinguished speakers in supporting ths important Committee's report and its conclusions.

I should also like to offer my sincere congratulations to the President, who is chairing this historic Conference.

The Chairman of this Committee, Mr. Nkomo, and the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Hernandez, representing the Employers, and Mr. Brett, representing the Workers, along with the other distinguished members of the Committee, have done a very positive and useful job. They deserve our commendation and appreciation for bringing these conclusions and recommendations before this august house.

We would also like to take this opportunity to convey our deep appreciation of the work of the ILO and the Report presented to this forum by the Director-General, as well as the decision of the Governing Body to hold a Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa in Harare in May 1992. On that occasion, Mr. H. Maier, the Deputy Director-General of the International Labour Office, was present to convey the Office's position regarding apartheid. We welcome the conclusions of all those who are taking part in this Conference.

Apartheid is a crime against humanity, and we have seen during the course of recent years that there has been a positive development of attitudes regarding apartheid, even among the majority of the Whites. Fifty-nine per cent of Whites voted in the recent referendum for a continuous reform in the political system of South Africa, so that the Black majority, which is a victim of this crime against humanity, should no longer suffer and so that apartheid should be eliminated.

But despite the mandate given by the Whites we see that the present regime in South Africa is still not proceeding to dismantle apartheid. The Black majority is still denied basic rights. There is much violence, the workers and the people are victims of murder and innocent lives are being lost. And all of this is the responsibility of the State.

Similarly, the State still is enforcing labour laws which discriminate against the Black majority and Black workers. These laws must be repealed. They are one of the basic elements of apartheid.

I am not going to repeat what has been said earlier by our distinguished colleagues from this rostrum, but I will certainly stress that all religions and all reformers throughout the ages, including our Holy Prophet, stated that no man is to be judged on the basis of race, colour or creed, and that men should be appreciated by their spirit only.

Similarly, the instruments of international organisations such as the United Nations and the ILO clearly state that there should not be discrimination on the basis of race, colour or creed, and that all human beings should enjoy a sense of freedom and equality, and the opportunity for progress enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia. But today we still find this crime being committed against the whole of humanity, in the form of apartheid.

In view of the conclusions which have been submitted by the Committee, we believe that it is necessary to continue to impose sanctions.

Our country, Pakistan, still maintains these sanctions, in order to demonstrate our commitment to combat this crime against humanity, apartheid, and to wash this evil from the face of the Earth.

We fully support the conclusion in paragraph 5, which reiterates that the ILO's work should be expanded in the fields of worker's education, technical cooperation and vocational education for non-racial organisations of the workers and employers. We also support paragraph 50, pertaining to the recommended release of Mr. Chihana, the trade unionist. We believe what Nelson Mandela declared from this rostrum in 1990, that it is now a question of going one last mile to the distination. That journey is bound to end, and the people of South Africa are bound to achieve the right of self-determination.

We must continue to demonstrate our solidarity by observing sanctions and giving all moral and material support to the black people. We therefore urge this assembly to adopt this report and the conclusions.

Mr. BAIER (Government adviser, Austria) – Before turning to the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, I wish to express my appreciation to the Director-General for his own Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. It contains assessments of the ongoing important developments in South Africa and underlines their considerable significance for the total eradication of apartheid. Furthermore, the report illuminates the grave economic situation and its disastrous consequences on social development in South Africa, especially with regard to the labour market.

The Austrian Government welcomes the clear commitment of all parties to reach substantive progress in the Convention for a Democratic South Africa and to pave the way towards the establishment of a transitional government. Regardless of recent setbacks, it is our firm conviction that Codesa merits full encouragement by the international community. We shall bear in mind that, as long as a Constitution which denies elementary human rights to an overwhelming majority of the population exists, there can be no significant improvement in the social and labour field.

Many of the Committee's conclusions are acceptable to us. Others, however, appear to be unbalanced and clearly go beyond the Organisation's mandate. They should be dealt with by the competent institutions of United Nations system.

Original – German: Mr. ALDER (Government delegate, Switzerland) – Switzerland has unequivocally stated its views on the Government of South Africa's policy of racial discrimination for years at the International Labour Conference. It has frequently stated, on numerous occasions, both to the Government and to the leaders of the opposition in South Africa, that Switzerland cannot condone a policy of racial separation and racial discrimination in any country, or on any grounds.

In South Africa, positive, major moves are now under way. In the Referendum of 17 March 1992, the population very clearly expressed its support for the reform process initiated by the Government, and stated its readiness to contribute to the change towards a multi-racial, democratic South Africa. At the same time, it dealt a firm blow to the extremists in its own camp.

Neither the Report of the Director-General nor that of the Committee really touch upon these positive changes. Instead of acknowledging their political and historical significance, they deal one-sidedly with the negative aspects of the most recent developments. Much as we support the call to all parties concerned to end the serious violence which is taking place, and much as we also appeal to the Government of the Republic of South Africa to release the remaining political prisoners and to respect trade union freedom in all circumstances, we cannot believe that one-sided positions within an international organisation can make a positive contribution to the continuing dialogue in South Africa. Matters, as yet unresolved, must be handled by South Africans themselves within the framework of Codesa.

We are extremely sceptical about a number of points in the Report, which we feel are not really within the field of competence of the International Labour Organisataion; for instance, the question of whether international sanctions against South Africa should be continued at the present time or lifted. We also have doubts as to whether the International Labour Organisation is really in a position to be able to "ensure" sustained economic growth in southern Africa, as is stated in Conclusion 5 (i) of the Report of the Committee.

The situation in South Africa – particularly as regards the continuing violence and the ensuing, serious violation of human rights committed by supporters of all camps – is, as always, a matter of very serious concern. But, on the other hand, it also gives rise to hope. International organisations can strengthen these hopes by making a positive contribution. A Committee Report, such as the one before us, can I think make a valuable contribution to this end, and my delegation welcomes in principle work of this nature. Nevertheless, we would have preferred its content to have been more balanced and to have placed more emphasis on the positive developments that have occurred. Despite many promising signs, we feel bound to admit that there are still serious inequalities in South Africa; and we should like to encourage the Government and the opposition to continue along the path they have chosen and to work together constructively.

Original – French: Mr. SENE (Government delegate, Senegal) – My delegation already spoke a number of times before the Committee on Action against Apartheid, as is indicated in paragraphs 14 and 47 of Provisional Record No. 21. We are taking the floor here today because new facts have arisen which, in our opinion, deserve to be studied in the light of the conclusions contained in the Director-General's Report.

The examination of the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa has always been one of the most eventful moments during the various Sessions of the International Labour Conference because, to be quite truthful, no specialised institution has contributed as much as the ILO, within the terms, of its mandate, to the universal struggle against discrimination in all its forms, and particularly against the system of apartheid.

In any case, the assertion of the respect of human rights and fundamental freedoms is today a certainty as has been demonstrated by the unanimous reprobation of apartheid and racial descrimination by the ILO and the whole United Nations family.

Thus the ILO, as a pioneer, has been able to mobilise a vast solidarity movement of the forces of progress throughout the world, through its tripartite structure, in order to offer its moral and material support to the victims of the scourge that is apartheid, and that brings racism to the level of a dogma.

With the end of the Cold War the winds of freedom are blowing over the planet and are bringing about far-reaching changes which are altering the geo-political aspect of the world. South Africa entered into this process with the advent of a statesman of great renown who has a clear vision of the future. I am referring to of course President Frederik de Klerk. With intelligence and realism, he has been able to carry out fundamental reforms which go towards the dismantling of apartheid. But even if he has declared apartheid to be officially dead it is nonetheless true that there are still a number of measures to be taken to replace the racist regime with a non-racial and democratic, a free and fraternal, South African society.

Therefore, we must repeal the Electoral Act of 1979, as the Report states, an act which grants the right to vote to the whites, the coloureds and the Indians, but excludes the blacks. So the same should go for the acts regarding Bantustans, the reserves of cheap labour, where the blacks are kept in inhuman, revolting conditions.

There are also, of course, other discriminatory laws which apply to education, health, social services, lousing etc.

In other words, despite the considerable improvements which have been achieved by the positive reforms of Mr. de Klerk's Government, there is still much to be done. And even once apartheid has finally been abolished and dismantled, there will always remain traces of suffering, traumatism and wounds, as well as the aftermath of the oppression which can only be eradicated with patience and wisdom, time and the observation of democratic, dignified and civilised democratic participation.

But at present how could we be anything but worried given the upswing of violence which has ravaged the black townships, the factories and the mines, and which is a threat to civil peace.

Undoubtedly, this serious issue affecting people's safety, is the responsibility of the South African Government.

However, since the referendum of 17 March 1992 where almost 69 per cent of whites voted in favour of the reforms and negotiations so as to set up a new constitutional order, it would appear that the National Party of President de Klerk is no longer making any progress, and since that date it appears to want to make as few concessions as possible.

For all these reasons, my delegation feels that the ILO should strengthen the fragile position of black trade unions and their rights in this crucial phase of the Codesa negotiations, the Convention for a Democratic South Africa, which brings together the party in power and the white Government on the one hand, and the opposition movements and the black majority on the other.

The ILO, faithful to its vocation, must assist in the advent of democracy and social justice in South Africa in accordance with the conclusions of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa held under its aegis in Harare in May 1992.

Need it be mentioned that Mr. Nelson Mandela, President of the African National Congress (ANC), who addressed our assembly in unforgettable terms in 1990, recently said in Geneva that what the black majority wants is a transitional government and a constituent assembly to be set up following honest and free elections.

Since the failure last month of Codesa II, the anti-apartheid alliance set up by the ANC and the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) decided to organise unprecedented mass demonstrations if the Government did not accept to give up its place to an interim government.

What is new is that since 16 June, the day before yesterday, 70 gatherings were organised throughout the country on Tuesday in memory of the 500 black children who were shot dead in Soweto by the police for protesting against an education reform that imposed the teaching of Afrikaans in schools.

While maintaining dialogue with the Government, the black opposition is planning a series of actions similar to these carried out in Eastern and Central Europe which received the West's support.

The least we can say is that the South African Government has already mobilised a considerable number of troops by calling up thousands of reservists and keeping them in a state of alert in order to avoid any possible violence.

The employers are threatening massive lay-offs should there be strikes as they can easily find replacement workers among the country's six million unemployed.

The leader of the ANC has a clear idea of what is at stake and has already appealed to his activists to respect strict discipline and not to listen to certain voices in their midst which belong to agent provocateurs who are inciting them to violence in the white areas of the city. Such violence, he has said, would be absolutedly disastrous.

On 30 May during the meeting of a neo-Nazi group, the extremist white leader, Eugene Terreblanche, declared that the movement's activities are "ready to fight to the last man and right to the end, to exterminate the blacks if they come to power". This gives some measure of the seriousness of the situation.

Senegal thus wholeheartedly approves the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. The parties involved in the Codesa negotiations should spare no effort to find an agreement so as to set up a democratic and non-racial transition government.

The South African Government, as a signatory of the National Peace Agreement, must put an end to the violence, which has become endemic. It must also free political prisoners, repeal the law on bantustans and establish relations based on mutual respect and trust with neighbouring States.

Finally, the ILO, in the framework of its technical cooperation programmes, must provide assistance to workers' and employers' organisations which are non-racial and democratic and which respect international labour standards.

Senegal, which has established contact with both parties and which is going to welcome this month the Summit of the OAU Heads of State, will spare no effort to assist all South Africans to pursue dialogue and negotiation to build a non-racial and democratic nation in peace and justice.

Such is the message which this session of the Conference must send to them as a body, by adopting the conclusions of the report, because we believe that the time is right to build on this southern land bursting with both economic and social potential a nation based on solidarity, radiant with economic progress, an exemplary model of human fraternity and democracy, for the sake of Africa and humanity as a whole.

Mr. GHATOWAR (Government delegate, India) – Over the past year the process initiated in South Africa continues towards what we hope will be a logical but long-overdue conclusion – the establishment of a democratic and non-racial society. During the year which has elapsed much has happened in South Africa that deserves our attention. The ILO has played a salient role which is evident from the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid.

This year has seen the continuation of good work by the group of independent experts to follow up and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid: the convening of the Special Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa in Harare in May 1992 and the report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association which examined the complaint of infringement of trade union rights in South Africa presented to the ILO by COSATU.

My Government appreciates the active role played by the ILO within its areas of competence and in the field where it has gained considerable expertise over the years. These areas include the close monitoring of the evolving situation in South Africa, the continuation of international pressure for the ending of apartheid and assistance to the liberation movements, workers' and employers' organisations in their campaign to establish a democratic and socially just society. We would like to endorse these actions of the ILO, taken in close coordination with other UN bodies and in line with the relevant UN resolutions.

As we examine the developments in South Africa, let us first look at the positive aspects. Negotiations between all the major players, including the Government and the African National Congress, have set in motion a process which looks to the future to explore the constitutional shape of a non-racial democratic and undivided South Africa. This historic Convention for a Democratic South Africa (Codesa) has had two sessions. While progress is slow, it is hoped that it will resolve significant questions such as constitutional principles, the nature of the interim government, the creation of a free climate of political participation, target dates for key decisions and their implementation procedures. A referendum called in March this year by President de Klerk resulted in the endorsement of the continuation of the reform process.

However, while the statutory pillars of apartheid are being slowly eroded, 14 apartheid laws still remain on the statute books. Furthermore, the legacy of decades of racial discrimination in the social and economic fields is still present in the structure and functioning of society. In 1991, the per capita income for Blacks was estimated as being one tenth of that of Whites. In the major 100 companies in South Africa, only 2.2 per cent of the managerial staff are Black. The World Bank has reported unusually high per capita public spending on Whites but social services to the Blacks continue to be neglected. This is also reflected in the disparities in the educational system where the State spends up to five times as much on the education of White children as on Black children. Such statistics highlight the need for continued efforts to address the social and economic backlog of apartheid.

My Government's consistent commitment to the support of the oppressed majority in South Africa in their fight for their legitimate rights needs no reiteration. In keeping with the decision taken by the meeting of the Commonwealth Heads of Government in Harare in October 1991, India has taken steps to lift certain restrictions concerning cultural and sporting events and the promotion of tourism. We did this in the belief that some progress was being made in the dismantling of apartheid. However, we also believe that remaining sanctions should be lifted only in stages, according to further developments in South Africa, an important step of which should be the establishment of an interim government in which the Black majority and other communities be fully represented. My Government, meanwhile, is determined to continue its financial assistance to the front-line States and to provide moral and material support to the liberation movement in South Africa.

We reiterate our endorsement of the ILO's activities in the context of the situation in South Africa and agree that it should stand prepared to extend assistance required at the appropriate time in the light of further positive developments. We do this in the belief that each of us here has an important contribution to make to ensure the fulfilment of the aspirations of the majority and in the estabishment of a democratic non-racial South Africa.

Original – Russian: Mr. BORCHEVSKY (Government delegate, Russian Federation) – The Government delegation of the Russian Federation supports the conclusions and recommendations that have been presented to us for consideration by the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

We do not consider this material as ideal. We do not agree with the harsh tone of some of the paragraphs, but we do believe that on the whole the Committee's report does meet its main objective – it can have a positive influence on the development of the democratic process in South Africa.

Russia consistently and steadfastly advocates the complete dismantling of apartheid and the rapid transition of the Republic of South Africa to a non-racial democracy. We are pleased to note the significant progress that has been achieved in the democratic reorganisation of South Africa and the positive changes in its external political activity. The results of the recent visit by President de Klerk to Russia give us reason to hope that the irreversable process of democratic transformation in South Africa will be successfully concluded. By our practical actions we are attempting to give the necessary support to the negotiation process taking place in the framework of the Convention for a Democratic South Africa (CODESA). The Government of Russia, under present circumstances, sees neither juridical nor political reasons preventing the development of business, scientific, cultural, and sporting links, tourism and direct air and sea links with South Africa. At the same time Russia intends to continue rigorously to observe, until such a time as they are lifted, the mandatory military and nuclear sanctions against South Africa as decided by the United Nations Security Council.

In conclusion, we would like to note the qualitatively new non-confrontational atmosphere in the consideration of this important question at the present Session of the International Labour Conference.

Not only those in the Committee who supported the conclusions and recommendations, but also those who abstained or voted against them have the same objective – to hasten the final collapse of apartheid and give support to the efforts that are being made in that direction at the present time.

We consider that this unity of purpose on the part of all States, employers and workers is the most important result of this Session of the Conference and that it demonstrates the truly powerful international support for the process of reform in South Africa.

We would like to join with the representative of the Netherlands Employers' delegate, Miss Hak, and express the hope that these reforms will allow us to welcome plenipotentiary representatives of a new transitional non-racial government of South Africa to the next International Labour Conference.

Mr. BLAVO (Government delegate, Ghana) – The international community has witnessed a number of changes in South Africa since February 1990. These changes have taken the form of the release of some political prisoners, authorisation of political organisations, the lifting of the state of emergency and the repeal of the set of legislation that forms the pillars of apartheid, namely the Amenities Act, the Land Act, the Group Areas Act and the Population Registration Act.

As a direct outcome of these developments, this Conference had the honour and privilege of being addressed by Mr. Nelson Mandela, leader of the ANC, in 1990. These changes have been possible because of the resolutions and declarations adopted by the International Labour Conference, among other bodies, with a view to drawing attention to the repugnant policy of apartheid and its destructive effects on the majority of the population of South Africa.

My delegation would like to take this opportunity to commend the ILO and, indeed, all the delegations that made it their policy to speak out against the policy and practice of apartheid in South Africa, in this as well as other forums.

While we welcome the positive changes in South Africa, we regret to note that a number of other discriminatory laws still remain on the statute books and a good number of political activists remain in prison. My delegation would also like to point out that merely removing laws from the statute books is not enough. The authorities in South Africa should also ensure that all racially discriminatory practices have been eradicated.

Futhermore, a lot remains to be done at the economic, social, educational and cultural levels – not only to rid some sections of the white population, specifically the security forces, of the apartheid mentality which they still like to exhibit, but also to correct the after-effects of decades of racial, cultural, economic and political subjugation of the Black majority. It is in this connection that the Government of Ghana welcomes the establishment of the Convention for a Democratic South Africa (Codesa). The setback suffered by Codesa in failing to reach agreement on the machinery for drawing up a democratic constitution for South Africa is therefore a matter of concern to us.

Another development that is of concern to the Government and people of Ghana is the violence in the townships. In spite of the positive changes referred to earlier, the past few months have seen acts of violence of an unprecedented nature committed in the provinces of South Africa.

This state of affairs cannot be allowed to continue. We in Ghana have always believed that the positive changes in South Africa cannot be sustained without continued external pressures. It is for this reason that my delegation would like to emphasise the continued importance of the role of the international community in exerting such pressures as are necessary on the authorities of South Africa, to facilitate the creation of the conditions conducive to the realisation of a non-racial democratic society in South Africa. It is also by exerting such pressures that the authorities in South Africa can be made to accept and discharge their responsibilities in maintaining law and order and thereby bringing peace and security to all the people of South Africa.

While my delegation welcomes the achievements of the past two years in South Africa, we would like to point out that the struggle for a non-racial democratic society is not yet over. We are reminded daily by the news media that the struggles continue in the streets, in the townships, in the mines, in the cities and all over South Africa, as the black majority demands the restoration of their basic human rights and fundamental freedoms.

At this stage in the struggle of the people of South Africa, the support of the international community is as crucial as it was in the past. It is therefore the hope of this delegation that, as in previous years, the International Labour Conference will demonstrate its solidarity with and support for the struggling people of South Africa by adopting the Report and conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, this time without a vote.

The resolutions on South Africa have of late been adopted without a vote at the UN General Assembly and at the UN Commission on Human Rights. We believe that this example can be emulated in this forum. Indeed, so far as the delegation of Ghana is concerned, the conclusions of the report contained in Provisional Record No. 21 are rather mild. We therefore urge all delegations to join in its adoption by consensus. By so doing, this body will be sending a clear message to the authorities in Pretoria on the need to expedite the political reforms already begun.

Original – Chinese: Mrs. ZHANG (Government adviser, China) – I would like to take this opportunity to express our thanks to the secretariat for the work it has done. The Chinese Government delegation appreciates the report submitted to the Conference by the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

This report gives a detailed account of the South African people's struggle against apartheid. It points to the positive changes that have taken place in South Africa over the past year and it also stresses the need for governments, employers and trade unions to continue to exert pressure on the South African authorities to force them to abolish the apartheid system at an early date.

In recent years the South African Government has taken a series of important reform measures for which we would like to express our appreciation, and we note that Codesa has made some progress in its negotiations. We hope that the South African Government will make further efforts to ensure the continuation of the ongoing peace process. At the same time we hope that all the liberation organisations in South Africa will further close their ranks in this critical moment of the constitutional negotiations. We hope that you will take a common stand so as to bring about a united democratic and non-racial new South Africa at an early date.

The past year has witnessed continued progress of the struggle of the South African people against apartheid with remarkable achievements. We are very glad for that. We wish that they will make new progress until final success.

The Chinese Government has always supported the just struggle of the South African people against racism and we support the comprehensive sanctions against South Africa. In the future we will, together with the countries of southern Africa, keep pressure on the South African Government and make positive efforts to bring about a political settlement to the South African question.

We look forward to the early emergence of a united, democratic and non-racial South Africa.

Original – French: Mr. ATSOUAYE (Government delegate, Congo) – Our delegation is honoured to be able to address this august Conference where we are working for peace, freedom and democracy and raise our voices through our organisation, the ILO, to denounce the anti-social practices which our brothers and sisters in South Africa suffer from. We would like to avail ourselves of this opportunity to salute the convening of this Conference which is held at a historic moment and we would also like to express our gratitude to all those who have been working towards the inclusion of our country on the Committee as a deputy member. We would like to express our gratitude and we do hope that our Government will do its utmost not to disappoint you.

We have noted the ILO's actions on southern Africa as well as those of the international community, the employers, workers, Government members and the Group of Independent Experts, and express our solidarity with all those working for democracy in South Africa.

Our national solidarity movement with the South African people, bearing in mind our underlying motives, has contributes to a positive solution of the South African situation in keeping with the wishes of its people and the interests of the international community. We can but rejoice at any step forward but are disappointed at obstacles remaining in the way of an effective solution.

Despite this contradictory situation, it is our firm conviction that at the end of the day the will of the people of southern Africa to achieve national unity and the support of the whole vast range of the international community behind this just cause, the present pressure towards sovereignty, democracy and peace will mean that sooner or later South Africa will be reunited in independence and peace. But, as the South African people hope, through the statements made at this Conference by various speakers, we do hope that the remaining obstacles will shortly be overcome and that we will shortly achieve the elimination of apartheid, putting an end to the tragedy of the country's racial division and in this way wiping out the threat of conflict which is ever present.

Negotiations which have begun, not without difficulty, have strengthened our view that it is important, more than ever, that the international comunity express its wish for a speedy and expeditious solution to the problems of South Africa which necessitates the involvement of all parties.

We all know the history of Africa and its role in the commonwealth of nations. It is the cradle of mankind and has always been present at the great moments of history. Great contingents of people have gone out over the world from Africa and it is in Africa that some now affluent nations began. Today, as everyone knows, Africa has all the eyes of the world on it and its list of misfortunes, disasters, poverty and so on and so forth. In southern Africa, apartheid continues to give rise to our concern and unfortunately has not yet reached its point of no return. Apartheid and racial discrimination cannot constitute legitimate policies, more particularly in the field of employment where subjective, racial criteria cannot prevail. This concern has naturally brought us here together under the aegis of the ILO to think together about the future of South Africa which has been divided against the will of its people and to find the necessary cures.

Many praiseworthy efforts have been undertaken, both by employers, workers and governments. We have all done our utmost and worked diligently to make our necessary contributions, but these efforts, which we certainly appreciate in our delegation, will not suffice for the future of a democratic South Africa and we feel that more must be done by the Government of South Africa to wipe out apartheid. This is why our delegation, which unreservedly supports the measures that have been taken towards the dismantling of apartheid without conditions for a united, free and prosperous South Africa, demand that they be strengthened. The rationale behind ideologies has often served to disguise oppression. But now the time has come for us to preach mutual assistance, cooperation and international solidarity on the basis of recognition that peace can only be brought about by healthy economic development and social justice for all peoples of the world who have a constant struggle against deprivation, apartheid, partition and poverty, wherever they exist.

Our country, the Congo, continues to support just causes across the world and will unreservedly support all liberation movements in favour of democracy, independence and peace and social progress. The struggle for peace is a condition of development. There can be no peace on this earth while human rights are being abused anywhere in the world

Our country, the Congo, is ready and willing to struggle alongside the Committee on Apartheid, the Group of Independent Experts and with anyone else in order to uphold and ensure implementation of our conclusions here. And once again we congratulate you on the conclusions to which this Committee has come. We take note of the Director-General's Special Report on the Application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa. We believe that the ILO must continue to work on this and reaffirm the commitment and policy of our Government in international cooperation for the developments which we find listed in this Declaration. And we also reaffirm the principles and objectives behind the Declaration on progress and development in social areas, as well as the guiding principles behind policies and programmes of social protection on development in the near future. We are asking for effective implementation of them as means of bringing around a fair social situation in South Africa. And also note with grave concern the interest expressed by various speakers on this issue in discussions that have been at times contradictory but which have led to the approval of the conclusions of the Committee. We call on the international community to pay particular attention to the deteriorating economic and social situation in southern Africa and to ensure that present developments and international world relations do not add further to the present difficulties of southern Africa. We also call on all delegates to take initiatives and apply consistent measures after this Conference so as to achieve the goals laid down in the framework of the elimination of apartheid. National policies in the areas of employment, education, the well-being of our children, the participation, without discrimination, in the process of development, as well as the inclusion and full participation of women in development, because all human beings whatever their race, belief or gender are entitled to material and spiritual development, enjoying freedom and dignity, economic security with equal opportunities.

As we move towards the twenty-first century and with the advent of the new social and economic order beyond political situations, let us still at least work towards security and safety across the world and not just in southern Africa. And we hope that we will shortly see a single, indivisible and prosperous, independent and democratic South Africa.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-SABBAH (representative of Palestine) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like – on behalf of Palestine and on my own behalf – to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, Mr. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare, Zimbabwe. He presided over the work of this Committee brilliantly and gave it a touch of authenticity because he is a former champion of freedom and believes firmly in the right to self-determination. Therefore, on behalf of the Palestinian people – a people who have suffered under the shameful occupation of Israel – I should like to thank him for his efficient work.

I should also like, on behalf of the Palestinian people I am honoured to represent at this forum, to congratulate sincerely the people of South Africa and the workers in this country. I congratulate them for the victory they have won after a struggle of many years. They indeed obtained a victory: in spite of a number of obstacles that we must eliminate forever, the racist regime in South Africa will disappear forever.

The success of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, held in Harare last May, and the conclusions of the Committee give us many grounds for hope. We see them as a good omen for the future. We believe that the racist regime is breathing its last breath and that it will soon expire. We should therefore like to encourage the people of South Africa in their struggles.

Whatever happens, any delay in the dismantling of this regime will only prolong the suffering of this people and perpetrate the existence of a system which flouts all international laws and will be overthrown.

Neither racial discrimination nor apartheid sould be tolerated in our age; they should be eliminated. No relations of this kind should exist between human beings and nations.

The Palestinian people, irrespective of their class and social origin, fully supports the conclusions of the Committee. In a number of cases, these conclusions could have been stronger to strengthen the struggle against this regime, which tries to hide behind a so-called dialogue and to hold on to its privileges by giving the white minority more rights than those of blacks, who are the traditional landowners in this part of the world.

We believe that without a democracy and without a constitution that grants equal rights to all, the provisional government cannot exist. The continuation of this regime only increases the suffering of the South African people. The regime is relying on foreign powers who share the same racist philosophy which should no longer exist in our modern society. The downfall of the South African racist regime would imply the downfall of another racist regime, which is occupying Palestine.

The Palestinian delegation supports the just conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid which calls for the immediate liberation of political prisoners – imprisoned only because they expressed their opinion. We fully support this demand – as do all those who believe in peace and freedom throughout the world.

We should like to call upon the International Labour Organisation to provide technical assistance to the people and the workers of South Africa who have been suffering for so long, like us Palestinians, who are suffering under the occupation of a chauvinist minority.

We should therefore like to ask the International Labour Organisation and other competent bodies to support the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, so that this programme might be incorporated in the framework of social development activities in order to lighten the burden weighing on the shoulders of the people of South Africa; indeed, they have been suffering various forms of deprivation for more than 50 years. It is time that racist regimes should be wiped off the face of the earth and that the people of South Africa should be able to exercise their basic rights, particularly the right to own land. They must be masters of their own destiny and future.

In concluding, I should like, on behalf of the Palestinian people to congratulate sincerely the people of South Africa and hope that they will soon be able to achieve social progress, equality and justice in their country. Our people will continue to support them in their fight for freedom because they are the victims of occupation, in the same way that we are in Palestine. Victory always comes to those who seek it.

Ms. LISWANI (Government delegate, Namibia) – I would like to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of this august Conference. I wish to thank the Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, the Honourable Minister Nkomo, the two Vice-Chairmen and the members of the Committee for a job well done. The Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid and the conclusions of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa in Harare, Zimbabwe have provided us with detailed information indicating the continued existence of apartheid in South Africa. It is a policy which is continuing despite the wishes of the people of South Africa and the international community.

The two speakers from South Africa, who witness the daily suffering of the people of that country because of the existence of apartheid is strong and alive in South Africa. No serious efforts are being made to dismantle it by the minority regime.

I represent the Government and the people of Namibia. My country emerged from decades of apartheid and colonialism just two years ago. The people of Namibia waged two decades of political, diplomatic and armed struggle against the same minority regime in South Africa. The people of Namibia had a prolonged struggle due to the bahaviour and deceitful tactics of the minority regime in South Africa, which torpedoed any peaceful solution to the conflict. It took over ten years of protracted negotiations before UN Security Council resolution 435 could be implemented. It was partially responsible for bringing about the independence of Namibia in 1990.

Today, two years after the independence of Namibia, UN Security Council resolution 432 calling for the reintegration of Walvis Bay into Namibia has still not been implemented. It is against this background and with our own experience in dealing with a minority regime that the Government of Namibia has cautioned that the few changes which have taken place so far in South Africa should not mislead us into relaxing our efforts to dismantle apartheid.

The people of Namibia believe that all pressure must be exerted on the apartheid regime until a democratic South Africa is born. The Government of Namibia will do all it can to assist the democratic process in South Africa, to fight for peace, social justice and the dismantling of apartheid.

Finally, I wish to support the calls made by previous speakers that this Conference adopt the report of the Committee.

Original – Arabic: Mr. EL-HERRAWI (Employers' adviser, Egypt) – Our work, as every year, is based on the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid in South Africa.

Apart from the report of the Special Tripartite Conference held in May this year in Harare, the Egyptian employers' delegation would like to say something about the positive developments which have been taking place in South Africa over the last few years. However, it must be said that these positive developments cannot mask the negative aspects such as violence, which is continuing and threatening the life of the Black population. It is necessary to put an end to this violence. Police intervention which leads only to a deterioration of the situation is an interference which must be halted.

Codesa II, unfortunately, did not reach an agreement as regards conflicts and the matters under dispute. Therefore it is essential that the present dialogue lead to success and that the Codesa III meets the legitimate and logical hopes and aspirations of the ANC.

On the basis of what I have just said and with a view to achieving the goal in question, the ILO is able to play an important role as regards the respect of labour legislation in South Africa in order to contribute to the changes – irreversible changes – which are taking place in South African society.

To this end, it would be appropriate to provide technical aid to the black trade unions and to the non-racist employers' and workers' organisations, which are subject to discrimination and to strengthen controls and monitoring – on the implementation of labour legislation in South Africa which suffers from discrimination as regards labour and trade union rights.

Preparing the way for the future society after the elimination of apartheid is a matter where the ILO must play its role and give great attention to this matter, since it will be possible to influence in a positive manner the future of millions of black workers in South Africa.

We should not forget that the respect for principles and internationally recognised labour standards in South Africa would also be the basis for the economic development of this country and future investment possibilities.

Many international organisations have discussed the matter of apartheid and have reached the following conclusions. First of all, they recognise the need to encourage and continue dialogue in South Africa for the creation of a provisional government, thus establishing the basis for a non-racist society where all citizens would enjoy equal rights and obligations.

Secondly, continued pressure should be brought to bear by the international community on South Africa until such time as the goal has been reached; that is, the establishment of a non-racist democratic society in South Africa.

Therefore, the Employers' delegation of Egypt gives its support to the report adopted by the Committee on Action against Apartheid, and we would like to express our thanks to that committee and to its Chairman and the two Vice-Chairmen as well as the secretariat of the ILO, particularly Mr. Abdel Rahman, Assistant Director-General.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA) – The Conference has just completed a thorough discussion on this important question. Due account has been taken of all the comments and reservations made in the course of the debate which will be duly recorded, as well as the reservations mentioned in the report of the Committee.

May I take it that the report and the conclusions are adopted? I see no objections.

(The report and its conclusions are adopted.)

Allow me to express my satisfaction at the fact that this report and its conclusions have been adopted by consensus by our Conference. I believe that this consensus expresses the wish on the part of all delegations that in the shortest time possible we should witness the establishment and definitive consolidation in South Africa of a free and democratic society which fully respects the rights of both the majority and minorities of the communities which make up that country.

Once again, I would like to repeat my congratulations to the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and Reporter of the Committee for the excellent work which has been done.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.15 p.m.)

CORRIGENDUM

Provisional Record No 22, speech by Mr. AGAGUSEINOV: The speaker's name should be preceded by "Original – Azerbaijani"; on page 26, left-hand column, second full paragraph, line 7: after "education" insert: "In the 20th century we have witnessed a policy of genocide against the Azerbaijanis in total disregard of the International Covenants on Human Rights." In the right-hand column, at the end of Mr. Agaguseinov's speech, add the following four paragraphs:

"In nominal terms, household income has risen. However, these increases have quickly been outstripped by rises in the cost of living.

A social protection concept is currently being drawn up by the Republic's Government. This work has highlighted a number of deficiencies in the social standards of our Republic and the specific situation it now faces. It is therefore extremely important first and foremost to earmark a minimum budget for social programmes, taking into account the various social and demographic groups. Of course, we know that the new concept should not mean that everyone receives an equal share from the distribution system and from social benefits. It is thus important that we make as extensive use as possible of international experience by adapting it to our country's specific case. Our job now is to derive legislative and economic principles to set the parameters of our social protection system.

Before concluding I would like to emphasise that one of the most difficult tasks facing the trade unions will be to earn the trust of the workers. Already, existing trade unions are introducing reforms, and new trade unions have been established. We believe it is essential to guarantee freedom of association if the trade union movement is to develop. Thanks to the right of legislative initiative, we have brought before the Supreme Council a draft law which guarantees freedom of association, including certain basic rights of workers, such as the right to strike. We shall make every effort to see this law through the adoption process, as it establishes the conditions required for the development of a democratically based trade union movement.

I should like to make one last remark before concluding. Mr Hansenne has quite rightly noted that no sooner is political freedom established than the population feels more destitute than ever, since reactionary forces made use of their poverty for their own ends. I call on the International Labour Organisation to do everything possible to assist the countries that recently shed totalitarianism, so as to avoid a rebirth of dictatorship."

Provisional Record

Seventy-ninth Session, Geneva, 1992

24 * (rev.)

Fifth item on the agenda: The prevention of industrial disasters

Report of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters

1. The Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters was set up by the International Labour Conference at its first sitting on 3 June 1992. It was originally composed of 140 members (61 Government members, 36 Employers' members and 43 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member having the right to vote was allotted 129 votes, each Employers' member 215 votes and each Workers' member 180 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified several times during this session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman: Dr. Payaman J. Simanjuntak (Government member, Indonesia);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. C. K. Hyder (Employers' member, Bangladesh) and Mr. P. Aro (Workers' member, Finland);

Reporter: Mr. T. Seymour (Government member, United States).

3. At its eleventh sitting the Committee appointed a Committee Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Miss C. Clemente (Government member of France); Mr. G. Simonnet (Employers' member, France); Ms. S. Mayman (Workers' member, Australia); and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee had before it Reports V (1) and V (2) prepared by the Office for a first discussion by the Conference of the fifth item on the agenda: "Prevention of Industrial Disasters". The proposed Conclusions submitted by the Office were contained in Report V (2).

5. The Committee held 17 sittings.

General discussion

6. The Assistant Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr. Morozov, addressed the first sitting of the Committee and proceeded with the election of its Chairman. The representative of the Secretary-General, Dr. Kogi, presented the two reports and reviewed the considerations which had led the Governing Body to place the item of the prevention of industrial disasters on the agenda of the Conference. Based on the discussions on the issues raised by the disaster in Bhopal in 1984, the International Labour Conference adopted, in June 1985, a resolution concerning the promotion of measures against risks and accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry. In response to the resolution, the ILO took a number of actions including the convening of an ad hoc meeting of consultants, preparation of a manual on major hazard control and a code of practice on the prevention of major industrial accidents, organisation of a series of regional and national workshops and providing advisory services for establishing national systems for major hazard control as well as the development and operation of technical cooperation projects. These experiences showed that well coordinated efforts at national level were necessary to protect workers, the environment and the public from potential major industrial accidents. He noted that the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention and a Recommendation in Report V (2) were based on replies received to the questionnaire in Report V (1). The Chairman thanked the Committee for his unanimous election and hoped to accomplish its tasks which have a significant impact not only on the improvement of working conditions and environment of workers in the major hazard installations but also on the protection of the general environment and the public. He expressed his confidence in a constructive spirit of cooperation.

7. The spokesman of the Employers' members stated that there was broad consensus among employers regarding the importance of establishing major hazard control systems. He underlined the employers' concern for the protection of the health of the workers, and noted that this concern prompted many employers to introduce in-plant safety measures. While pledging their cooperation in the formulation of new international standards on the prevention of industrial disasters, the employers cautioned that a systematic and practical approach should be adopted in dealing with the subject. The standards should be flexible, based on broad principles, and provide for exemptions of specific installations which are covered by separate guidelines. This approach would ensure acceptability by a large number of countries.

8. The spokesman of the Workers' members agreed that the Office text of the Proposed Conclusions was a very useful first draft for a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. He noted that an increasing number of industrial disasters had incurred serious effects on the workers' health, neighbouring communities and surrounding environment. He stated that the rate and the extent of damage caused to people and the environment had increased substantially in recent years. Common underlying causes included storage of large quantities of hazardous chemicals, process malfunctions, poor maintenance of machinery, inadequate emergency preparedness, poor legislative and inspection mechanisms, lack of information and absence of sound personnel policy. The subject of major hazard control thus received an impetus at the international level through activities launched by the ILO in collaboration with other international organisations. Particular reference was made to the resolution concerning the Promotion of Measures against Risks and Accidents Arising out of the Use of Dangerous Substances and Processes in Industry adopted by the International Labour Conference in June 1985 and action taken by the Office to give effect to this Resolution. There was little need for distinction between fixed and mobile installations. The instruments should address the risks regardless of where they were including those in transport. The responsibility for the safe operation of major hazard installations was clearly that of management. Prevention must be based on a cooperative tripartite structure.

9. The Government member of the United States considered that the instrument should take the form of a new Convention that comprised fundamental safety and health provisions for the prevention of industrial disasters. Several Government members, particularly those members from Argentina, Australia, China, Japan, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Poland, the Russian Federation, Switzerland, the United States and Zimbabwe also supported the adoption of new instruments. They specifically considered that the proposals should facilitate wider acceptability among the constituents by placing emphasis on the general characteristics of a major hazard control system.

10. The Government member of Switzerland proposed the establishment of an international alert system to avert industrial disasters especially among neighbouring countries.

11. The Government member of China noted that work on the prevention of industrial disasters was essential for the protection of the workers' health and should be supported by all member States. In view of the severity of previous accidents, strong action should be taken at the national level. It was the responsibility of the competent authorities and management to ensure the safe operation of major hazard installations.

12. The Government member of Japan underlined that the instruments should focus on the protection of workers and should refer to matters relating to the protection of the public and the environment. They should provide for the exclusion of installations by the competent authority where it has determined that an equivalent protection was provided under national regulations.

13. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya noted that the pace of industrial development was not paralleled by the application of advanced control technology aimed at averting industrial disasters. This resulted in the loss of life among the workers and the general public and in extensive damage to the environment. Therefore, priority was essential in this field.

14. The Government member of the Russian Federation emphasised the need for action to preven industrial disasters. Advanced technology and the wide use of chemicals necessitated action for the adoption of an international standard.

15. The Government member of Argentina stressed that tripartite cooperation was extremely important to ensure consensus for the implementation of major hazard control programmes. It was important to incorporate the issues of the protection o the environment and the public in proposed international standards. The provision of information to the workers and the public was also important.

16. The Government member of Poland emphasised that the hazards associated with advanced technology and industrial development required greate attention to risk assessment. The work on an instrument on the prevention of industrial disasters should take into consideration other ILO Conventions and the work done by other UN agencies and the exclusions envisaged in the instrument should be restricted.

17. The Government member of Australia noted that the Convention should be flexible so as to allow for the application of varying national practices in member States.

18. The Government member of Zimbabwe urged that the new instrument should avoid any duplication of the work of other United Nations agencies. The provisions for exemption of industrial activities from the scope of the instrument should be based on tripartite consultations.

19. The representative of the Commission of the European Communities reviewed its work in the field of major hazard control with specific reference to the EEC Council Directive on the major-acciden hazards of certain industrial activities (82/501/EEC) the "Seveso" Directive which was being updated The prevention of industrial accidents and the protection of the workers' health were the first line o defence for the subsequent protection of the genera public and environment. In this regard, the Commission was pleased to note that the proposed instruments had given due consideration to the principle embodied in the Directive. It looked forward to continuing collaboration with the ILO in future activities.

Examination of the Proposed Conclusions contained in Report V (2)

FORM OF THE INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS

Point 1

20. An amendment proposed by the Governmen member of Japan to replace the words "through system of major hazard control also called proces safety management" by the words "through preventive and protective measures for major hazard installations", on the ground that the change made th instruments more flexible and comprehensive, wa withdrawn as the majority preferred the Office text

21. Point 1 was adopted without amendment.

Point 2

22. The Government member of Portugal speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, and the United Kingdom, member States of the European Communities (EC) withdrew two amendments that proposed to insert additional wording to the effect that the instruments should be essentially concerned with the protection of workers and that the Recommendation should also take into account aspects related to the protection of the public and the environment. The Office text that dealt with the form of the instruments was retained.

23. Point 2 was adopted without amendment.

PREAMBLE

24. An amendment by the Workers' members to refer to additional four instruments in the preamble was withdrawn as the majority preferred to limit the reference to the most relevant instruments. The Government members of member States of the EC submitted another amendment to add the words "in order to point out the need for a global and coherent approach to occupational safety and health". This was subamended by the Workers' members to delete the reference to occupational safety and health. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

25. The Employers' members moved an amendment to make reference to the ILO Code of Practice on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents, published in 1991. This was subamended by the Workers' members simply to refer to it and avoid mentioning its use as guidance for national laws and regulations.

26. Point 3, as amended, was adopted.

27. The Government member of Australia proposed to replace the word "accident" by the word "incident" throughout the text of the proposed conclusions to ensure broader flexibility and scope. The amendment was withdrawn following discussion. The Workers' members also submitted an amendment requiring that appropriate measures in major hazard control be the responsibility of the management. This was opposed by the majority and was subsequently withdrawn on the understanding that the responsibility of the management in major hazard control remained fundamental.

28. The Government member of Argentina withdrew an amendment in favour of another which had been submitted by the Workers' members requesting that the concept of "prevention" be added to clause (a). While the notion was accepted by some Government members, the Employers' members, supported by other Government members, resisted it on the grounds that it was impractical to attain zero risk. After a lengthy discussion, the Chairman decided to convene a tripartite Working Party to examine all amendments and subamendments to Point 4. The text proposed by the Working Party read:

The preamble should provide that the instruments should have regard to the need to ensure that all appropriate measures are taken to prevent major accidents; to minimise the risks of major accidents and to minimise the effects of major accidents. In doing so, proper consideration should be given to the causes of such accidents including organisational errors, human factors, component failures, deviations from normal operational conditions, outside interference and natural forces.

29. Point 4, as amended, was adopted.

Point 5

30. The Government members of member States of the EC proposed to insert the words "whilst essentially concerned with the protection of workers" after the word "instruments" which they considered would address the issue of worker protection more directly. The majority felt that the scope of the instruments should not be limited and opposed the amendment, which was withdrawn. Another amendment introduced by the Government members of Australia, Canada, New Zealand and Swaziland to ensure coordination and consistency within the IPCS and with other intergovernmental organisations was withdrawn in the face of opposition. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to enable the instruments to have regards to the work of other organisations. This amendment was also opposed by the majority and subsequently withdrawn.

31. Point 5 was adopted without amendment.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention

I. DEFINITIONS AND SCOPE

Point 6

32. An amendment proposed by the Government members of member States of the EC to insert the words "or mixture" after the words "mean a substance" in clause (a) was accepted. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to insert the words "or organism" after the words "a substance" in the same clause was rejected by 69,006 votes against 40,672 in favour, with 4,557 abstentions. In consequence, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment which sought to refer to the biological hazards in clause (a). Another amendment was proposed by the Workers' members seeking to expand the definition of the term "hazardous substance" to include the notion of a combination of substances. The Employers' members opposed this amendment arguing that clause (a) was defining terminologies and not operational conditions and that this clause was defining hazards related to properties of substances and not to hazards related to situations. The Government member of Egypt withdrew a subamendment in favour of another proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom supporting the views of the Government members of the member States of the EC which sought to insert the words "or combination" before the words "which by virtue". After a lengthy discussion on the amendment and subamendments, the Chairman called on the Working Party to examine the amendments and the subamendment introduced to Point 6.

33. The text produced by the Working Party for Point 6 read:

For the purpose of the Convention:

(a) the term "hazardous substance" should mean a substance or mixture which by virtue of chemical, physical or toxicological properties, either singly or in combination, constitutes a hazard;

(b) the term "major accident" should mean an unexpected, sudden occurrence, such as a major emission, fire or explosion, resulting from developments in the course of an activity within a major hazard installation, involving one or more hazardous substances and leading to a serious danger to workers, the public or the environment whether immediate or delayed;

(c) the term "major hazard installation" should mean that which processes, produces, disposes, handles, uses or stores, either permanently or temporarily, one or more hazardous substances or categories of substances in quantities which exceed the threshold quantity;

(d) the term "threshold quantity" should mean that quantity, prescribed in national laws and regulations, of a hazardous substance or categories of substances which if exceeded identifies a major hazard installation;

(e) the term "safety report" should mean a written presentation of the technical, management and operational information covering the hazards of a major hazard installation and their control in support of a justification for the safety of the installation.

During the debate on the draft text, the Workers' members remarked that the definitions needed to be re-examined in the light of the decisions to be taken by the Committee. The text proposed by the Working Party was adopted by consensus.

34. Point 6, as amended, was adopted.

Point 7

35. An amendment by the Workers' members to delete Point 7 was withdrawn in the face of opposition. The Government members of Australia, Poland and Zimbabwe proposed amendments to delete clause (a) on the grounds that the desired flexibility was provided by clause (b) of the same point. The amendments were opposed by the Employers' members and by some Government members who argued that the provisions in the instruments sought to exclude particular installations that were covered by specific regulations. The Government member of Cyprus submitted a subamendment to the amendments which proposed the deletion of clause (a) to restrict the exclusions from the application of the instrument to nuclear installations only. The subamendment was voted and rejected with 27,621 votes against, 279 votes in favour and 19,809 abstentions. Another subamendment by the Government member of Poland to restrict the exclusions from the application of the instrument to nuclear and military installations was voted and rejected with 27,063 votes against, 2,511 votes in favour and 18,693 abstentions. The amendment to delete clause (a) was voted and rejected with 28,179 votes against, 19,530 votes in favour and 1,116 abstentions.

36. An amendment proposed by the Government members of member States of the EC to add to the end of subclause (a) (i) the words "except for facilities handling non-radioactive substances at these installations" was adopted. An amendment by the Government member of China to delete sub-clause (a) (iii) to ensure inclusion of transport within the scope of the instrument was rejected by 112,406 votes against, 80,290 in favour, with 6,882 abstentions. The Employers' members proposed an amendment to delete the words "other than by pipeline" from subclause (a) (iii) arguing that considering pipelines as major hazard installations presented practical difficulties. They stated that various other means of transport should be excluded from the application of this instrument as relevant international standards existed. The safety measures for mobile facilities and fixed installations might be incompatible. The Workers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that pipelines were considered fixed installations. In the face of more opposition by some Government members, the amendment was withdrawn.

37. The Government member of Japan withdrew two amendments to clause (b) that sought to insert the words "about the protection of workers" after the word "consultation" and to add to the end of the clause the words "by national laws and regulations" following opposition by the majority of the meeting. The Government members of Australia and the United States proposed an amendment to insert the words "and with other parties who may be affected" after the word "concerned" in clause (b) so as to ensure wider consultation. The Government member of Zimbabwe moved a subamendment to this proposal to replace the word "and" by "or" and to insert the word "interested" after the word "other". Following a discussion, the Government member of Zimbabwe agreed to delete the first part of his subamendment. The amendment, as subamended to read "and with other interested parties who may be affected" was adopted. The amendments submitted by the Government members of Australia and Zimbabwe to delete the word "further" from the third line of clause (b) was also adopted.

38. Point 7, as amended, was adopted.

39. The Government members of member States of the EC submitted an amendment in three parts to Point 8. The first part that sought to delete the words "special problems of a substantial nature arise so that" was rejected by the meeting. The second part of the amendment sought to substitute the word "should" in the fourth line by the word "may". It was observed that in some countries major hazard control systems were in operation. In such cases, a requirement to draw up plans for the progressive implementation was irrelevant. The representative of the Secretary-General explained the implications of the words "should" and "may" in Conventions and the Employers' members, the Workers' members and several Government members opposed the substitution. The third part of the amendment sought to tie the plans of the progressive implementation of the provisions of the instrument to a time-frame of ten years. This too met opposition by the majority of the meeting. Subsequently, the amendment was withdrawn.

40. The Government member of Zimbabwe proposed an amendment dealing with the process of consultation in drawing up plans for the progressive implementation of preventive and protective measures. This was similar to an amendment proposed by the Workers' members who, following a discussion, proposed a subamendment to the amendment submitted by the Government member of Zimbabwe which was supported by consensus. The Workers' members proposed to add to the end of Point 8 the words "within an agreed time-frame" which was subamended by the Employers' members to read "within a fixed time-frame" and adopted. The text of Point 8 as finally accepted read:

> Where special problems of a substantial nature arise so that it is not immediately possible to implement all the preventive and protective measures provided for in this Convention, a member State should draw up, in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers, plans for the progressive implementation of the measures concerned within a fixed time-frame.

41. Point 8, as amended, was adopted.

II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

42. Seven amendments were introduced to paragraph (1). The amendment by the Government members of member States of the EC to delete the word "national" from the first line was withdrawn. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment seeking to add the words "and regulations" after the word "policy". The amendments submitted by the Employers' members to insert the words "and by consequence" after the word "workers", and by the Government member of Zimbabwe to insert the word "occupational" after the word "major" were also withdrawn.

43. An amendment was submitted by the Government members of Canada and the United States to extend the consultation process to include other parties who may be affected by major accidents. This was subamended by the Government member of Canada for consistency with the previous clause 7 (b) by inserting the word "interested" before the word "parties" and was adopted. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to add the word "adopt" after the word "formulate". This idea was accepted by consensus. The meeting decided to refer the matter to the Committee Drafting Committee.

44. The Government member of Japan proposed an amendment that sought to put emphasis on worker protection. Following a lengthy discussion, the amendment was accepted with 96,274 votes in favour, 92,070 votes against, with 2,294 abstentions. The text of the paragraph as amended read:

> 9 (1) In the light of national laws and regulations, conditions and practice, and in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers, and with other interested parties who may be affected, each Member should formulate, adopt and periodically review a coherent national policy concerning the protection of workers against the risks of major accidents considering their effects on the public and the environment.

45. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Zimbabwe to paragraph (2) which sought consistency with previous texts was withdrawn. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to the same paragraph which proposed inserting the words "and regulations" after the word "policy" indicating their willingness to re-examine the issue in 1993 with wording already adopted. The Workers' members submitted another amendment which proposed to end paragraph 9 (2) by the words "and, where appropriate, should promote the use of the best available safety technologies", arguing that it was in the interest of everybody to safeguard installations by the best technology. The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that the meaning of the word "best" was relative and that the proposal did not offer flexibility. In the face of similar concerns by the Government members of the United States and Hungary, the Government member of Zimbabwe introduced a subamendment to replace the words "best available" by the words "most suitable", whereas the Government member of Zambia introduced another to replace the words "where appropriate" by the words "where practical". While the Workers' members supported the second subamendment, the Employers insisted that neither of the subamendments offered an acceptable solution. The Chairman put the amendment by the Workers' members as subamended by the Government member of Zambia to vote and declared its adoption by 52,173 votes in favour, 3,162 votes against with 35,309 abstentions. A question of procedure was raised by the Employers' members following the declaration, as they had understood that the vote was on the subamendment and not on the amendment as subamended. The Government members of member States of the EC voiced the same opinion and the Committee decided to seek legal opinion. The Legal Adviser of the Conference explained that a declaration of the vote by the Chairman was final. Revoting would have been possible at the discretion of the Chairman, had the question been raised before the result of the vote was declared.

46. Point 9, as amended, was adopted.

Point 10

47. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to expand the text in Point 10 to include a process of consultation and a system of classification of all hazardous substances arguing that a system of threshold quantities alone were insufficient in defining major hazard installations. The Employers' members opposed this amendment on the grounds that it rendered the definition of major hazard installations more complex. This view was supported by the Government member of India. The Government members of member States of the EC stated that their amendment which sought to introduce wording similar to that proposed by the Workers' members as well as lists of threshold quantities could offer the basis of an acceptable subamendment. The idea was accepted by the Employers' members and by the Workers' members who submitted a subamendment to their amendment to replace the words "criteria for the identification of major hazard installations, which includes a system for the classification of all hazard substances" by "a system for identification based on categories of hazardous substances and/or a list of hazardous substances". Further subamendments were introduced by the Government members of the United States and Poland. Following a discussion, the meeting agreed on a text which accommodated the ideas in the original amendments introduced by the Government members of Poland regarding the deletion of the words "where applicable", the United States and member States of the EC to replace "6 (c) (i)" by "6 (c)". The meeting adopted the amendment as subamended and referred it to the Committee Drafting Committee. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to introduce the idea of consultations with technical bodies.

48. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to add a new paragraph, which they sub-amended, in order to ensure that the system referred to in paragraph 10 (1) was regularly revised and updated. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

49. Point 10, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 10)

50. The Employers' members proposed a new Point which sought to protect confidential trade secrets whose disclosure to competitors could cause harm to the employers' business. The Government member of Hungary introduced a subamendment to specify the nature of information and to ensure the protection of the worker as well as the public and the environment. This was accepted by the meeting and referred to the Committee Drafting Committee.

51. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

III. PREVENTIVE AND PROTECTIVE MEASURES

IDENTIFICATION

52. An amendment was proposed by the Government members of Australia, Canada, New Zealand, Switzerland and United States which sought to insert the words "or the person or organisation having control of the installation" after the word "employers". In supporting the amendment, the Government member of Switzerland pointed out that under Swiss law, the employer was responsible for the safety and health of the workers whereas the responsibility for major accidents rested with the owner of the installation who may not be the employer. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that the term "employer" in general included the legal responsibility for all conditions of employment. It was defined in the Construction Convention No. 167 to cover the specific situation in the industry concerning the employment of contract labour. The Workers expressed some reservation regarding the implication of the proposals made in the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn. Identical amendments proposed for several other points were also withdrawn.

53. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to replace the word "list" by the word "criteria" in favour of another amendment submitted by the Government members of member States of the EC to replace the same word by the word "system". This amendment was adopted by consensus.

54. Point 11, as amended, was adopted.

ARRANGEMENTS AT THE LEVEL OF THE INSTALLATION

55. The amendment proposed by the Workers' members to insert the words "documented, ongoing" before the word "system" was subamended by the Employers' members to delete the word "ongoing" and adopted. Pursuant to a previous discussion on clause 6 (a) the insertion of the words "including consideration of possible interactions between substances" at the end of clause 12 (a) proposed by the Employers' members was adopted by consensus.

56. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to clause (b) which sought to discuss the organisational and the technical measures under separate clauses, and emphasise the principle of the choice of chemicals and the use of adequate engineering control measures to minimise risk. This faced opposition from the employers who argued that the choice of chemicals which minimised the risks caused problems of practicable nature, and from the Government members of New Zealand, Poland, Senegal and the United States who preferred to retain the Office text. The Workers' members also proposed another amendment to subclause 12 (b) (ii) in which they presented the components of a detailed organisational system for the operation of a major hazard installation. The Government member of Germany supporting the views of the Government members of the member States of the EC opposed this amendment on the grounds that it was too detailed for the text of a Convention. Following further discussions, the Workers' members proposed a subamendment which sought to incorporate the two amendments they had already submitted. This subamendment was adopted by 64,032 votes in favour, 49,358 votes against with 2,668 abstentions. The adopted text of the amendments to clause (b) as subamended read:

> (b) the technical measures, including: design, construction, choice of chemicals, operation, maintenance and systematic inspection of the installation; . . . the organisational measures, including: training and instruction of personnel, staffing levels and hours of work, definition of responsibilities and control systems for outside contractors and temporary workers;

57. The Government members of member States of the EC proposed another amendment to subclause 12 (b) (ii) which required the provision of safety equipment. This amendment was adopted by consensus and its insertion in the relevant text of clause 12 (b) was left to the Committee Drafting Committee.

58. The Government members of Norway and Sweden proposed an amendment to introduce to clause (b) a new subclause to safeguard against the consequences of a major accident. The Workers' members supported this amendment while the Employers' members opposed it on the grounds that it broadened the scope of the Office text. The amendment was voted and adopted by 54,694 votes in favour, 50,025 votes against with 11,339 abstentions.

59. An amendment proposed by the Workers' members to insert the words "but not limited to" after the word "including" in clause (c) was withdrawn.

60. The Government members of Australia, Canada, New Zealand, Norway, Swaziland, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States proposed an amendment to introduce to clause (c) a new subclause which required the emergency plans and procedures to include "periodic testing and evaluation of the effectiveness of such emergency plans and procedures and revision as necessary". The Employers' members opposed the amendment since it involved a subject that was discussed elsewhere in the instrument. The Government members of member States of the EC and the Government members of Cyprus, Egypt, Poland and the United States supported the amendment. In order to achieve consensus, the Employers' members proposed a subamendment to place the text at the end of 12 (c) (i). This was further subamended by the Government member of the United States to insert the word "site" before "emergency plans". The amendment as subamended was adopted.

61. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to introduce a new clause which addressed the question of consultation. The Employers' members remarked that this was the subject of Point 23, a view which was supported by several Government members. After discussion, the Employers' members proposed a subamendment to replace the words "and their representatives" by "concerned with respect to safety issues", which was rejected with 64,699 votes against, 46,023 in favour with 4,669 abstentions. The amendment of the Workers' members was adopted with 64,699 votes in favour, 45,356 votes against with 4,669 abstentions.

62. Point 12, as amended, was adopted.

NOTIFICATION

Point 13

63. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to insert the words "workers and their representatives and the public" after the word "authority" was withdrawn. An amendment proposed by the Workers' members to place the words, "before it is put into operation, and, for existing installations, within an agreed time-frame" at the end of Point 13 was subamended by the Employers' members who proposed the substitution of the words "an agreed" by the words "a fixed" and adopted. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to define the term "competent authority" as it was understood that the meaning of this term in the proposed conclusions and in the Code of Practice was identical.

64. Point 13, as amended, was adopted.

SAFETY REPORT

Point 14

65. An amendment proposed by the Government members of member States of the EC to insert the word "detailed" before the word "safety" was withdrawn. The Government members of member States of the EC proposed another amendment which sought to insert the words "based on the requirements of Point 12" after the word "report" and to delete the rest of the paragraph. This amendment was adopted by consensus. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to add a new paragraph on the definition of safety report as it was already included in Point 6.

66. Point 14, as amended, was adopted.

67. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to clause (a) which sought to insert the words "significant to the safety level" after the word "modification" in favour of a similar amendment by the Government member of Poland which was adopted by consensus. An amendment by the Government members of member States of the EC to delete the word "national" was withdrawn.

68. The Government members of member States of the EC introduced a new clause to read "On the request of the competent authority" on the grounds that this gave powers to the competent authority to request updates on the safety reports. The Employers' members opposed the amendment since its provisions were addressed under clause (c). The Workers' members agreed that there was a need to empower the competent authority to request updates on safety reports especially in cases where the national laws and regulations mentioned under clause (c) did not exist. The Government member of Canada proposed a subamendment to replace clause (c) by the words "as prescribed by national laws or regulations". After discussion the Government member of Canada withdrew the subamendment and the original amendment by the Government members of member States of the EC was adopted by 68,701 votes in favour, 44,689 votes against with 5,336 abstentions. The proposal by the Workers' members to reverse the order of Points 15 and 16 was referred to the Committee Drafting Committee.

69. Point 15, as amended, was adopted.

Point 16

70. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to replace the word "or" by the word "and".

71. Point 16 was adopted without amendment.

GENERAL PROTECTIVE MEASURES

Point 17

72. Four amendments were introduced to this Point. The Government members of member States of the EC submitted an amendment to add the words "Taking into account the information provided by the employer" at the beginning of Point 17 which was adopted by consensus. They also submitted two other amendments the first of which proposed to delete the word "any" from the first line, while the second proposed to replace the word "contain" by the word "containing" and the words "which are" by the words "are produced and", seeking to specify the role of the competent authority in the preparation of off-site emergency plans. While the Workers' members agreed with the two amendments, the Employers' members and some Government members preferred to retain the Office text. After discussion, the two amendments were adopted with 69,368 votes in favour, 2,668 votes against with 47,357 abstentions. An amendment proposed by the Government members of Canada and the United States to add the words "and coordinated with relevant parties" at the end of Point 17 was adopted by consensus and the text was referred to the Committee Drafting Committee.

73. Point 17, as amended, was adopted.

Point 18

74. An amendment by the Workers' members to add the word "appropriate" before the word "information" in subclause (a) (i) was withdrawn, and clause (a) was adopted. The Workers' members and the Government member of Poland proposed two similar amendments which sought to replace the words "as soon as possible" by the word "immediately". While some Government members agreed with the proposals, the Employers' members opposed them on the grounds that the word was difficult to define and that it could induce premature action which would jeopardise the safety of the public. The two amendments were simultaneously rejected by 60,030 votes against, 52,026 votes in favour with 5,336 abstentions. The Government members of Canada, Norway, Switzerland and the United States withdrew an amendment dealing with the transboundary effects of major accidents in favour of a similar amendment which was proposed by the Workers' members and adopted by consensus.

75. Point 18, as amended, was adopted.

ACCIDENT REPORTING

Point 19

76. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment concerning the reporting of major accidents in favour of a similar amendment which was proposed by the Government members of Finland, Norway, Sweden and the United States and adopted by consensus. The amendment replaced in the first line the words "report a major accident immediately to" by the word "inform", deleted the word "to" in the second line and added the words "as soon as a major accident occurs" at the end of the Point. The Workers' members withdrew two amendments which sought to insert the word "concerned" after the word "other" and to delete the words "designated for this purpose" from the second line in Point 19.

77. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to insert the words "or near-miss" after the word "accident" on the grounds that the lessons learned from near-misses were useful in averting major accidents. The Employers' members opposed this amendment and argued that near-misses were difficult to define and that since they were useful as internal reports, the requirement to make them public would discourage employers from such reporting. The Government members of member States of the EC proposed a subamendment to the amendment suggesting to insert the words "and to make available to the competent authority the lessons learnt from near-misses previously discussed with workers and their representatives". The Employers' members insisted that introducing near-misses in a Convention would result in an unratifiable, controversial and extremely difficult instrument to apply. The Workers agreed with the subamendment and the amendment, as subamended was adopted with 66,033 votes in favour, 46,023 votes against with 4,002 abstentions.

78. An amendment by the Workers' members to introduce a new paragraph to Point 19 sought to introduce a definition of the term "near-miss". The Employers' members and some Government members disagreed with the proposal for reasons stated earlier. After discussion the amendment was adopted by 60,697 votes in favour, 51,354 votes against with 2,668 abstentions and referred it to the Committee Drafting Committee.

79. Point 19, as amended, was adopted.

80. Two amendments which sought to introduce the requirement to report near-misses were withdrawn by the Government member of Poland and the Workers' members in view of the adoption of a similar amendment in Point 19, the proper placement of which was to be decided by the Committee Drafting Committee. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to replace the words "as soon as practicable", by the words, "within an agreed timeframe" was subamended to replace the words "an agreed" by "a fixed" and adopted. An amendment by the Workers' members to introduce a detail to the scope of the provisions in Point 20 was withdrawn. Based on amendments introduced in previous Points, the Government members of member States of the EC withdrew an amendment which sought to insert the word "written" after the word "detailed".

81. A new paragraph reading "The report should include recommendations detailing steps to be taken to prevent a recurrence" introduced by the Workers' members was adopted and referred to the Committee Drafting Committee.

82. Point 20, as amended, was adopted.

SITING OF MAJOR HAZARD INSTALLATIONS

83. The Employers' members proposed an amendment to replace Point 21 by a new Point which addressed the separation distances between new installations and populated areas, the likelihood and consequences of a major accident, and the safeguarding of existing installations from encroachment by public dwellings. This amendment was opposed by the Workers and several Government members who maintained that the proposed text was too detailed for a Convention and preferred the Office text. Subsequently, the amendment was withdrawn. Also withdrawn were three amendments by the Workers' members which sought to insert the words "and regulations" after the word "policy", to delete the words "where appropriate" and to change the subtitle of this Point to "siting and land-use planning"; and one amendment by the Government member of Cyprus which sought to replace the word "establish" by the words "ensure the establishment of".

84. The Government members of member States of the EC proposed an amendment which sought to change the text of Point 21 to read: "The competent authority should establish a comprehensive siting policy forming a part of national policy referred to in Point 9". This was subamended by the Workers' members who proposed to replace the words "forming a part of national policy referred to in Point 9" by a provision on separation distances between new and existing installations and the working and residential areas. The Employers' members disagreed with the subamendment on the grounds that it was not practical to apply separation distances to existing plants. Following discussion, the subamendment was adopted by 63,756 votes in favour, 45,080 votes against with 6,440 abstentions. The amendment was also adopted as subamended by 68,908 votes in favour, 43,792 votes against with 3,220 abstentions. Based on the outcome of this vote, the Workers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to insert the words "existing or proposed" before the word "major".

85. Point 21, as amended, was adopted.

INSPECTION

Point 22

86. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to replace Point 22 in which they detailed the requirement for training of qualified inspectors by the competent authority. The idea of training was the subject of another amendment submitted by the Government member of Cyprus which sought to coordinate such training through the ILO. The Government members of New Zealand and the United States proposed an amendment to replace the words "provide specific training for inspectors" by the words "have suitably qualified people". After discussion during which there were varied opinions on those amendments, the meeting decided to delegate the Working Party to deal with three amendments using the Office text as a basis. The proposed text which was adopted read:

> The competent authority should have properly qualified and trained staff with the appropriate skills, and sufficient technical and professional support, to inspect, assess, investigate and advise on matters detailed in this Convention and ensure compliance with national law.

87. Point 22, as amended, was adopted.

IV. RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF WORKERS

RIGHTS OF WORKERS

Point 23

88. An amendment by the Workers' members to introduce the idea of the workers' right to participate in cooperative mechanisms was opposed by the Employers' members and by the Government member of New Zealand on the grounds that the meaning of the term participation challenged the employers' overall responsibility in running the installation. The Government member of Switzerland stated that his country would not be in a position to comply with a provision that included the principle of co-decision involving workers and employers in matters of safety. The Government members of member States of the EC presented a subamendment that sought to provide for consultation and participation according to national law and practice. Accordingly, the Workers' members subamended the amendment by replacing the concept of "participation" by "consultation through cooperative mechanisms" and the amendment as subamended was adopted. The Workers' members proposed another amendment to insert the words "and risks" after the words "hazards" in clause (a) which was subamended by the Employers' members by replacing the word "risk" by the words "likely consequences", and adopted.

89. An amendment by the Employers' members introduced to clause (b) to replace the words "have the right to participate" by the words "be consulted, depending on their knowledge, skills and experience" was withdrawn in favour of an amendment submitted by the Government members of Canada, New Zealand and the United States which sought to replace the words "have the right to participate" by the words "have access to, and be consulted"; was adopted. The Workers' members' amendment to insert the word "regularly" before the word "instructed" was adopted.

90. A subamendment by the Workers' members to combine two of their proposed amendments introduced as new clauses concerning the workers' right to interrupt activities which they judged as hazardous, was adopted. The Workers' members' amendment to introduce a new clause to provide for the workers' protection from retribution for action taken by them in the interest of safety was also adopted. An amendment proposed by the Government member of Poland to introduce a new clause dealing with the provision of appropriate protective equipment was withdrawn.

91. Point 23, as amended, was adopted.

DUTIES OF WORKERS

Point 24

92. An amendment submitted by the Employers' members that sought to insert the words "and control" after the word "prevention" was adopted and referred to the Committee Drafting Committee. An amendment proposed by the Workers' members to add the words "and representatives" at the end of subtitle IV was adopted and referred to the Committee Drafting Committee.

93. Point 24, as amended, was adopted.

New Point after Point 24

94. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to add a new Point concerning a system of data collection on major accidents as well as an amendment to propose a new subtitle on international considerations. The Workers' members submitted an amendment which sought to introduce a new Point on the liability for the consequences of a major accident. Though Workers' members believed that it was essential to include this Point in the Convention, they withdrew the amendment in view of the agreed formulation of the Point 9 (1) concerning national policy. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new Point concerning the responsibility of exporting member States to communicate to the importing country, when all or some uses of hazardous chemicals, technology or processes were prohibited for reasons of safety in the exporting country. Several Government members and Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that it was difficult to define the technology and to control its flow. The Government member of the United Kingdom stated that the inclusion of such wording could render the instrument unratifiable by his Government. The Government member of New Zealand pointed out that the competent authority should be informed of the export of such technology and process in order to implement such provision. The amendment was adopted with 79,304 votes in favour, 7,084 votes against with 25,668 votes abstentions.

95. The Workers' members reiterated the importance of the liability issues based on the polluter-pays principle, covering the consequences of major accidents on the environment and the public; the inclusion of transport under the provisions of major hazard control systems and the protection of workers against biological hazards. They considered that these issues ought to be re-examined at the second year discussion of the 1993 International Labour Conference, with the understanding that biological hazards could be dealt with under different instruments.

96. The new Point, as amended, was adopted.

Titles of Sections

97. Several amendments that proposed to change the titles of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Convention were referred to the Committee Drafting Committee.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation

Point 25

98. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "should be applied in conjunction with those" by the words "are intended to provide additional guidance in support" to emphasise that the Recommendation only provided additional guidance to the Convention. In the face of opposition by the majority on the ground that the Office text was consistent with language in other Conventions, the amendment was withdrawn.

99. Point 25 was adopted without amendment.

Point 26

100. The Government members of member States of the EC introduced an amendment that sought to replace Point 26 by another text that ensured the involvement of all relevant international organisations in information exchange. As the amendment did not specify the ILO in particular, the Employers' and Workers' members as well as several other Government member opposed it. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, New Zealand, Norway and the United States submitted an amendment which sought to introduce the concept of cooperation between ILO and other international organisations and to provide for the exchange of information on major accidents and near-misses. While cooperation between the ILO and other organisations was supported by the Employers', Workers' and several Government members, the views regarding the reporting of near-misses were the cause of concern to the Employers' and some Government members. It was argued that such practice compromised the confidentiality of trade secrets, caused an unwarranted burden and consequently discouraged employers from in-plant reporting on near misses. The Workers' members argued that if the reports on near misses existed there was no reason not to make them available. Two amendments were submitted by the Workers' members that sought to require member States to report on major accidents without exception. After discussion, the Chairman called on the Working Party to examine the amendments introduced to Point 26. No agreement could be reached by the Working Party on an acceptable text.

101. Based on the results of the Working Party, the Government member of the United States subamended his amendment by the following text:

> The Recommendation should provide that the ILO, in cooperation with other relevant international and intergovernmental agencies, should arrange for an international exchange of information on:
> (1) Major accidents.
>
> (2) Lessons learnt from near-misses.
>
> (3) Good safety practices in major hazard installations including safety management and process safety.
> Member States should be encouraged to communicate on the items in (1), (2) and (3) above to the ILO.

The Government member of Finland proposed a subamendment to the text which introduced a fourth item that read: "(4) Technologies and processes that are prohibited for reasons of safety and health" noting the need to make due reference to it at the end of the text. Another subamendment submitted by the Employers' members to delete the words "near-misses" in paragraph (2) by the words "operating experiences" was withdrawn as it was opposed by the majority. The amendment as subamended by the Government member of Finland was adopted by 64,400 votes in favour, 38,870 votes against with 1,288 abstentions.

102. Point 26, as amended, was adopted.

103. The Employers' members submitted an amendment which sought to delete Point 27 since the Code of Practice was formulated for use as practical guidance and not as a national policy instrument. They maintained that since codes of practice were formulated in a manner different from that of a Recommendation and had totally different legal status, their adoption in the form of this instrument denied the tripartite partners from the extensive discussions accorded to a Recommendation. They further stressed that any reference to a reviewed or an updated Code whose text was not known was not only impractical but also created a precedent which could inhibit future development of these publications as employers and other parties would refrain from participating in the preparation of future codes. The Employers' members urged that the implications should be more carefully re-examined and the issue should be raised at next year's Conference; otherwise the instrument would be difficult to implement. The Workers' members opposed this amendment and stressed that ILO codes of practice were adopted by meetings of experts convened on a tripartite basis and had to be approved by the ILO Governing Body before their publication. Faced with more opposition from Government members, the Employers' members withdrew their amendment.

104. The Government members of member States of the EC proposed and amendment to drop the reference to the guidance offered by the ILO Code of Practice to national laws and regulations. The Government member of the United States proposed an amendment to replace Point 27 by an outline summary of the contents of the Code of Practice. Two amendments were submitted by the Government members of Australia, Canada, Norway, Sweden, and the United States and the Workers' members which sought to ensure the revision and updating of the Code of Practice. The Government members of Australia and Canada submitted an amendment to insert the words "or other measures" after the words "laws and regulations". The Workers' members also proposed the deletion of the words "as far as possible" from the third line of Point 27. After discussion, the Chairman called on the Working Party to examine the amendments introduced to Point 27. Following its presentation, the text of the Working Party was not accepted. The Employers' members reiterated their position as recorded in paragraph 103.

105. Based on the draft text of the Working Party as the result of a discussion, the Government member of the United States subamended his amendment to read as follows:

> The Recommendation should provide that the national policy provided for in the Convention and the national laws, regulations or other measures to implement it should, as appropriate, be guided by the ILO Code of Practice "Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents", published in 1991 or as reviewed, revised and updated in accordance with ILO practice.

This was adopted by 61,180 votes in favour, 38,870 votes against with 4,508 abstentions after the two subamendments by the Government members of Hungary and the United Kingdom were withdrawn.

106. Point 27, as amended, was adopted.

New Point (after Point 27)

107. An amendment by the Government member of the United States to add a new Point after Point 27 relating to safety reports was withdrawn. The amendment by the Workers' members to introduce a new Point on the tripartite declaration of principles concerning multinational enterprises, which was originally proposed to a Point in the Convention was transferred to the Recommendation, was adopted by consensus.

108. The New Point was adopted.

Adoption of the Report, Proposed Conclusions and a Resolution

109. At its seventeenth sitting, the Committee adopted its report, subject to some changes requested by some of its members.

110. At the same sitting, the Committee adopted the proposed Conclusionsn as presented at the end of the Report with one modification: a reference to Point 19 in Point 11.

111. The Committee Drafting Committee had proposed two alternative definitions to the term "near-miss". The Reporter stated that the Committee was free to choose one of the two. The Committee adopted the text that referred to "any unplanned, sudden event involving one or more hazardous substances" which could have caused "serious injury to workers or the public, or serious damage to the plant equipment or the environment".

112. The Committee unanimously adopted a resolution to place on the agenda of the next Ordinary Session of the Conference an item entitled "Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents". The Committee noted that the Conclusions adopted with a view to a Convention and a Recommendation dealt with the prevention of major industrial accidents and considered that it was appropriate to amend the title accordingly.

113. The Employers' Vice-chairman expressed the appreciation of his group for the work of the Committee and its Drafting Committee and the results achieved under the able chairmanship and the cooperation exhibited by all members of the Committee.

114. The Workers' Vice-chairman was equally appreciative of the cooperation of the Committee and complemented its Chairman, members and Drafting Committee on the work done noting that the results have gone a long way in better protection against industrial disasters.

115. The Chairman thanked the three groups for their contributions. He called on the delegates to pursue their work during the course of the coming year on the basis of the report which would be communicated to the Governments, and in preparation for next years discussion during the Conference.

116. The report of the Committee, the Proposed Conclusions and the Resolution to place on the agenda of the next Ordinary Session of the Conference an item entitled "Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents" are submitted for consideration.

Geneva, 18 June 1992.

Proposed conclusions

FORM OF THE INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS

1. The International Labour Conference should adopt two international instruments concerning the prevention of industrial disasters through a system of major hazard control also called process safety management.

2. The instruments should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

CONCLUSIONS PROPOSED WITH A VIEW TO A CONVENTION

PREAMBLE

3. The instrument should contain a Preamble referring to relevant ILO instruments, including the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981, and the Chemicals Convention and Recommendation, 1990, as well as to the ILO Code of Practice, Prevention of major industrial accidents, published in 1991, in order to point out the need for a global and coherent approach.

4. The Preamble should provide that the instrument should have regard to the need to ensure that all appropriate measures are taken to –

- prevent major accidents;
- minimise the risks of major accidents;
- minimise the effects of such major accidents.

In doing so, proper consideration should be given to the causes of such accidents including organisational errors, human factors, component failures, deviations from normal operational conditions, outside interference and natural forces.

5. The Preamble should provide that the instrument should have regard to the need for cooperation within the International Programme on Chemical Safety between the International Labour Organisation, the United Nations Environment Programme and the World Health Organization, as well as with other relevant intergovernmental organisations.

I. Definitions and scope

6. For the purpose of the Convention –

(a) the term "hazardous substance" should mean a substance or mixture which by virtue of chemical, physical or toxicological properties, either singly or in combination, constitutes a hazard;

(b) the term "major accident" should mean an unexpected, sudden occurrence – such as a major emission, fire or explosion – in the course of an activity within a major hazard installation, involving one or more hazardous substances and leading to a serious danger to workers, the public or the environment, whether immediate or delayed;

(c) the term "major hazard installation" should mean one which processes, produces, disposes, handles, uses or stores either permanently or temporarily, one or more hazardous substances or categories of substances in quantities which exceed the threshold quantity;

(d) the term "threshold quantity" should mean that quantity, prescribed in national laws or regulations, of a hazardous substance or categories of substances which if exceeded identifies a major hazard installation;

(e) the term "safety report" should mean a written presentation of the technical, management and operational information covering the hazards of a major hazard installation and their control and providing justification for the measures taken for the safety of the installation;

(f) the term "near-miss" should mean any unplanned, sudden event involving one or more hazardous substances, which but for the mitigation effects of safety systems or procedures, could have caused serious injury to workers or the public, or serious damage to plant equipment or the environment, or could have involved a loss of containment possibly giving rise to significant adverse effects.

7. The Convention should provide that:

(a) the following installations and branches of economic activity be excluded from its application:
  (i) nuclear installations and plants processing radioactive substances except for facilities handling non-radioactive substances at these installations;
  (ii) military installations;
  (iii) transport outside the site of an installation other than by pipeline;

(b) a Member may, after consulting the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned and other interested parties who may be affected, exclude from the application of the Convention such installations or branches of economic activity for which an equivalent protection is provided.

8. Where special problems of a substantial nature arise so that it is not immediately possible to implement all the preventive and protective measures provided for in the Convention, a Member should draw up plans, in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers, for the progressive implementation of the measures concerned within a fixed time-frame.

II. General principles

9. (1) In the light of national laws and regulations, conditions and practices, and in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers and with other interested parties who may be affected, each Member should formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy concerning the protection of workers against the risk of major accidents, taking account of their effects on the public and the environment.

(2) This policy should be implemented through preventive and protective measures for major hazard installations and, where practicable, should promote the use of the best available safety technologies.

10. (1) To enable the identification of major hazard installations for the purposes of point 6 (c), the competent authority, or a body approved or recognised by the competent authority, should, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, draw up a system for their identification, based on categories of hazardous substances, a list of hazardous substances or both, together with their threshold quantities, in accordance with national laws or regulations or international standards.

(2) The system mentioned in point 10 (1) should be regularly reviewed and updated.

11. The competent authority, after consulting the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, should make special provision to protect confidential information transmitted or made available to it in accordance with points 14, 16, 18 or 19, whose disclosure to a competitor would be liable to cause harm to an employer's business, so long as this provision does not lead to serious risk to the workers, the public or the environment.

III. RESPONSIBILITIES OF EMPLOYERS

IDENTIFICATION

12. Employers should be required to identify any major hazard installation within their control on the basis of the system referred to in Point 10.

ARRANGEMENTS AT THE LEVEL OF THE INSTALLATION

13. In respect of each major hazard installation employers should be required to establish and maintain a documented system of major hazard control which includes provision for –

(a) the identification and analysis of hazards and the assessment of risks including consideration of possible interactions between substances;

(b) technical measures, including design, construction, choice of chemicals, operation, maintenance and systematic inspection of the installation;

(c) organisational measures, including training and instruction of personnel, the provision of equipment in order to ensure their safety, staffing levels, hours of work, definition of responsibilities, and controls on outside contractors and temporary workers;

(d) emergency plans and procedures, including –

  (i) the preparation of effective site emergency plans and procedures to be applied in case of major accidents or threat thereof, with periodic testing and evaluation of the effectiveness of such site emergency plans and procedures and revision as necessary;

  (ii) the provision of information on potential accidents and site emergency plans to authorities and bodies responsible for the preparation of emergency plans and procedures for the protection of the public and the environment outside the site of the installation;

  (iii) any necessary consultation with such authorities and bodies;

(e) measures to limit the consequences of a major accident;

(f) consultation with workers and their representatives.

NOTIFICATION

14. Employers should be required to notify the competent authority of any major hazard installation which they have identified before it is put into operation or, for existing installations, within a fixed time-frame.

SAFETY REPORT

15. (1) Employers should be required to prepare a safety report based on the requirements of Point 13.

(2) The report should be prepared –

(a) in the case of existing major hazard installations, within such a period after notification as is prescribed by national laws or regulations;

(b) in the case of any new major hazard installation, before it is put into operation.

16. Employers should be required to transmit or make available to the competent authority the safety report referred to in Point 15.

17. Employers should be required to review, to update and to amend a safety report –

(a) in the event of a modification which has a significant influence on the level of safety in the installation or its processes or in the quantities of hazardous substances present;

(b) when developments in technical knowledge or the assessment of hazards make this appropriate;

(c) at such intervals as are prescribed by national laws or regulations;

(d) at the request of the competent authority.

ACCIDENT REPORTING

18. Employers should be required to inform the competent authority and other bodies designated for this purpose as soon as a major accident occurs and to make available to the competent authority the lessons learnt from near-misses, previously discussed with workers and their representatives.

19. (1) Employers should be required within a fixed time-frame after a major accident to present a detailed report to the competent authority containing an analysis of the causes of that accident and describing any steps taken to mitigate the effects of the accident.

(2) The report should include recommendations detailing steps to be taken to prevent a recurrence.

IV. RESPONSIBILITIES OF COMPETENT AUTHORITIES

OFF-SITE EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

20. Taking into account the information provided by the employer, the competent authority should ensure that emergency plans and procedures containing provisions for the protection of the public and the environment outside the site of each major hazard installation are produced, updated at appropriate intervals and coordinated with relevant authorities and bodies.

21. The competent authority should ensure that –

(a) (i) information on safety measures and the correct behaviour to adopt in the case of a major accident is disseminated to members of the public liable to be affected by a major accident without their having to request it;

  (ii) such information is updated and re-disseminated at appropriate intervals;

(b) in the case of a major accident, warning is given as soon as possible;

(c) where a major accident could have transboundary effects, there is cooperation and coordination among the States affected.

SITING OF MAJOR HAZARD INSTALLATIONS

22. The competent authority should establish a comprehensive siting policy arranging for the appropriate separation of existing or proposed major hazard installations from working and residential areas and public facilities. Such a policy should reflect the General Principles set out in Part II of the Convention.

INSPECTION

23. The competent authority should have properly qualified and trained staff with the appropriate skills, and sufficient technical and professional support, to inspect, assess, investigate and advise on the matters dealt with in this Convention and ensure compliance with national laws and regulations.

V. RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF WORKERS AND THEIR REPRESENTATIVES

24. The workers and their representatives at a major hazard installation should be consulted through cooperative mechanisms in order to ensure a safe system of work. In particular, the workers and their representatives should –

(a) be adequately and suitably informed of the hazards associated with the major hazard installation and their likely consequences;

(b) have access to, and be consulted in the preparation of –

  (i) the safety report;

  (ii) emergency plans and procedures;

  (iii) accident reports;

(c) be regularly instructed and trained in the practices and control procedures for major accident prevention and in the emergency procedures to be followed in the event of a major accident;

(d) within the scope of their job, take corrective action and if necessary interrupt the activity where they have reasonable justification to believe, based on their training and experience, that there is an imminent danger of a major accident, and notify their supervisor or raise the alarm, as appropriate, before or as soon as possible after taking such action;

(e) not be placed at any disadvantage because of the actions referred to in (d) above.

25. Workers employed at the site of a major hazard installation should be required to –

(a) comply with all procedures and practices relating to the prevention and control of major accidents within the major hazard installation;

(b) comply with all emergency procedures should a major accident occur.

VI. RESPONSIBILITY OF EXPORTING STATES

26. When, in an exporting member State, all or some uses of hazardous substances, technologies or processes are prohibited for reasons of safety, this fact and the reasons for it should be communicated by the exporting member State to any importing country.

CONCLUSIONS PROPOSED WITH A VIEW TO A RECOMMENDATION

27. The provisions of the proposed Recommendation should be applied in conjunction with those of the proposed Convention.

28. (1) The Recommendation should provide that the International Labour Organisation, in cooperation with other relevant international intergovernmental and non-governmental organisations, should arrange for an international exchange of information on –

(a) major accidents;

(b) lessons learnt from near-misses;

(c) good safety practices in major hazard installations including safety management and process safety;

(d) technologies and processes that are prohibited for reasons of safety and health.

(2) Members should be encouraged to communicate information on the matters listed in point 28 (1) above to the International Labour Office.

29. The Recommendation should provide that the national policy provided for in the Convention and the national laws and regulations or other measures to implement it should, as appropriate, be guided by the ILO Code of Practice on the Prevention of major industrial accidents, published in 1991 or as reviewed, revised and updated in accordance with ILO practice.

30. In accordance with the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, adopted by the Governing Body of the ILO, a national or multinational enterprise with more than one establishment should provide safety measures relating to the prevention and control of major accidents, without discrimination, to the workers in all its establishments, regardless of the place or country in which they are situated.

Fourth item on the agenda: Protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer

Report of the Committee on workers' claims

1. The Committee on Worker's Claims was set up by the International Labour Conference at its second sitting on 3 June 1992. The Committee was originally composed of 170 members (66 Government members, 48 Employers' members and 56 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member was allotted 336 votes, each Employer member 455 votes and each Worker member 390 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified 12 times during the session, and the number of votes allotted to each member was adjusted accordingly.[1]

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson: Ms. Cabrera Armas (Government member, Venezuela).

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. Varela Traverso (Employers' member, Uruguay); Mr. Lynch (Workers' member, United States).

Reporter: Ms. Moynihan (Government member, Canada).

3. At its ninth sitting, the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mr. Erlenborn (Government member, United States), Mr. Burge (Employers' member, United States), Mr. Audette (Workers' member, Canada) and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee had before it Reports IV(1), IV (2A) and IV(2B) prepared by the Office in accordance with article 39 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, on the fourth item on the agenda of the Conference: "Protection of worker' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer (second discussion)." The draft Convention and Recommendation set out in Report IV(2B) formed the basis of the second discussion.

5. The Committee held 12 sittings.

General discussion

6. The Chairperson stressed that the adoption by the Conference of international standards on the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer was a matter of crucial importance for a great number of workers throughout the world, particularly in light of the economic difficulties being experienced by many countries, which often led to the bankruptcy of enterprises and the loss of their workers' rights. She recalled the preparatory work done prior to this session of the Conference, both by the Office, and by the Conference itself during the first discussion in 1991. She expressed the hope that by the end of the second discussion, the Committee would be able to draft texts capable of responding to the need to give workers adequate protection in the event of the insolvency of their employer.

7. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that last year the Conference dealt with this issue and chose to place it on the agenda of its 79th Session for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation. The Office had prepared a report, containing a proposed Convention and a proposed Recommendation. Member States had been sent a copy of the report and invited to suggest amendments or make any relevant remarks, or to inform the Office that the proposed texts constituted a satisfactory basis for a second discussion. Fifty-seven governments had responded to the Office's invitation; the majority of governments had indicated that their replies had been formulated in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organisations. The Office had also received several replies directly from workers' and employers' organisations. According to a significant majority of governments, the proposed texts provided a satisfactory basis for a second discussion.

(b) 5 June: 178 members (67 Government members with 2,990 votes each, 46 Employers' members with 4,355 votes each, 65 Workers' members with 3,082 votes each);

8. A member of the Secretariat introduced Reports IV(1), IV(2A) and IV(2B), explaining the different steps the Office had taken to prepare them. The Office had received many proposals for amendments to the texts set out in Report IV(1). After examining these proposals and commenting on them in Report IV(2A), the Office had submitted texts to the Conference, with a view to a second discussion, which (apart from a few editorial changes) are essentially the texts that were adopted by the Conference in 1991. The Office considered that it was the Conference rather than the Office that should amend the texts adopted during the previous discussion. Nevertheless, the Office thought it was its duty to bring the previous discussion. Nevertheless, the Office thought it was its duty to bring to the attention of the member States and the Conference, in both Report IV(1) and Report IV(2A), certain problems of interpretation arising from several texts adopted in 1991 (often as a result of amendments and subamendments).

9. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that the Employers' members opposed the adoption of a Convention. He stated that, since there were no new major topics, the Organisation had instead focused on the adoption of standards on narrow issues (such as night work, bankruptcy or industrial disasters). Such subjects did not lend themselves to the adoption of Conventions, but rather could be dealt with more effectively by more flexible standards, such as those set out in a Recommendation or resolution. Conventions, as binding international instruments, could not be adapted easily to present conditions. For this reason it was becoming increasingly more difficult to comply with Conventions; evidence of this was the disappointing rate at which Conventions adopted over the last few years had been ratified. The Employers' members appealed to the Conference to refrain from adopting a Convention that would seldom be followed and rather to devote itself to preparing a Recommendation which would have a greater likelihood of being accepted.

10. In addition, the Employers objected to a Convention granting too elevated a privilege to workers' claims. Such a privilege could discourage the financing of enterprises, and consequently act as an obstacle to investment and employment creation. The setting up of a guarantee institution, although an intelligent solution to certain problems, should be regulated by national laws and regulations, given the different economic and social systems. Guarantee institutions should be set up only after a national debate, during which the conditions in each country would be taken into account. The Employers' members were of the opinion that the promotion of such a solution should fall within the competence of a Recommendation alone. They also had numerous reservations regarding the concept that guarantee institutions were a manifestation of employer solidarity. Employers should assume their own individual responsibilities; thus the law should not provide that all employers are jointly responsible for the poor management of certain employers. The employers would, however, agree to the establishment of a guarantee fund set up at the initiative of individual employers or as a result of collective bargaining. Since many bankruptcies result from economic policies adopted by state authorities, an equitable solution, and one which the employers would support, would be the creation of a guarantee fund financed exclusively by public funds.

11. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that last year the Conference had voted in favour of the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. This Convention would be one of the first standards that the ILO would adopt since the collapse of communism in Central and Eastern Europe. It would deal with a question that is a normal feature of a market economy – bankruptcy. In a market economy, businesses are rewarded for taking risks, but in many cases the cost of these risks are carried by the workers while the interests of the employers are protected. The interests of creditors who have secured assets are also better protected than those of workers. The social effects of insolvency are becoming increasingly disconcerting. There were numerous causes for the increase in bankruptcies, such as structural adjustment, new forms of business organisation and structures, and deregulation that had been introduced by a number of governments.

12. The original texts proposed two ways in which governments could help workers affected by insolvencies: first, workers' claims should have priority over the claims of the State or the social security system; second, guarantee institutions should be established. It was, therefore, important that the original proposals for the wording of what had become Article 8 be restored. At the very least, in systems in which workers' claims were protected by a privilege, this privilege should come before that of the State and the social security system.

13. The Government member of the United States that we should work towards the adoption of a Convention that reflects the law and practice of most member States. This Convention should be sufficiently flexible to gain tripartite acceptance and permit ratification by many countries. The Government member of the United States would seek to ensure that the final text reflected the national law and practice of the United States, and did not conflict with the laws of the States.

Consideration of the proposed texts contained in Report IV (2B)

A. Draft Convention concerning the Protection of Workers; claims in the event of the insolvency of their Employer

Preamble

14. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "Convention" by the word "Recommendation". They recalled that during the first discussion in 1991 they had already stated that they favoured the adoption of a Recommendation rather than a Convention. In their opinion, a suitable standard concerning the protection of workers' claims already existed in Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95); therefore, they did not see the need to adopt a new Convention providing a privilege to workers' claims. They wanted to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that guarantee institutions, as dealt with in Part III of the draft Convention, existed in only a handful of industrialised countries. It was, therefore, inappropriate to propose a general Convention applicable to all member States irrespective of the prevailing social and economic conditions in those countries. They were therefore of the view that this subject could be dealt with more effectively in a Recommendation than in a Convention.

15. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, asserted that she could not support the amendment. She believed there was a need to progress a step beyond the existing standards, which no longer sufficed. Therefore she was in favour of the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation. The Government member of Cyprus was of the same opinion. The Government member of Uruguay noted the importance of the principle of the protection of wages, stating that it was comparable to the other principles for the protection of human rights. Consequently, the protection of wages should be enshrined in an international instrument having the force of a Convention. The Workers' members recalled that Article 11 of Convention No. 95 had been adopted over 40 years ago. It was outdated, no longer responded to present needs, and therefore required improvement. They were in favour of a Convention and a Recommendation.

16. The Employers' members noted that all those who had participated in the discussion favoured the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. To expedite the work of the Committee and facilitate further discussions, they withdraw their amendment.

17. The Committee then considered a second amendment to the Preamble, also submitted by the Employers' members, to add the words "and economic" after the word "social" in the fourth paragraph. They recalled that the bankruptcy of an enterprise has economic as well as social consequences since it often generates difficulties for other enterprises. They thought that their amendment enriched the philosophy underlying the instrument. As the Workers' members were also concerned about the economic repercussions of insolvency, they supported the amendment. The Government members of Botswana, China, Cyprus and the United States, as well as the Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, also supported the amendment, which was adopted by consensus.

18. The Preamble was adopted as amended.

PART I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 1

Paragraph 1

19. The Committee had before it five similar amendments to replace the words "enterprise's assets" by "employer's assets". They were submitted respectively by the Government members of Austria, the Government members of Finland, Norway and Sweden jointly, the Government members of Australia and Canada jointly, the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxemburg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, and by Workers' members. In introducing the amendment, the Government member of Austria stated that, like many other governments, the Austrian Government wanted the Convention to apply to all persons and legal entities acting as employers. Categories such as domestic workers or other employees who do not necessarily work for "enterprises" in the strict sense of the word, and who could be excluded if the Convention was aimed at "enterprises" and not "employers", would thus be protected. The other Government members who had submitted similar amendments shared this view. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, pointed out that the expression "employer's assets" was broader than the expression "enterprise's assets" because it encompassed all employers. She observed that if difficulties arose in applying this definition as extended to all employers, member States could avail themseves of the option to limit the scope of the Convention pursuant to Article 4. The Government member of China remarked that to replace the word "enterprise" by the word "employer" in this paragraph would have the effect of making the text more consistent with the title of the Convention. The Government member of Uruguay added that the term "employer" was legally more precise than the term "enterprise", since not all "employers" are "enterprises" and since the term "enterprise" could be subject to a variety of legal difinitions. According to certain legal doctrines, the term "enterprise" covers not only the employer but also the employees.

20. The Government member of Poland opposed the amendments. He declared that they were contrary to his country's law regulating companies. If domestic workers were to be protected under a Convention, a separate instrument would have to be envisaged. The Government member of the United States also expressed his opposition to the amendments. He said that the term "enterprise" was less likely to give rise to confusion than the term "employer".

21. The Employers' members were also opposed to the amendments. They remarked that all the amendments had been submitted by highly industrialised countries. In the developing countries there were a great many small businesses and individual employers whose personal property could be compromised if they were within the scope of the Convention. Their intention was not to discriminate against any category of worker, but rather to protect the personal property of small-scale employers and to defend small businesses as a source of job creation. This could only be achieved if their liability was limited. The Employers' members had submitted an amendment to paragraph 2 to replace "employer" by "enterprise", as well as another amendment to add a new paragraph to Article 1 to permit national laws and practice to limit the extent of liability to which enterprise's assets may be subject. However, they were willing to withdraw these two amendments and to support the amendment under discussion if the Committee were accept the following subamendment: "Employers's assets shall be defined and limited by national laws and practice concerning bankruptcy".

22. The Government member of Canada stated that she could not accept the subamendment submitted by the Employers' members. It was her view that national laws and practice, which according to Article 2 should give effect to the Convention, could address the concerns expressed by the Employers' members. The Government of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, was also against this subamendment. She did, however, acknowledge the concerns of the Employers' members, but thought it would be more appropriate for the Committee to discuss those concerns when considering the amendment submitted by the Employers' members to add a new paragraph to this Article. The Government member of Cyprus suggested that rather than adopting the subamendment, the Committee should indicate in its report that it was not the intention of the Convention to cover employers' personal assets.

23. The Workers' members appealed to the Committee to reject the subamendment submitted by the Employers' member. The Employers regretted that their subamendment had created so much confusion and endeavoured to expedite the work of the Committee by withdrawing the subamendment in favour of their amendment to add a new paragraph to Article 1, which was to be discussed in due course.

24. The Chairperson called for a vote on the amendments. They were adopted by 277,058 votes in favour, 2,990 votes against, with 218,270 abstentions.

25. Paragraph 1 was adopted as amended.

Paragraph 2

26. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to replace the words "employer's assets" by "enterprise's assets".

27. Paragraph 2 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 3

28. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, submitted an amendment to delete this paragraph. She noted that the Convention should be concerned with establishing general rules, but that this paragraph was aimed at a specific situation facing a group of countries, i.e. the Eastern European countries, which had decided to pursue privatisation, often involving the closing of many state enterprises. The situation aimed at in this paragraph was already covered in paragraph 2, which permitted member States to extend the definition of insolvency to cover various situations in which workers' claims could not be paid owing to the employer's financial situation. Paragraph 3, however, could be placed in the Recommendation. She intended to submit, at the appropriate time, an amendment to add paragraph 3 to the Recommendation.

29. The Government member of the United Kingdom recalled that in its reply to the proposed texts in Report IV(1) his Government had expressed doubts about paragraph 3. In his opinion, the situation at which the paragraph was aimed should hopefully be short-lived. It was therefore inappropriate that it be addressed in a Convention that was intended to be enduring. For this reason, his Government was in favour of deleting the paragraph.

30. The Government member of the United States stated that he could not support the amendment because paragraph 3 could be of benefit to many workers, in particular those in the Eastern European countries, where numerous state enterprises had been closed or were going to be closed for economic reasons.

31. The Government member of Uruguay supported the amendment. Paragraph 3 was meaningless, since a State could not be declared insolvent. If a State decided to close one of its enterprises for economic reasons, it should pay all of the workers' claims that remained due. Yet he noted that the Convention permitted limits to be placed on protected claims. Consequently, this Convention might encourage States that close public enterprises to pay only a portion of the workers' claims that were due rather than the full amount.

32. The Workers' members recalled that this paragraph had been added last year as a result of an amendment that they had supported. Nevertheless, after reflection, it was evident that this paragraph could be wrongly interpreted as suggesting that employees of state enterprises could be excluded from the protection of this Convention. If state enterprises were autonomous and subject to liquidation, the protection of this Convention must apply to their workers. This was consistent with the ILO understanding that state enterprises were enterprises. Of course, if a state enterprise were not autonomous, the protection of the Convention would not be necessary, as the State could not become insolvent. Therefore under no circumstances could employees of state enterprises have less protection that afforded by this Convention, and they could have more. The Workers' members requested that this be clearly reflected in the Committee's report.

33. The Employers' members stated that they would abstain in the vote on this amendment.

34. The Chairperson put the amendment to a vote. The amendment was adopted by 249,780 votes in favour, 8,970 votes against, with 212,290 abstentions.

35. Paragraph 3 was deleted.

New paragraph

36. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph: "4. The scope of the liability of the enterprise's assets is to be determined by existing national laws, regulations and practice covering bankruptcy." They recalled their comments with respect to the discussion of paragraph 1. They insisted on the need to establish a distinction between the enterprise's assets and the personal property of employers in order to protect personal property against proceedings following insolvency.

37. The Workers' members recalled that this question had already been addressed in the Reports prepared by the Office for the first discussion in 1991. In its Report V(2), the Office had proposed a conclusion (point 36) that read: "The totality of the assets, movable and immovable, of the insolvent employer should be available to satisfy workers' privileged claims. Nevertheless, if the employer is an individual, national laws or regulations may declare certain of his personal effects unattachable." However, that proposal had been amended during the first discussion because the Committee had thought that the goal of the proposal was to provide a super-privilege for workers' claims. The Workers' members had not supported the amendment because the view that the proposal provided a super-privilege was erroneous. They also drew attention to Office Report IV(2A) (p. 27), which pointed out that the use of the word "enterprise" or "employer" in the Convention would not remedy the problem raised by the Employers' members. The response to their concerns would lie in each State's laws and regulations governing the types of property at risk, and the extent of owners' liability for the debts of their enterprises. The Workers' members viewed the amendment as superfluous. In its place, they suggested reconsidering the insertion of point 36 of the Proposed Conclusions set out in Report V (2) of 1991.

38. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, declared that she was sympathetic to the proposed amendment, but that she would like to subamend it by deleting the word "existing", replacing "enterprise" by "employer", and replacing "bankruptcy" by "insolvency". The Employers' members accepted this subamendment.

39. The Workers' members asked the Employers' members to explain what they meant by the words "the scope of liability". The Employers' members specified that this meant: "the extent to which an employer's personal assets are subject to the procedure referred to in paragraph 1." The Workers' members asked the Employers' members to subamend their amendment to reflect this idea more clearly. The Employers' members accepted this suggestion. Their amendment as subamended read as follows: "The extent to which an employer's assets are subject to the proceedings referred to in paragraph 1 shall be determined by national law, regulation and practice covering insolvency." The Workers' members asserted that it was not their intention to remove the word "personal".

40. Following consultations among the Committee members, the Employers' members indicated that their amendment as subamended should read as follows: "The extent to which an employer's assets are subject to the proceedings referred to in paragraph 1 shall be determined by national law, regulations and practice." The Workers' members stated that they accepted the amendment as subamended.

41. The Chairperson noted that there seemed to be a consensus regarding this amendment, as subamended, and declared that it stood adopted as new paragraph 3 of this Article.

42. Article 1 was adopted as amended.

Article 2

43. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete everything in the sentence after the words "national practice". They stated that the purpose of their amendment was to render the Convention more flexible. The examples that followed "laws or regulations or ... national practice" neither added nor removed anything from the first part of this Article; they were either superfluous or inadequate.

44. The Workers' members asked for clarification from the Office. They wanted to know whether the deletion of the last part of this Article, as proposed in the amendment, would alter the legal implications. A member of the Secretariat drew attention to the fact that only the first part of Article 2 imposed an obligation on Members ratifying the Convention. The second part merely listed examples of methods of applying the provisions, other than laws or regulations, which could be consistent with national practice. The deletion of these examples should not change the legal substance of this Article.

45. The Government member of Cyprus asked whether the formulation of this Article was similar to that of other ILO Conventions, and whether, according to ILO practice, it was customary to add examples. A member of the Secretariat indicated that the wording most commonly used in ILO Conventions was the wording used, or variations thereof, in point 14 of the Proposed Conclusions, included in Report V(2) of last year. This formulation had been changed by the Conference last year as a result of an amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States.

46. After listening to the explanations given by the Office, the Workers' members stated that they could support the amendment submitted by the Employers' members. The Chairperson noted that the Committee concurred with this amendment and declared it adopted by consensus.

Proposed new paragraph

47. The Committee then considered an amendment submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee. It proposed adding a new paragraph to this Article that would read: "2. For the Members where the provisions of this Convention are matters normally left to agreements between employers or employers' organisations and workers' organisations, or are normally carried out otherwise than by law, compliance with those provisions shall be treated as effective if they are applied through such agreements or other means to the great majority of the workers concerned." The amendment was introduced by the Government member of Germany. She explained that according to Article 2, the Convention could be applied through collective agreements, while according to Article 4 the Convention should be applied in principle to all employees and to all branches of economic activity. However, in her country, as well as in a number of others, collective agreements did not necessarily cover all workers, even though they did cover a large majority of employees. To address this situation, it would be appropriate to add a provision to Article 2, so that a member State wishing to apply the Convention through such means as collective bargaining could ratify it when collective agreements covered the great majority of employees. She recalled that a similar text, which had its roots in Article 33 of the European Social Charter, had been accepted last year by the Conference during its consideration of the Working Conditions (Hotels and Restaurants) Convention, 1991 (No. 172).

48. The Government member of the United States said that in reading the amendment he was confused: how could one implement a priority in insolvency proceedings through a collective agreement, which was a private agreement, when privileges could only be created by law? What did "a great majority of workers" mean? He could understand if this amendment was aimed at guarantee institutions, but not if it was to apply to a privilege.

49. The Government member of Cyprus said that, although she could understand the reasons behind it, she could not go along with this amendment because it would limit the personal scope of the Convention, leaving some workers without protection.

50. The Employers' members considered the amendment unnecessary, especially since, as the Secretariat had just explained, collective bargaining was already included in the means of applying the Convention in accordance with Article 2. The Workers' members' stated that the amendment was confusing and might create problems.

51. In view of the reservations to which the amendment gave rise, its authors agreed to withdraw it.

52. The Committee adopted Article 2 as amended.

Paragraph 1

53. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace this paragraph by the following text: "A Member which ratifies this Convention shall apply either the provisions of Part II, providing for protection of workers' claim by means of a privilege, or the provisions of Part III, providing for the protection of workers' claims by a guarantee institution, or the obligations of both Parts. This choice shall be indicated in a declaration accompanying its ratification." They introduced their amendment by recalling that a similar text existed in other ILO instruments, and that in Report IV(2A) the Office had already referred to the possibility of adding such a text to the present Convention. In their opinion the text of this amendment was more precise than that of the Draft Convention, contained in Report IV(2B).

54. The Workers' members, as well as the Government member of Cyprus, and the Government member of Portugal (speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee) supported the amendment, which the Committee adopted by consensus.

55. Paragraph 1 was adopted as amended.

Paragraph 2

56. The Government members of Australia, Canada and the United States submitted an amendment to add the following sentence at the end of the paragraph: "This extension should be communicated in a declaration addressed to the Director-General." In submitting this amendment, the Government member of the United States stressed the advantage of having a text that specified unambiguously the process to be followed by every Government that ratified the Convention applying one of the Parts first and subsequently extending its acceptance to the other Part of the Convention. The amendment was supported by the Government members of Cyprus, Japan, Portugal (speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee) and Czechoslovakia, as well as by the Employers' and Workers' members. The Committee adopted the amendment by consensus.

57. Paragraph 2 was adopted as amended.

58. The Government member of Cyprus noted that paragraph 1, which the Committee had adopted earlier, did not mention that the choice of a member State to apply the provisions of Part II or Part III of the Convention, or both Parts, should be indicated in a declaration addressed to the Director-General, as was the case for extending acceptance in paragraph 2. For reasons of consistency, she suggested that paragraph 1 should also specify that a member State's choice to apply one or other, or both Parts of the Convention should be addressed to the Director-General. The Chairperson observed that the text of paragraph 1 had already been adopted by the Committee, and suggested that the proposal of the Government member of Cyprus should be submitted to the Drafting Committee. That suggestion was accepted.

Paragraph 3

59. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to replace the words "both Parts" (of this Convention) by the words "Part III". He pointed out that the text proposed in Report IV(2B) offered the possibility of limiting the application to Part III only where Members had decided to apply both the provisions of Part II and Part III of the Convention. The aim of his amendment was to permit a Member, regardless of whether or not it had decided to apply Part II, to limit its obligations to compliance with Part III. In his opinion, the text of the Convention would be rendered more flexible and easier to ratify. The Government member of Canada seconded the amendment to allow discussion by the Committee.

60. The Government member of Cyprus opposed the amendment. She remarked that its acceptance would mean that many workers who would not be protected by Part III of the Convention would also not be convered by Part II, and would therefore not have any protection at all. The Government member of India and the Workers' members shared this view and also opposed the amendment. The Employers' members noted that they had submitted an amendment to this paragraph that seemed to them to be more flexible than the one submitted by the Government member of Japan; therefore, they could not support the latter.

61. The amendment was put to a vote and rejected: 780 votes in favour, 67,470 votes against, with 2,730 abstentions.

62. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add, after the words "both Parts", the word "or only of Part III". They stated that their amendment addressed the comments that certain countries had made on this paragraph in Report IV (2A). They added that their amendment was not restrictive because it granted Members the possibility of limiting the application of Part III but did not require them to do so. In addition, such limitations could be introduced only after having consulted the most representative employers' and workers' organisations. Their amendment contemplated the situation of certain categories of workers (for example, seafarers, railway workers or employees of insurance companies), which in their opinion made the Convention easier to ratify.

63. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, because a broad section of workers could be excluded from the application of the Convention. The Government members of Cyprus, India and Tunisia also opposed it.

64. The Government member of Botswana expressed his doubts about the language used in paragraph 2 and in paragraph 3. The Employers' members thought that this remark was very pertinent and asked the Office to define the scope of those provisions. In reply to this request, a member of the Secretariat explained that the first paragraph of Article 1 offered member States the possibility of applying Part I or Part II, or both Parts. Paragraph 2 allowed a Member that initially decided to apply only the provisions of one of these two Parts to extend acceptance to the other Part of the Convention at a later date. According to paragraph 3, a Member that had ratified the Convention could restrict the application of Part III only if it has decided to apply Part II. The intention behind paragraph 3 was to encourage the progressive application of Part III of the Convention, on the condition that workers who were not covered by that Part of the Convention remained protected by Part II.

65. The amendment was put to a vote and rejected: 25,558 votes in favour, 43,472 votes against, with 1,560 abstentions.

66. The Committee adopted paragraph 3 without change.

Paragraph 4

67. In the absence of any amendment, the Committee adopted this paragraph without change.

Paragraph 5

68. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this paragraph. They noted that the paragraph allowed claims that were protected by a guarantee institution, in accordance with Part III, to cease to be protected by the privilege provided pursuant to Part II. They noted that guarantee institutions that paid claims due to workers were subsequently able to be subrogated in the rights of those workers and to recover the amount paid from the insolvent employer's assets. However, as soon as the privilege held by guarantee institutions for protected claims was eliminated by paragraph 5, recuperation through subrogation could become more difficult for those institutions. The Employers' members added that their proposal in no way impaired the rights of workers, but would improve the financing of guarantee institutions.

69. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, opposed the amendment. She emphasised that paragraph 5 was a very important provision which would ensure the ratification of the Convention by many Member States of the European Community. She pointed out that this paragraph allowed member States to eliminate the privilege of protected claims afforded to guarantee institutions, but did not in any way require them to do so. The Workers' members also opposed the amendment, which was withdrawn by its authors.

70. Paragraph 5 was adopted without change.

Paragraphs 6 and 7

71. In the absence of any amendment, these two paragraphs were adopted by the Committee without change.

72. The Committee then adopted article 3 as amended.

Article 4

Paragraph 1

73. In the absence of any amendment, this paragraph was adopted without change.

Paragraph 2

74. The Government members of Australia, Canada and the United States submitted an amendment to add the words "or employment" between the words "employment" and "relationship". In introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United States explained that the addition would give more flexibility to the Convention by permitting the exclusion of certain categories of workers not only by reason of the particular nature of their employment relationship, but also by reason of other employment considerations. It would, for example, permit the exclusion of certain industries in which workers' claims were protected by other types of guarantees than those provided in the Convention. Of course, such exclusions would ensue only after consulting the most representative organisations of workers and employers. The Government member of Canada supported the amendment, commenting that it would permit the exclusion of such categories as managers or personnel in similar positions. This was consistent with the law of her country. The Government members of Japan and Swaziland also supported the amendment.

75. The Workers' members asked the authors of the amendment to clarify the difference, in their opinion, between the terms "employment" and "employment relationship". The Government member of the United States explained that the amendment would permit the exclusion, after proper consultation, of certain branches of activity which in his country did not come under the federal bankruptcy law.

76. The Workers' members did not consider the meaning of the amendment to be clear and noted that the text of this paragraph as proposed allowed the exclusion of certain categories of workers after proper consultation. The amendment was superfluous, thus they opposed it.

77. The amendment was put to a vote. It received 30,238 votes in favour, 390 votes against, with 39,962 abstentions. As the quorum of 30,888 votes in favour and against was not reached, it was not adopted.

78. The Committee adopted paragraph 2 without change.

79. The Government member of Japan asked whether the expression "by reason of the particular nature of their employment relationship" meant that it was up to the member States to determine the exceptions to the Convention. A member of the Secretariat explained that the intention of this provision had been explained in Report IV (2A) (p. 37). A member State could decide certain exclusions after proper consultation, providing, of course, that it applies the Convention in good faith. For example, a government should not exclude categories of workers that the Conference did not intend to be excluded. The Employers' members asked whether the expression "or if there are other types of guarantee affording them protection equivalent to that provided by the Convention" referred only to public employees or also to other categories of workers, by reason of the particular nature of their employment. A member of the Secretariat explained that the intention of this paragraph was to allow two types of exclusions: (a) specific categories of workers, by reason of the nature of their employment relationship, for example public employees or persons occupying a managerial position in an enterprise; and (b) other categories of workers who enjoy some type of protection equivalent to that ensuing from the Convention (for example artisans' or mechanics' liens). There could even be a certain overlap regarding some categories of workers, for whom the employment relationship was of a particular nature and whose claims were protected by guarantees that were equivalent to those provided by the Convention. The Committee decided to record this explanation in its report.

Paragraph 3

80. In the absence of any amendment, the Committee adopted this paragraph without change.

81. The Committee adopted Article 4 without change.

PART II. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS BY MEANS OF A PRIVILEGE

PROTECTED CLAIMS

Article 5

82. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment to replace the word "employer" by "enterprise".

83. The Committee adopted Article 5 without change.

Article 6

Subparagraph (a)

84. The Government members of Canada and United States submitted an amendment to replace the word "for" by "accrued during". The Government member of United States stated that with regard to wages, his Government considered the expression "prescribed period" to mean that protected claims were those that had accrued during this period, excluding those that had accrued earlier. The Government member of Canada supported the amendment, indicating that the suggested language was consistent with another amendment she had proposed for subparagraph (b). The Government member of Japan also supported the amendment and added that corresponding wording should be used in subparagraph (b).

85. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, which they considered restrictive. They noted that subparagraph (a) did not concede a new right to workers but merely specified that workers should be paid for work they had already done.

86. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, submitted a subamendment to the previous amendment that consisted of replacing "accrued during a prescribed period" by "due for a prescribed period". The Government member of Canada then proposed a subamendment to insert the phrase "wages for services rendered during a 3 month period", which was borrowed from her country's bankruptcy law. The Government member of the United States suggested the phrase "earned for a prescribed period". The Employers' members supported the principle of employing the word "earned". The Workers' members endorsed the proposal made by the Government member of Portugal, on behalf of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, to use the word "due".

87. The Government member of the United States commented that all the different phrases proposed were merely linguistic variations of the same concept. He requested clarification from the Office on this issue. A member of the Secretariat stated that the original text of the Office, which appeared in the Proposed Conclusions in Report V(2), was: "22. (a) wages relating to work performed during a prescribed period…". During the first discussion, the Conference amended this conclusion; the text adopted in 1991, therefore, no longer spoke of wages "relating" to a prescribed period but rather referred to wages "for" a prescribed period.

88. The Government member of the United States asserted that the Committee should adopt an amendment to clarify the meaning of this subparagraph. In his view, all the terms already proposed were intended to mean the same thing; he nevertheless suggested retaining the proposal of the Government member of Canada.

89. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, recalled that the Directive of the Council of the European Communities of 20 October 1980 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the protection of employees in the event of the insolvency of their employer, used the expression "relating to pay". She asked whether the Committee would consider adopting this wording, which she put forward as a subamendment.

90. After listening to the explanation given by a member of the Secretariat, the Government member of the United States suggested using the following wording, based on the Office text: "wages relating to work done during a prescribed period". He wondered whether the Committee might want to set up a working group to find a more appropriate wording. He was supported by the Government member of Canada. The Government member of Cyprus also supported the amendment but was equally willing to accept the suggestion made by the Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Members States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, to use the expression "relating to".

91. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, noted that their proposal was based on the Community's experience. More than ten years had passed since the adoption of this Directive, and the expression "relating to pay" had not posed any problem of interpretation. The word "relating" was sufficiently precise so as not to give rise to misunderstandings.

92. The Employers' members stated that they accepted the Office's text; whereas, however, the Workers' members supported the proposal of the Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee.

93. Following a request by the Employers' members, the Representative of the Secretary-General read the two texts under discussion. According to the proposal formulated by the Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, subparagraph (a) should read: "(a) the workers' claims relating to wages for a prescribed period...". To correspond to the Office's text [(Report V(2), Proposed Conclusions No. 22(a)], the subparagraph would state: "(a) wages relating to work performed during a prescribed period...".

94. The Employers' members stated that they would like to compromise in an effort to facilitate the work of the Committee. They, therefore, accepted the proposal as formulated by the Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee. The Committee adopted this proposal by consensus.

95. The Workers' members subsequently withdrew their amendment to replace "three months" by "six months". They stated that they thought the privilege should protect claims for wages relating to a period of six months rather than three months. What was at issue was work that had already been performed, for which workers should be paid. In their view, a protection covering six months was very reasonable, especially since Article 7 of the Convention permitted limitations to be imposed on the amounts protected by a privilege. However, after preliminary discussions with certain members of the Committee they were concerned that such a provision could make ratification of the Convention more difficult. They therefore decided to withdraw the amendment.

96. The Committee adopted subparagraph (a) as amended.

Subparagraph (b)

97. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to replace this subparagraph by "(b) remuneration for holidays with pay and for other types of paid absence due to workers at the time of the insolvency or of the termination of their employment" in favour of an amendment submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee. For the same reasons, the Government member of Austria withdrew a similar amendment.

98. The amendment submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, was introduced by the Government member of Portugal. This amendment proposed replacing subparagraph (b) by the following text: "(b) the workers' claims for holiday pay and other types of paid absence, pertaining to work done during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year". The Government member of Portugal recalled that according to the text of Report IV (2B) the wording of this subparagraph raised problems of interpretation. She drew the Committee's attention to the fact that holiday pay was usually calculated on an annual basis, the worker being entitled to a certain number of holidays on the basis of the number of days worked. The time-limit proposed in the amendment, which referred to work done during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year, seemed to be reasonable and in their opinion would not inhibit ratification of the Convention.

99. The Employers' members found that the time-limit suggested in this amendment was too long; therefore, they opposed it. However, they would accept the amendment if the time-limit was reduced to three months. This was not accepted by the authors of the amendment, who insisted that the time-limit did not protect wages but the right to holiday pay relating to work that had already been performed.

100. The Workers' members supported the amendment. They pointed out that it did not create a right to holidays with pay, but protected workers' claims for holiday pay which were generated before the insolvency or the termination of the employment. The period of service chosen as a reference was not excessive, since in any case Article 7 allowed limitations to be set on the total amounts protected by the privilege.

101. The Employers' members indicated that the amendment could be divided. with respect to holiday pay, they could accept a period of protection of one year. Regarding other types of paid absence, the period indicated in this amendment seemed excessive; three months should be the maximum.

102. The Government member of the United States was of the opinion that this amendment would make ratification of the Convention more difficult. Many developing countries could have difficulty adopting legal provisions that were as liberal as those proposed in the amendment. He therefore proposed a subamendment to delete the phrase "during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year" and replace it by "during the three months prior to insolvency". The subamendment was supported by the Employers' members, as well as by the Government members of Botswana and Canada; however, it was not accepted by the authors of the amendment.

103. The Government member of India supported the amendment and opposed the subamendment put forward by the Government member of the United States. She noted the concerns he expressed regarding the difficulties that developing countries might encounter if they wished to ratify the Convention amended in this way. However, she pointed out that the law of her country protected all accrued holiday remuneration owing to a worker on the termination of his or her employment, at the time of his or her death or upon the winding up of the enterprise.

104. The Government member of Cyprus submitted a subamendment to protect "the workers' claims for holiday pay and other types of paid absence to which the worker is entitled for the period of one year of employment". This subamendment was not seconded.

105. The Workers' members opposed the subamendment of the Government member of the United States because in their opinion it would weaken the Convention significantly. If it was accepted, many workers' claims for holiday pay owing to them could remain unpaid.

106. The Government member of Cyprus opposed the subamendment. She noted that in her country the period protected was 12 months. The Government member of Australia stated that the issue the Committee was debating was of particular importance for her country. In her country, legislation did not impose any limits for the payment of holiday pay. It did not seem equitable that workers who had taken their holidays before the insolvency should be better off than those who had remained to work for their employer. It was unfair to treat wages and holidays in the same manner. Establishing limits for wages protected was acceptable because it was unlikely that a worker would continue to work for an employer after three months without being paid. However, it was common for a worker to continue working without taking holidays. Her Government wanted a Convention that established meaningful standards rather than minimum standards at the level of the lowest common denominator. In any event, she recalled that Article 7 permitted limits to be imposed on the amount protected. If the subamendment was adopted, it could mean that in the future there would be pressure in her country to lower the level of protection that already existed in national law.

107. The Employers' members recalled that this issue had already been decided during the first discussion. It was not a question of establishing a guarantee equivalent to that established in the most advanced national laws, but rather one of establishing criteria capable of encouraging ratification of the instrument. They were concerned that measures that were too generous could affect investments, and consequently employment.

108. The subamendment was voted on and rejected: 82,500 votes in favour, 118,800 against, with 4,400 abstentions. The Committee then reconsidered the above amendment as it originally had been submitted by its authors.

109. The Government members of Finland, Norway and Sweden submitted a subamendment to replace the amendment by the following text: "(b) The workers' claims for holiday pay accrued during a prescribed period, which shall not be less that 12 months prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment, and the workers' claims for other types of paid absence for a prescribed period, which shall not be less than 3 months prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of employment". The Employers' members withdrew their earlier subamendment to the amendment under discussion in favour of the subamendment of the Government members of Finland, Norway and Sweden.

110. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, stated that to permit a greater degree of consensus she would submit a subamendment to divide their amendment so that it read: "(b) the workers' claims for holiday pay pertaining to work done during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occured, and in the preceding year, and (c) the workers' claims for other types of paid absence for a prescribed period which shall not be less than three months prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment". This subamendment was accepted by the Government members of Finland, Norway and Sweden and supported by the Employers' and Workers' members. The Committee adopted it by consensus.

111. Subparagraph (b) was adopted as amended. It had been divided into two subparagraphs, i.e. subparagraphs (b) and (c). The Employers' members requested the Secretariat to clarify the meaning of the expression "other types of paid absence". A member of the Secretariat stated that this expression had been introduced last year to cover absences such as sick leave or maternity leave which could be owing to workers pursuant to national laws, regulations or practice.

112. The Committee took note of the fact that the amendments relating to subparagraph (b) that had been submitted by the Employers' members as well as by the Government members of Canada, the United States and Japan were no longer relevant since the Committee had adopted a new text for this subparagraph.

New subparagraph

113. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the following new subparagraph: "(c) compensation due to workers upon termination of their employment". They explained that it was of great importance to them that the Convention grant a privilege for compensation due to workers upon the termination of their employment, since as a result of such loss they often found themselves in a very difficult situation. However, they added that as it was evident that many governments would be unwilling to include all forms of compensation due to workers upon termination of their employment. They would subamend their amendment to limit it to severance pay, which was one of the most important forms of this kind of compensation. They therefore subamended it, replacing the word "compensation" by the words "severance pay". They believed that this subamendment would correspond more closely to Article 7 of the draft Convention, which referred to the possible limitations on privileged claims.

114. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. They recalled that there was an ILO Convention on this subject, the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), which granted protection to workers only when they were dismissed at the initiative of their employer. Such an initiative did not exist when the enterprise became insolvent or bankrupt because in such cases the dismissal of the employee was not an international act on the part of the employer. It was unacceptable that one ILO Convention should prescribe that an employee had the right to compensation only when dismissed at the initiative of the employer whereas another Convention provides for compensation even when the termination was not at the initiative of the employer. Although such a principle existed in the legislation of many countries, this did not require it to be reflected in an ILO Convention.

115. The Government member of Canada opposed the amendment as well as the subamendment. She was concerned that many countries would not be able to ratify the Convention if it specified that severance pay should be protected by a privilege. In addition, a distinction should be drawn between money for wages and holiday pay, which is relied upon on a day-to-day basis by workers, and amounts which may be due to them at the time of a future termination of employment. She encouraged countries to protect severance pay by a privilege, but thought this could be accomplished in the Recommendation. The Government member of Cyprus also believed that claims for severance pay should be addressed in a Recommendation rather than a Convention.

116. The Government member of Australia commented that when an enterprise becomes bankrupt, the workers were often left without work or money, and desperately needed to receive their severance pay, which they relied upon to survive. She supported the subamendment, particularly in light of Article 7 of the draft Convention which allowed a limit to be placed on the total amount protected by a privilege. The Government members of Austria and Mauritius were also in favour of the amendment as subamended. The Government member of Botswana noted that in many countries severance pay was a very important benefit, particularly when those out of work did not benefit from a pension. If the Committee chose to reject the amendment, it should not do so on the premise that this form of compensation was unimportant to workers.

117. The Workers' members commented that in many developing countries, severance pay was the only benefit workers could rely on when they lost their jobs. They recalled that in the questionnaire attached to Report V (1), prepared for the first discussion, the Office had asked member States whether they thought severance pay should be protected by a privilege (question 13(e)). Thirty-four of the 46 governments that responded replied in the affirmative, with only one Government giving a negative reply and 11 Governments furnishing diverse answers.

118. The Employers members stated that they were not questioning the right of workers to receive severance pay, however, they did not think this type of compensation should be the object of a privileged claim. They were concerned that in the developing countries the fact of conceding too high a rank of privilege to workers' claims could limit access to credit and deter investment. They noted that the large majority of affirmative replies to the question asked by the Office, referred to earlier by the Workers' members, did not constitute the majority of member States of the Organisation.

119. The Government member of India recalled that at present time many States in the world were applying structural adjustment policies that could lead to the closure of enterprises and the dismissal of workers. Severance pay could mitigate the negative effects of these policies and limit their social cost. She stated that she was pleased that the Employers' members had recognised the importance of the right to severance pay. She believed it was necessary for the protection of this type of compensation to have a privilege secured by the Convention.

120. In response to a question asked by the Workers' members, a member of the Secretariat specified that the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) had established a number of substantive provisions on the termination of employment. Article 12 of that instrument stipulated that a dismissed worker shall be entitled to severance allowance or other similar benefits, to benefits from unemployment insurance, unemployment assistance or other forms of social security, or to a combination of such allowance and benefits. The draft Convention under discussion did not deal with this right; however, where a national right exists there is an obligation to grant a privilege in the event of the insolvency of the employer. In response to a request from the Employers' members, Article 3 of that Convention was read out, which states: "For the purpose of this Convention the terms 'termination' and 'termination of employment' mean termination of employment at the initiative of the employer". The member of the Secretariat added that, in accordance with Article 3, the obligation relating to "severance pay", provided for in Article 12, only applied in the case of termination of employment at the initiative of the employer.

121. The amendment, as subamended, was put to a vote and approved by 191,884 votes in favour, 161,700 against, with 51,744 abstentions.

122. Article 6 was adopted as amended.

LIMITATIONS

Article 7

Paragraph 1

123. In the absence of any amendment, paragraph 1 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 2

124. The Government members of Canada and the United States submitted an amendment to replace the words "so as to maintain its value" by "in order that it not fall below a socially acceptable level". The Government of Canada explained that the purpose of the amendment was to clarify the scope of the obligation stipulated in this Article. It was appropriate that Article 7 called for the overall amount of claims protected by a privilege to be adjusted so that the amount did not fall below a socially acceptable level. However, paragraph 2 as proposed in Report IV(2B) could lead one to believe that the Convention required automatic indexation. This was not the procedure under the legislation of her country, nor in that of many other countries. The Employers' members seconded this amendment. The Government member of the United Kingdom also supported the amendment, which he felt made the text clearer.

125. The Workers' members opposed the amendment and noted that in the legislation of certain countries a ceiling had been fixed on the amount of workers' claims protected by a privilege. This limit had remained the same for many years. They believed that the Convention should impose both an obligation to fix a ceiling at a socially acceptable level and another obligation to raise this ceiling to maintain its value.

126. The Government member of the United States recalled that he supported the amendment because he thought that the amount of claims protected by a privilege should be set at a socially acceptable level, which should be adjusted from time to time to ensure that the level remained socially acceptable. This did not mean, however, that the adjustment should be made by way of indexation. The Government member of Canada stated that she did not want to discourage any government from instituting a system of indexation, if that was appropriate, but she did not think it was appropriate for her country.

127. The Government member of Cyprus asked for clarification from the Office regarding the meaning of the phrase "so as to maintain its value". A member of the Secretariat explained that this expression had appeared in the Office's Conclusions proposed for the first discussion. The Office's intention had been to request that the ceiling for the amount protected be reviewed periodically so that it did not fall below a socially acceptable level. As regards its adjustment, he pointed out the different variables mentioned in the draft Recommendation; he added that it was not the intention of the Office for the Convention to mandate automatic indexing of the amount protected by a privilege.

128. The Government member of France opposed the amendment. The protection which the privilege provides should be real rather than illusory. It was therefore important that the Convention impose an obligation to adjust as necessary the amount protected. The Government member of India supported the previous speaker. She added that she had taken due note that paragraph 2 did not impose automatic indexing; therefore, she would vote against the amendment.

129. The Government member of Botswana asked what "socially acceptable" meant. The Workers' members replied that it was very difficult to define, but they could give examples of what was not "socially acceptable". In this regard, they mentioned the case of a country that had fixed a limit that had not been raised for over 40 years, while the cost of living had increased significantly.

130. The Government member of Cyprus stated that after listening to all the previous explanations she would support the proposed text rather than the amendment. Nevertheless, she asked whether reference could be made in the text to paragraph 4 of the Recommendation. The Employers' members commented that this proposal could not be sustained since the Committee had not yet discussed the Recommendation.

131. The Employers' members added that Article 7 already stipulated in its first paragraph that national laws or regulations could limit the protection of claims to an amount, provided the amount was socially acceptable. Their amendment was limited to retaining the same idea in paragraph 2. The Workers' member replied that paragraph 1 stipulated that the limit of the protection should not be below a socially acceptable level and paragraph 2 required the value of this limit to be maintained. Such wording ensured that the amount of workers' claims protected by a privilege could follow the same escalation as the rest of the economy, if there was such an escalation.

132. The Government member of Canada asked the Committee to place the preceding explanations given by a member of the Secretariat in the report. She would withdraw the amendment if it was stated in the Committee's report that paragraph 2 was not intended to require any State ratifying the Convention to apply strict indexation for the protection of privileged claims. The Government member of the United States supported this proposal. The Workers' members consented, stressing that the provision did not prohibit indexation.

133. The Committee acknowledged that, where the protection afforded is limited, the obligation to "maintain the value" of the protection of claims by a privilege should not be interpreted as an obligation which either impose or prohibits indexation. On the basis of this interpretation, the amendment was withdrawn by its authors, and paragraph 2 was adopted without change.

134. The Committee adopted Article 7 without change.

RANK OF PRIVILEGE

Article 8

135. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment which had proposed replacing this Article by the following text: "Workers' claims shall be given a higher rank of privilege than most other privileged claims, and in particular those of the State and the social security system." They recalled that the text of this amendment adopted the conclusions proposed by the Office in Report V(2), which had been considerably weakened as a result of the first discussion in 1991. They explained that they were withdrawing the amendment because the Committee was to discuss another amendment which went in the same direction as theirs. They were going to support this latter amendment, which had been submitted by several Government members and thus had a greater chance of being adopted.

136. The amendment the Committee then addressed had been submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee. The amendment sought to replace Article 8 by the following text: "When workers' claims are not protected by a guarantee institution as provided for in Part III of this Convention, Members shall give them a higher rank of privilege than most other privileged claims and in particular those of the State and the social security system." The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the sponsors of the amendment, recalled that guarantee institutions, since they could ensure that claims would be paid, are a more effective means of protecting workers' claims than is the system of privilege. For that reason, it was not indispensable for claims protected by a guarantee to also benefit from so high a ranking for purposes of privilege. On the other hand, where workers' claims are not protected by a guarantee institution, and thus may benefit only from privilege, this privilege should come before the privilege afforded to claims of the State or the social security system; if they did not, there was reason to fear that they would never be paid. That was, in sum, the reasoning behind the amendment. None the less its sponsors wished to introduce a few editorial changes: to replace "an institution" by "the institution", "as provided for" by "under the conditions provided for", and "the Members shall give them" by "these claims shall be given". The Workers' members supported the amendment as it had been subamended.

137. The Employers' members noted that the financial resources of guarantee institutions came from contributions made to them and from money they recouped from the assets of insolvent employers, through subrogation of the rights of employees, to whom the institutions advanced money for their wage claims. The amendment under discussion in fact foresaw two situations: (a) when workers' claims are protected by a privilege, their payment should come before claims of the State or the social security system, and (b) when workers' claims are protected by a guarantee institution, they can benefit from a privilege, but this could be placed after the claims of the State or the social security system. This would clearly diminish the possibility of guarantee institutions, which had advanced funds to workers, being reimbursed from employers' assets by means of subrogation. This could mean that in practice, the financing of these institutions would depend only upon employer contributions. The Employers' members thought that the amendment could discourage the establishment of guarantee institutions and therefore they could only oppose it.

138. The Government member of Tunisia also opposed the amendment, indicating that he did not agree with giving workers' claims a rank of privilege higher than that of the social security system.

139. The Government member of Canada stated that in principle she agreed that workers' claims should have a higher ranking than that of the State or the social security system. However, she had doubts about the operation of this privilege in relation to state claims for taxes and other contributions payable by workers (such as employee contributions to social security an the federal pension scheme) which were deducted at the source by the employer, who then became the depository for those sums. Under the legislation of her country, such claims were in the nature of funds held in trust, and did not belong to the employer. In case of the employer's insolvency, the State had an absolute priority over these funds. Her Government wished to know whether Article 8, if it were modified in the way sought by the amendment, would require Members to grant a privilege to workers' claims higher than for claims for employees' taxes and contributions that were deducted at the source. If this were the case, she would have to oppose the amendment. On the other hand she noted that the amendment would have the effect of reducing the possibility of guarantee institutions being reimbursed by means of subrogation. Finally, she wondered whether, where guarantee institutions protected only a part of the workers' claim, the part of the claim that was not protected by the guarantee would benefit from a higher privilege than the State.

140. In reply to one of the questions posed by the Government member of Canada, a member of the Secretariat indicated that the answer could lie either in treating employee contributions of this type as workers' claims (as provided in Paragraph 11 (f) of the draft Recommendation) or in defining, in national law, the "employer's assets" to which the privilege given to workers' claims would apply. If employee contributions deducted at the sources were not considered part of the employer's assets, they would perhaps not form part of the assets subject to insolvency proceedings.

141. In reply to another question raised by the Government member of Canada, the Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, pointed out that their proposal would not prevent a guarantee institution from having a privilege.

142. The Government member of Mauritius stated that in his country the current law gave workers' claims the same rank of privilege as other privileges, whereas the law had previously given them a higher ranking and then a lower ranking. He therefore proposed a subamendment to the amendment, to replace the words "a higher rank of privilege than" with "at least the same rank of privilege as". This proposal was not seconded.

143. The Government member of Cyprus stated that she also supported the principle that workers' claims should benefit from a higher ranking than those of the State and the social security system. She recalled that in insolvency proceedings the principal creditor is usually the State. If the State was reimbursed from the employer's assets in the first instance, this would mean there would be nothing left for the workers. However, the privilege given to workers' claims should not go ahead of the privilege of creditors with secured assets, because then lending could be affected. She noted that the amendment spoke of "most other privileged claims"; did this mean that claims guaranteed by security would have a ranking above of workers' claims?

144. In reply to this question, a member of the Secretariat recalled that when the Office had prepared the questionnaire annexed to Report V(1), it had asked whether part of workers' claims should have a higher rank of privilege than any other claim, including those guaranteed by a mortgage or other security (Question 21). Since a great number of countries had replied in the negative, the Office was not in a position to propose any rule on the matter in its proposed conclusions (Report V(2), pp. 54 and 55). As a result, it had not been the Office's intention to propose that workers' claims should enjoy a higher privilege than secured claims.

145. The Government member of Czechoslovakia proposed a subamendment to delete the phrase "of the social security system". This proposal was not seconded.

146. The Government member of the United States expressed regret that the Workers' members had withdrawn their amendment in favour of the subamended amendment now under examination by the Committee, because he would have supported theirs. The amendment now under consideration would provide only partial protection for workers' claims. The Government member of Canada also thought that the amendment withdrawn by the Workers' members was better than the one under discussion at the moment. She had some doubts concerning that amendment in relation to how the privilege would operate for claims that were not protected by guarantee institutions. She suggested revising the wording of the amendment, as it had been subamended, as follows: "Workers' claims which are protected by a guarantee institution in accordance with Part III of this Convention may be given a lower rank of privilege than those of the State and the social security system".

147. The Employers' members expressed serious concern at the fact that the amendment risked weakening the possibilities guarantee institutions would have to be reimbursed by means of subrogation. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, said that this question dealt with the means of financing guarantee institutions. Under Article 11 of the draft Convention, this was a matter to be determined by national law, regulations and practice.

148. After a break in the sitting, the Committee took up a new subamendment, presented by the sponsors of the amendment under discussion. It proposed replacing Article 8 by this text: "1. National law or regulations shall give workers' claims a higher rank of privilege than most other privileged claims, and in particular those of the State and the social security system. 2. However, where workers' claims are protected by a gurarantee institution in accordance with Part III of this Convention, the claims so protected may be given a lower rank of privilege than those of the State and the social security system." The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, explained that the principle stated in paragraph 1 laid down an obligation, i.e. to grant workers' claims a rank of privilege higher than those of the State and the social security system. On the other hand, paragraph 2, which used the word "may", was not a binding standard. In countries where there was no wage guarantee, it was important that workers' claims would come before those of the State and the social security system, since those two were the principal creditors of insolvent employers. However, where a wage guarantee exists, this system is more effective than privilege. It was therefore no longer essential that workers' claims be protected by as strong a privilege as where no wage guarantee exists.

149. The Government member of Canada wondered whether the second part of this amendment, as subamended, was necessary. Article 3, paragraph 5, of the draft Convention already provided the option of excluding from Part II of the Convention claims that were protected under Part III of the Convention. In her opinion, only the first part of the subamendment should be retained.

150. The Government member of the United Kingdom noted that there was noting unnatural about providing that, if a claim was protected by a guarantee, the privilege could be decreased. The subamendment envisaged this possibility and had been proposed with the aim of making the Convention more flexible. Although it might seem odd to accept the obligations of Part II when a country had accepted the obligations of Part III, there were scenarios in which this might occur. Where claims were not protected by a guarantee institution, they should have a higher rank of privilege. If a claim was protected by a guarantee institution and by a privilege that was too high, some countries would not be in a position to ratify the Convention.

151. The Government member of the United States commented that, under the amendment as subamended, a worker could receive a modest amount of money from a guarantee institution. The difference between this modest sum and the rest of his or her claim would then be granted a rank of privilege lower than that of other privileges. In this way the worker could always hope to recoup a part of what was owed to him or to her. The speaker concluded that the subamendment was a solution to be considered.

152. The Government member of Canada withdrew her earlier proposal. The Workers' members stated that they could accept the amendment as it had been subamended, on the understanding that the first paragraph of the text granted workers' claims a higher privilege than those of the State and the social security system, and that the second paragraph granted workers' claims that were protected by a guarantee institution a privilege that could be lower than that of the State and the social security system, but that must always be higher than most other privileged claims. The sponsors of the subamendment confirmed that this was their intent. At the request of the Government member of the United States, the Committee decided to include this interpretation in its report.

153. The Employers' members stated that the texts under discussion, from amendment to subamendment, had become confusing. The draft of Article 8 as it had been proposed in Report IV(2B) had the advantage of being clear, and they were going to support it. They therefore opposed the amendment as it had been subamended.

154. Considering that the issue had been sufficiently discussed the Chairperson put the amendment, as subamended, to a vote. It was adopted by 47,520 votes in favour, 34,650 votes against and 10,395 abstentions.

155. Owing to the adoption of this amendment, the Committee did not need to address an amendment submitted by the Government member of Japan which had proposed adding to Article 8, after "workers' claims", the words "which have been submitted according to the established procedure". The Government member of Japan none the less requested a clarification: he stated that in his country's legislation, workers' claims could be placed after those of the State, although the law also offered workers the possibility of registering their claims against an employer's real property, in which case they had a super-privilege. The Government member of Japan wished to know whether the possibility that the law afforded to workers to register their cliams, even though in practice workers only infrequently did so, would meet the obligation laid down in Article 8, as amended. A member of the Secretariat replied that it was very difficult to give an answer on the spot, since it would be necessary to examine closely the nature of this particular protection.

156. The Workers' members then withdrew an amendment that had proposed adding another paragraph to this Article, as follows: "2. At least four weeks of the workers' claims for wages shall be accorded a higher rank of privilege than all other claims." They had wished that the Convention would include such an obligation, but they were aware that this might risk making ratification difficult.

157. The Committee adopted Article 8 as amended.

PART III. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS BY A GUARANTEE INSTITUTION

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Article 9

158. Since no amendment had been submitted, the Committee adopted this Article without change.

Article 10

159. The Employers' members submitted an amendment that sought to replace "may" by "shall". They wanted to turn the option that the Convention gave to Members, i.e. to take measures to avoid abuse, into an obligation to take such measures, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers.

160. The Workers' members thought that the amendment was superfluous. It should be presumed that each State would have to take measures to prevent an abuse of rights. They wondered whether creating such an obligation would make the Convention more rigid and thus difficult to ratify.

161. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, noted that the text of Article 10 as it had been proposed in Report IV(2B) took up an idea that was already contained in the Community Directive to which reference had been made earlier. They did not see the need for the amendment proposed by the Employers' members and planned to oppose it. The Government member of Germany added that in his country, guarantee institutions could themselves adopt measures to prevent abuse. Article 10, as it had been originally proposed, contained a flexible formula which he found satisfactory.

162. The Employers' members stated that they did not understand why all the preceding speakers had been against the idea of making it an obligation to adopt measures to prevent abuse. They had made this proposal in order to contribute to having guarantee institutions that were financially solid. The control of abuse was one way of strengthening them. The Workers' members replied that they were also opposed to abuse, but that they sought that Article 10, as it had been drafted, was sufficiently flexible. It permitted member States, only when they deemed it appropriate, to take measures after consultation. They were therefore going to oppose the amendment.

163. The Employers' members commented that a provision that said "may" also meant "may not", and this could open the door to tolerating abuse. They regretted the approach taken by the committee in failing to follow their proposal, and withdrew their amendment.

164. Article 10 was adopted without change.

Article 11

165. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add to this Article two new paragraphs, numbered 2 and 3, which would read: "2. The funds managed by guarantee institutions, other than those from general revenues, must only be used for the purpose for which they were collected. 3. The provisions of the preceding paragraphs shall not prevent countries, in accordance with their particular characteristics and needs, from providing that insurance companies may cover the guarantees referred to in Article 9." They explained that the purpose of paragraph 2 was to strengthen the principle that abuse must be limited. The purpose of paragraph 3 was to acknowledge that there could be different types of guarantee institutions, such as private insurance companies, which could guarantee the payment of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer.

166. The Government member of India stated that she could support the second part of the amendment. Regarding the first part, she proposed a subamendment to remove the phrase "other than those from general revenues". The Employers' members accepted the proposal. They also subamended their amendment, by dividing it so that the Committee could discuss each paragraph separately.

167. The Government member of the United States opposed paragraph 2. He did not think that a government could accept to relinquish control of a guarantee institution in which it had deposited funds. As the amendment had been drafted, governments would be prevented from using funds that had been collected to operate guarantee institutions even when the reserves of these institutions exceeded their expenditures. In addition, in his country there were trust funds, for example social security funds, which did not belong to the State but were used in exchange for an instrument acknowledging a debt and a promise to repay upon demand.

168. The Government member of Canada remarked that it would be difficult to insert this paragraph in the Convention because member States would have practical difficulty adhering to such an obligation. One should also ask what the words "the purpose for which they were collected" meant. Were administrative costs and costs for training personnel in guarantee institutions included in this purpose? This needed to be clarified. However, she had no problem with the principle of this paragraph since she thought that the taxpayer was entitled to know where the money was going. It could therefore be retained in the Recommendation.

169. The Employers' members admitted that this amendment posed problems. Yet they evoked the experience, which in their opinion was disastrous, of state administration of the social security system in some developed countries. The State had diverted the social security funds, and they did not want to see the same thing happen with guarantee institutions. They therefore appealed to the Committee to adopt their amendment.

170. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, stated that this paragraph would be too difficult to implement; therefore, they could not accept it. She recalled that a similar discussion had taken place last year with reference to a similar amendment submitted by the Employers' members.

171. The Workers' members noted that they had listened carefully to the previous comments made by the Government members. They had discerned that many governments wanted to ratify the Convention and that this paragraph could create an obstacle. Consequently, they too would oppose it.

172. The Employers' members took due note of the many reservations expressed about their proposal and withdrew the first part of their amendment.

173. The Committee then discussed the second part of the amendment, i.e. paragraph 3 (which had become paragraph 2). The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, commented that this amendment did not answer one question: "What should be done when an insurance company that had assumed an employer's risk of insolvency itself went bankrupt?" They consequently had problems with the amendment. The Government member of Austria shared this view. The Employers' members noted that this issue could be resolved within the framework of the first part of Article 11, which referred to the methods of application prescribed in Article 2. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, then proposed a subamendment to add at the end of this paragraph: "so long as they provide sufficient guarantees". The subamendment was accepted by the Employers' members.

174. The Workers' members commented that Article 2 as well as Article 11 provided member States with the competence to set up different systems to guarantee wages. No provision of the Convention prevented insurance companies from covering guarantees. The amendment was therefore superfluous and they could not support it.

175. The Government member of Canada shared the view of the Workers' members and suggested that the Employers' members withdraw their amendment, on the condition that the Committee mention in its report that the Convention was not intended to prevent a ratifying State from establishing a wage guarantee system that relied on private insurance companies. The Employers' members asserted that their amendment was not capricious because it was in line with the restructuring presently taking place throughout the world. They therefore requested a vote on their amendment.

176. The amendment was adopted as subamended by 94,944 votes in favour and 0 votes against, with 84,065 abstentions.

177. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, stated that the term "sufficient" in the case of the insolvency of a guarantee institution backed by private insurance companies meant that workers' claims on the insurance company would be covered by a supplementary private or public fund.

178. Article 11 was adopted as amended.

CLAIMS PROTECTED BY A GUARANTEE INSTITUTION

Article 12

Subparagraph (a)

179. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to extend the period for which wages would be guaranteed from the eight weeks provided for in this subparagraph to six months. They realised that a number of governments would have difficulty accepting such an obligation and therefore withdrew their amendment in favour of one submitted by the Government members of Finland, Norway and Sweden.

180. The Government members of Finland, Norway and Sweden submitted an amendment to extend the guaranteed period for wages from eight weeks to three months. The sponsors of the amendment stated that they did not think the period guaranteed should be less than three months, which in their opinion was very reasonable.

181. The Workers' members endorsed this amendment. They also found three months to be reasonable. The purpose of this Article was not to establish any new rights for workers, but rather to guarantee payment of wages for work they had already performed. They recalled that Article 6 had established a privilege covering workers' claims for wages for a period of three months, and they believed Article 12 should correspond with Article 6. They imagined this proposal could give rise to resistance, but they pointed out that Article 13 allowed claims for wages protected by a guarantee to be limited to a prescribed amount.

182. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. There was a difference between protection by a privilege and by a guarantee institution; a guarantee provided an assurance of payment which was not present in the case of a privilege. It was possible to be more generous regarding a privilege that with a guarantee institution. It was costly to finance the latter and was not wise to place its financial equilibrium in jeopardy by excessively increasing the claims it guaranteed. It seemed more sensible to have a limit of eight weeks rather than three months.

183. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, also made reference to the cost of a wage guarantee and opposed the amendment.

184. The Workers' members recalled that in the replies to the questionnaire in Report V (1), prepared for the first discussion in 1991, many governments had stated that they were in favour of fixing the guarantee limit at three months rather than eight weeks. Moreover, most existing wage institutions already afforded at least this protection. Consequently, they appealed to the governments that had been in favour of extending the limit to three months to vote in favour of the amendment.

185. The Government member of the United Kingdom noted that in practice workers did not work longer than five weeks without being paid their wages. The eight-week limit was therefore sufficient. He could not support the argument that this subparagraph should correspond to subparagraph (a) of Article 6, as these related to two different matters. The unquestionable advantages that a guarantee institution had over a privilege would justify a shorter period of guaranteed protection.

186. The Government member of Canada shared the views of the previous speaker. There were no valid reasons for affording the same period of protection for a guarantee as that covered by a privilege. It was unlikely that employees would work very long without being paid and they should not be encouraged to do so. It should be remembered that Part III involved a burden on the taxpayers. Guarantee institutions would be developed in particular in industrialised countries where social security systems already provided a safety net to worker. The limit of eight weeks seemed more acceptable than that of three months; she therefore opposed the amendment. On the other hand, the limit of three months could be increased in the Recommendation.

187. The Government member of Botswana disagreed with the previous speakers. There seemed to be an anomaly in establishing a three-month period of protection for a privilege and only eight weeks for a wage guarantee. It was possible that an employee might work for three months without pay in the hope of arriving at some arrangement to save the enterprise and his or her employment.

188. The Government member of Germany noted that the text of this subparagraph was "shall not be less than eight weeks". While facilitating ratification, this wording did not prevent the standard from being exceeded. The Government members of Cyprus and Tunisia also supported the eight-week limit.

189. When put to a vote, the amendment was rejected by 100,878 votes against and 79,120 votes in favour, with 4,945 abstentions.

190. The Committee then considered an amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States to replace the phrase "for a prescribed period" by "accrued during a prescribed period". The Government member of the United States subamended this amendment to make it conform to the language adopted by the Committee during its consideration of Article 6, subparagraph (a). The subamendment would read, "the workers' claims relating to wages accrued during a prescribed period". The Government members of Canada and Japan supported the amendment as subamended. It was also accepted by the Employers' and Workers' members. The Government member of Tunisia proposed adding the phrase "of work" after "prescribed period". This proposal was not seconded. The amendment was adopted as subamended by consensus.

191. Subparagraph (a) was adopted as amended.

Subparagraph (b)

192. The Workers' members submitted an amendment aimed at extending the guarantee to all claims for holidays with pay and other types of paid absences due to workers at the time of the insolvency or of the termination of their employment. Taking into account the decision taken by the Committee during the debate on Article 6, subparagraph (b), the Workers' member subamended this amendment so that the text would be aligned with the final text of that Article. As subamended, the amendment should read: "the workers' claims for holiday pay pertaining to work done during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year, and (c) the workers' claims for other types of paid absence for a prescribed period which shall not be less than three months prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment".

193. The Employers' members opposed the amendment as subamended, repeating the arguments they had made during the discussion of subparagraph (a) of Article 12. There was no reason to treat claims protected under Part II and those protected under Part III in the same way.

194. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, said that the text of subparagrah (b) in Report IV(2B) provided a period that seemed a bit short. On the other hand, the period the workers' members were proposing was too long, and would have serious financial consequences for guarantee institutions. For this reason, she proposed a subamendment to the preceding subamendment, to read as follows: "(b) claims for holiday pay pertaining to work done during a prescribed period which shall not be less than three months prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment," and "(c) claims for other types of paid absence for a prescribed period which shall not be less than three months prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment." The separation of the subamendment into two separate clauses was justified by the distinct nature of the right to holidays with pay and the right to other types of paid absence.

195. The Workers' members proposed to subamend the subamendment that had just been submitted to the amendment that they had themselves subamended. They proposed replacing "three months" in subparagraph (b) by "six months". They accepted the three-month period proposed in subparagraph (c). the Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, accepted the replacement of "three months" by "six months" in subparagraph (b). She counterproposed changing "three months" to "eight weeks" in subparagraph (c). The Workers' members accepted this proposal.

196. The employers' members accepted the amendment, as most recently subamended, and it was then adopted by the Commitee by consensus. Thus subparagraph (b) of the text was replaced by new subparagraphs (b) and (c).

197. The Government member of Germany said he had considerable sympathy for the solutions that the Committee had just adopted, but that he was unable to support them. This was because in his country, for purposes of the guarantee, there were different bases for holiday pay. Under German law, claims relating to holiday pay were protected as long as the holiday has been taken. Excluded from protection were claims for waived rights to paid leave in a prescribed period when the leave had not been taken. During the ratification process, an examination would be undertaken to see if Article 12, subparagraph (b) as formulated by the Committee would be acceptable under German law.

198. Since this amendment, as subamended, has been adopted, the Committee did not need to deal with other amendments that had proposed changes in the text that had just been replaced. There had been two amendments, the first submitted by the Government members of Japan and the United States, proposing replacement of the word "for a prescribed period" by "accrued during a prescribed period". The second had been submitted by the Government members of Canada, Finland, Norway and Sweden, which proposed replacing subparagraph (b) by a text aimed at extending protection only to claims for holiday pay accrued during a prescribed period of not less than six months prior to the insolvency or the termination of the employment.

New subparagraph

199. The Committee addressed an amendment, submitted by the Workers' members, proposing the addition of a new subparagraph, which was to read: "(c) compensation due to workers upon termination of their employment". The Workers' members recalled the Committee's decision during the discussion of Article 6 and said that this amendment was designed to align the two provisions. They therefore subamended their amendment to change "compensation" to "severance pay".

200. The Employers' members opposed the amendment, recalling the arguments they had made during the discussion of Article 6. They stressed the fact that when an enterprise closed, the termination of employment could not be seen as being at the initiative of the employer. There was therefore no reason that they should assume the responsibility for something which was not their will.

201. The Government member of France noted that it would be paradoxical if the existence of a guarantee institution could call into question the right of a worker to receive severance pay.

202. The Government member of the United States noted that the protection of severance pay could be considered differently in the context of privilege than in the context of a guarantee by a third-party institution. In the first case, it had to be borne in mind that the assets of insolvent employers were never sufficient to pay their debts; consequently, the size of workers' claims could affect the possibility of other creditors being paid. Such a problem was not posed in the case of protection by a guarantee institution, since it could pay all wage claims within the limits set by its own rules. However, it had to be remembered that if guarantee institutions were called upon to pay severance pay, their resources could be seriously drained. The Government member of Germany added that if the guarantee institution had to pay unlimited amounts of severance pay, this could risk going well beyond what they were able to finance. The Government member of Canada supported the comments made by these two speakers. Although Article 13 provided a possibility of setting limits, each government had the responsibility to set such limits at a level which would be likely to cover a reasonable proportion of the claims which were to be protected. The amendment ran the risk of placing too heavy a burden on the taxpayers who would have to finance guarantee institutions. It was not reasonable to include severance pay in the Convention; it should, however, be included in the Recommendation.

203. The Government member of Austria supported the amendment submitted by the Workers' members. She said it was very important to assist a worker while he or she was seeking employment; it would be good to have the same text in this Article as in Article 6.

204. The Workers' members recalled that there was a great need to protect workers' claims and that severance pay formed a very large part of those claims. It was not a question of establishing a new right, but rather of protecting a claim for something already earned. If doubts existed as to the cost that this could imply for guarantee institutions, Article 13 was there to permit a ceiling to be set. They therefore appealed to the Committee to adopt the amendment.

205. The Employers' members stated that the amendment under discussion was such as to make the Convention more difficult to ratify and even more difficult to apply. There was a need to be realistic on this question. If the Convention were to impose obligations that were to impose obligations that were too great on guarantee institutions, their foundation would be discouraged.

206. The Government member of Japan asked for a clarification concerning severance pay. If a worker quits his or her job voluntarily, after several years, he or she receives a certain amount of money. Would this sum constitute severance pay? If a worker is dismissed at the initiative of the employer, does the employer owe him or her severance pay? A member of the Secretariat replied that the definition of "severance pay" was found in the national law and practice of each member State. In a majority of countries, severance pay was owed following dismissal at the initiative of the employer, but in several countries it was payable, under certain conditions, even in case of an employee's voluntary departure.

207. The Government member of Botswana stressed the importance of severance pay where workers had no other rights, such as in countries where there were still no pensions. He understood that the Employers' members had a legitimate right to be concerned over the financial repercussions of the obligagion to cover pay, but he thought that it would be possible to arrive at a fair balance of interests.

208. The Government member of Brazil supported the amendment. She added that in her country there was a severance pay guarantee fund; it was funded by employer contributions and paid employees severance pay at the time their employment relationship ended.

209. The Government member of Canada appealed to the Committee to adopt reasonable standards. She added that not including severance pay would not prevent countries which could do so from having their guarantee institutions cover this claim.

210. The Chairperson thought that the amendment, as subamended, had been sufficiently discussed. Put to a vote, the amendment was adopted with 89,999 votes in favour, 83,076 against and 7,913 abstentions. It became new subparagraph (d) of this Article.

211. The Committee adopted Article 12 as amended.

Paragraph 1

212. Since no amendment had been submitted, the Committee adopted this paragraph without change.

Paragraph 2

213. In the light of the decision taken by the Committee during its consideration of paragraph 2 of Article 7, the Government members of Canada, Cyprus and the United States withdrew their amendment to replace the phrase "so as to maintain its value" by "in order that it not fall below a socially acceptable level".

214. The Committee adopted paragraph 2 without change. It was understood that, where claims are limited, the obligation to "maintain the value" protected by a guarantee institution should not be interpreted as an obligation that either imposes or prohibits indexation of the amount protected.

215. The Committte adopted Article 13 without change.

PROVISION COMMON TO PARTS II AND III

Article 14

216. The Committee had three amendments before it, one submitted by the Employers' members and a second submitted by the Government members of Japan, Switzerland and the United States, both of which proposed deleting this Article. The third, submitted by the Government members of Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, sought to replace this Article by the following text: "According to the modalities to be provided for by national law and/or practice, the workers and/or their representatives within the enterprise, where such representatives exist, should receive information and where appopriate be consulted on the consequences for the workers of the insolvency proceedings." The Committee decided to examine first the amendments that sought to delete this Article. The amendment that proposed a revised text would be dealt with only if the amendments that sought to delete Article 14 were not adopted.

217. The Employers' members stated that Article 14 had nothing to do with the purpose of the Convention, because it did not deal with the protection of workers' claims in case of the insolvency of their employer. Moreover, the implementation of this Article would obviously be very arduous. Retaining this provision would make it quite probable that the Convention could not be ratified. For this reason, it was preferable to delete the Article.

218. The Government member of the United States also spoke in favour of deleting Article 14. In his opinion, this Article was inappropriate in the Convention. In addition, the text was unclear and imprecise. Who was to provide information about insolvency proceedings? On what subjects should information be given? The Government member of the United States recalled that, as Report IV(2A) had shown, many governments had opposed the inclusion of this Article, and the Office had also drawn up a list of the numerous difficulties in interpretation to which it gave rise. Even if Article 14 only laid down an obligation to inform the workers concerned about the effects of insolvency on their employment, it had to be recalled that this subject was already addressed in another ILO standard, i.e. Article 13 of the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158). Finally, if the text of this Article were to be retained, it should be in the Recommendation and not in the Convention.

219. The Workers' members stated that Article 14 established very important rules for workers, who had an inalienable right to know what the future held for them. Today a large number of enterprises were going bankrupt; it was thus important to mitigate the social effects of bankruptcy. The insolvency of an enterprise deeply affected the workers who were employed there. It was therefore important that they be able to play a role in the enterprise's rehabilitation. When an enterprise was facing bankruptcy, employers should have the duty to share information they had about their financial situation with the workers affected, so that they could prepare for the adjustment in their lives. As a result, the Workers' members opposed the pure and simple deletion of this Article. They none the less recognised that Article 14 raised problems of interpretation. For this reason, they hoped that the Committee would have an occasion to discuss the amendment that sought to replace the text of Article 14, rather than deleting it entirely.

220. The Government member of the United Kingdom said that he had listened very attentively to the statement made by the Workers' members. He was in agreement with the principle according to which workers should be informed. In his country the law granted workers rights to information and consultation in the cases of elimination of jobs and transfer of enterprises. However, a stipulation regarding this right did not have a place in the framework of this Convention, and ran the risk of impeding its ratification. For this reason he was in favour of deleting Article 14. On the other hand, he would not be opposed to putting a reference in the Recommendation, in order to send a message about the importance of information and consultation. His remarks were shared by the Government member of Germany, who stated that he perfectly understood the workers' wish to be informed as quickly as possible about insolvency procedures, but he did not think that such a right should appear in a Convention whose purpose was to protect workers' claims in case of the insolvency of their employer.

221. The Employers' members recalled the importance of discretion when an enterprise found itself in a difficult situation. Any information that was divulged, received or interpreted in an inappropriate way could set off a wave of panic that could seriously compromise the rehabilitation of an enterprise in difficulty. Article 14 in fact posed the danger of making rehabilitation efforts fail, whereas the Preamble of the Convention stressed the importance to be given to the rehabilitation of insolvent enterprises and the safeguarding of employment.

222. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, recalled that the insolvency of an enterprise has serious repercussions for the workers, and that workers' rights to information and consultation were fundamental. It had to be recognised that Article 14, as drafted, was neither flexible enough nor clear enough. It was for this reason that they had submitted an amendment intended to replace the text; they were opposed to its pure and simple deletion.

223. The Chairperson deemed the question to have been sufficiently discussed and put to a vote the amendments that sought to delete this Article. They were adopted by 90,988 votes in favour and 87,032 votes against, with 989 abstentions. As a result, Article 14 was deleted. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, which had proposed revising the text of this Article, did not need to be discussed.

FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 15

224. Since no amendment had been submitted to this Article, the Committee adopted it by consensus. Owing to the deletion of the preceding Article, the present Article was renumbered and became Article 14 of the draft Convention.

225. The Chairperson noted that with the adoption of this Article, the Committee had finished its examination of the draft Convention. She congratulated the Committee on its work.

Consideration of the draft Recommendation contained in Report IV(2B)

226. Before beginning to examine the draft Recommendation, the Employers' members read a statement. They stressed that it had become too much of a habit to consider Recommendations as ambitious texts which regrouped rules that had not found a place in a Convention. The Employers' members disagreed with such an approach. Recommendations were very important standards because they recommended what the International Labour Organisation considered to be suitable rules. Recommendations therefore had considerable weight, since they provided guidance that member States were invited to follow when thew drew up their social policies. In many countries trade unions tended to treat ILO Recommendations not as a goal but as the basis for their demands. For this reason Recommendations should, just like Conventions, set realistic standards. With this concern in mind, the Employers' members thought that the Recommendation should be a cautious text. They were therefore going to oppose many of the provisions of the draft now being examined.

227. The Workers' members recognised that an ILO Recommendation was an important standard. They added, however, that it did not have the same status as a Convention. A Recommendation could be more innovative and more detailed than a Convention, since a Recommendation suggested a path to follow but did not lay down obligations.

Preamble

228. To speed up the Committee's work, the Workers' members withdrew an amendment which had sought to introduce a new paragraph referring to the links between the instrument under discussion, economic difficulties and technological changes experienced in recent years in many countries, and ILO standards on termination of employment.

229. The Employers' members submitted an amendment that proposed inserting the words "and economic" after the word "social" in the third preambular paragraph. The Committee took note that a similar amendment had been included in the Preamble of the draft Convention, and adopted this amendment by consensus.

230. The Committee adopted the Preamble as amended.

I. Definitions and methods of application

Subparagraph (1)

231. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "enterprise's" by "employer's" to make the text correspond to that of Article 1, paragraph 1, of Convention. The Employers' members commented that in their opinion there was no conceptual difference between "employer" and "enterprise". They accepted the amendment, noting that, according to Article 1, paragraph 3, of the draft Convention, it was up to national laws, regulations and practice to determine which of the employer's assets would be subject to insolvency proceedings.

232. The Committee adopted subparagraph (1), as amended, by consensus.

Subparagraph (2)

Clause (a)

233. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to merge this clause with clause (e). The amendment proposed adding the words "or is voluntarily wound up" after "its activities". The Employers' members felt this drafting would be more coherent and logical than that proposed in Report IV(2B) because it would combine into one clause what was currently found in two separate provisions.

234. The Workers' members noted that the amendment in and of itself did not pose any problems for them, but that it had to be read together with several other amendments submitted by the Employers' members to delete clauses (c) and (d). Clauses (a) and (e) expressed two potentially different ideas, and combining these ideas was not necessarily the best solution. Consequently, they opposed the amendment.

235. The Government member of the United States and the Government member of Portugal, the latter speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, supported the amendment, but added that this did not mean they supported the other amendments submitted by the Employers' member to delete clauses (c) and (d). The Workers' members then withdrew their opposition to this amendment, which the Committee adopted by consensus.

236. Clause (a) was adopted as amended.

Clause (b)

237. Since no amendment was submitted, this clause was adopted without change.

Clause (c)

238. The Employers' members submitted an amendment suggesting this clause be deleted. In their opinion, this clause was vague since it did not specify which debts were involved, who should determine the insolvency, or how this should be determined.

239. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They noted that clause (c) set out one way of determining insolvency. They recalled that in the preparation of the Office Report V(2) prior to the first discussion, many Government members had been in favour of the text that the Employers' members wanted to delete.

240. The Government member of the United States asked if a situation could arise which was covered by clause (c) but not by clause (b). The Government member of Swaziland asked why clause (b) spoke of "the opening of insolvency proceedings", and clause (c) of "a worker's claim arising out of employment" where "the employer has no assets". A member of the Secretariat explained that in certain countries the courts refused to open bankruptcy proceedings when the employer's assets were insufficient to cover even the costs of the proceedings. This situation would come under clause (b). In other countries, guarantee institutions would pay workers' claims once it had been legally determined that the employer's assets were insufficient to pay the claims in question. The decision to pay could be taken even though insolvency proceedings had not been instituted. This situation was covered in clause (c).

241. The Government member of the United States commented that the situation described in clause (c) could mean that guarantee institutions might be called on to pay workers' claims in enterprises that had not yet closed. This possible result seemed unsound because it could mean that a guarantee institution would be subsidising insolvent enterprises. They did not think guarantee institutions should function as a rehabilitation institutions. The Workers' members stated that in their opinion the sole intention of clause (c) was to protect workers' claims. In no way did it imply that guarantee institutions should play any role whatsoever in rehabilitating enterprises.

242. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, commented that this clause supplemented Article 1, paragraph 2, of the draft Convention and provided useful guidelines. She was opposed to the amendment. The Employers' members insisted that the wording of this clause was too ambiguous. The Government member of Canada shared the view of the Government member of the United States that guarantee institutions should not pay subsidies to insolvent enterprises. However, that issue was covered by Paragraph 5. Therefore she was in favour of keeping the text of this clause.

243. Following this discussion, the Employers' members withdrew their amendment. They wished to stress that, as the Secretariat had already explained, the insufficiency of the employers' assets should be established by judicial proceedings. The Committee adopted clause (c) without change.

Clause (d)

244. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this clause. They stated that it created confusion between the enterprise's assets and the personal assets of the employer. All references to personal assets should be the result of national laws and regulations. The confusing wording of clause (d) could discourage the establishment of small family enterprises.

245. The Workers' members, disagreeing entirely with the Employers' members' interpretation of this clause, opposed this amendment. Clause (d) was sufficiently flexible and could be applied to many existing situations in different countries. In particular, it could be applied to claims for sums owed by employers to household employees and other domestic workers.

246. The Government member of the United States thought that the Workers' members were correct in their analysis. In the legislation of a number of countries, both the employers' assets and the assets of the enterprise were subject to the proceedings. Clause (d) addressed these types of situations.

247. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, also opposed the amendment. She did not see any reason to delete clause (d), and added that subparagraph (2) enumerated a list of examples and guidelines that were very useful for member States.

248. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment. Consequently, the Committee adopted clause (d) without change.

Clause (e)

249. Since clause (e) had been merged with clause (a), clause (e) was deleted.

250. The Committee adopted subparagraph (2) as amended. The Committee wishes its report to recall that this subparagraph applied to employees of state enterprises when these enterprises were sufficiently autonomous to be subject to liquidation. Such state enterprises were enterprises under the meaning of this Recommendation.

New subparagraph

251. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add a new subparagraph that would read: "The extent to which an employer's assets are subject to the proceedings referred to in subparagraph (1) shuld be determined by national laws, regulations and practice". They recalled that the Committee has adopted a similar text when considering Article 1 of the draft Convention; therefore, they trusted that the phrase would also be adopted in the Recommendation.

252. The Workers' members supported the amendment, which the Committee adopted by consensus. It became new subparagraph (3) of Paragraph 1.

253. The Committee adopted Paragraph 1 as amended.

Paragraph 2

254. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the entire end of the sentence after the words "national practice". They pointed out that when considering Article 2 of the draft Convention, the Committee had adopted a similar amendment. They proposed this amendment so that the next of the Recommendation would correspond to that of the Convention.

255. The Workers' members supported the amendment, which the Committee accepted by consensus.

256. The Committee adopted Paragraph 2 as amended.

II. CLAIMS PROTECTED BY MEANS OF A PRIVILEGE

PROTECTED CLAIMS

257. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "should" by "could" in the introductory phrase of this Paragraph. In their view, the use of the word "could" would introduce greater flexibility into the Paragraph, and was more appropriate for a Recommendation. Referring to draft Paragraphs 10 and 11 of the proposed Recommendation, which used the word "might", they proposed that the Drafting Committee should decide whether "might" or "could" would be more appropriate in this Paragraph.

258. The Workers' members opposed the amendment and proposed a subamendment. It would retain the word "should" with respect to clauses (a) to (e) inclusive, and insert between clauses (e) and (f) the phrase: "The protection afforded by a privilege could cover the following claims:" Thus, the word "could" would apply to clauses (f) through (i). In the opinion of the Workers' members, this change would incorporate in part the principle set out in the amendment proposed by the Employers' members, and give the Recommendation the kind of flexibility the latter sought.

259. The Government member of Canada supported the subamendment since she felt that it went some way to addressing the concerns of many countries.

260. The Employers' members questioned whether a decision on this subamendment concerning the introductory phrase would preclude later modifications of the clauses that followed, namely (a) through (i). The Chairperson, confirmed that, even after taking a decision on the introductory clause, the following clauses could be disccussed one by one. The Employers' members then expressed their opposition to the subamendment. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, supported the subamendment on the assumption that the other amendments proposed with respect to the clauses in this Paragraph could then be examined one by one.

261. The Government member of Botswana requested clarification on the meaning of the words "shall", "should" and "could". In response, a member of the Secretariat stated that the term "shall", used in Conventions, set out an obligation, while "should" referred to what the Conference was recommending. "Could" or "might" refers to what a government could keep in mind when drafting or revising legislation, but it was not a normative recommendation on the part of the Conference.

262. After having carefully listened to the discussion, the Employers' members withdrew their opposition to the subamendment, on the understanding that its adoption would not prejudge discussions on the following clauses. Consequently, the subamendment was adopted by consensus.

Clause (a)

263. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "12 months" by "six months". They recalled that many countries looked to ILO Recommendations when they drafted or amended legislation; they therefore stressed that the Recommendations should be realistic so that they could be applied throughout the world. They were of the view that the protection of a privilege for 12 months was not realistic; six months would be more realistic and easier to apply for the ILO member States. They also recalled that, in the preparatory reports (Report IV(1) of 1991) many member States, in particular those in the European Community, had taken a similar position. The Workers' members, on the other hand, felt that the period of 12 months was realistic, and pointed out that the clauses formed a list of things to be considered, and the Recommendation did not have binding power. They also recalled that this clause came out of the original wording from Report V(2) proposed by the Office.

264. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, stated that the Employers' members were right in recalling that, in 1991, the Government members from the European Community had sought the reduction of the period from 12 months to six months. However, their proposal in this respect had been rejected. Therefore, she declared that they would respect that decision, and support the Office text this year.

265. The amendment was put to a vote and rejected by 52,470 votes against, 35,145 in favour, with 2,475 abstentions. Consequently, clause (a) of Paragraph 3 was adopted without change.

Clause (b)

266. The Workers' members had submitted an amendment to replace this clause in the Office text by the following: "(b) holiday pay and other types of paid absence, pertaining to work done during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year;" However, they withdrew it in favour of an amendment submitted by the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, which sought to replace clause (b) by the following: "(b) holiday pay pertaining to work done during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year; (c) other types of paid absence, end-of-year and other bonuses provided for by national laws or regulations, collective agreements or individual contracts of employment, relating to a prescribed period which shall not be less than 12 months prior to the insolvency or the termination of the employment;". The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, stated that the objective of the amendment was to harmonise paragraph 3 of the Recommendation with Articles 6 and 12 of the Convention in so far as paid holidays were concerned, while retaining the period of 12 months, as in clause (a), for other paid absences. The Workers' members offered their full support to the amendment.

267. The Employers' members agreed with the amendment to the extent that its purpose was to harmonise this Paragraph with Article 6 and 12 of the Convention. However, they had certain difficulty with clause (c), and sought clarification as to the types of paid absences that were covered. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Members States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, stated that the purpose of new clause (c) in their amendment was to cover all types of paid absence during 12 months prior to the insolvency or the termination of employment in the same way as the claims protected in clause (a). She specified that the purpose was not to protect absences that lasted 12 months. The Employers' members were satisfied with this explanation and supported the amendment.

268. The amendment was then adopted by consensus. All the following clauses consequently shifted to the following letters. For example, (c) in the original text became (d), etc.

Clauses (d) through (j)

269. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete clauses (d) through (j) [(c) through (i) in the Office text]. They argued that there were not sufficient funds to grant protection to all types of claims; therefore, the privilege should be limited to the most important claims. The more claims that were protected, the less money there would be available to protect them.

270. The Workers' members recalled the earlier request of the Employers' members for separate discussions on each of the clauses in paragraph 3, and stressed that each clause should be examined individually. They pointed out that the clauses formed a list which could or should be enacted by particular countries, and as such it did not entail any extra payment. They also recalled that paragraph 3 was subject to limits on the amount of claims, set under paragraph 4. The Government member of Canada opposed the amendment, stating that it was useful to have a complete list. The Government member of Botswana also opposed it, stating that taking anything out of the list would not be useful.

271. The Government member of the United States supported the argument of the Workers' members concerning individual examination of clauses. The Employers' members stated that they continued to have serious concerns regarding the breadth of coverage proposed under Paragraph 3. Experience from the various sittings of the Committee had made it obvious what the outcomes of tripartite committee votes would be, and the Employers' members would therefore withdraw their amendment rather than have the Committee and the Secretariat go through a vote when the government delegates' voting pattern was so predictable. In no way should the withdrawal of the amendment be interpreted as any abandonment of the Employers' members concerns or of the ideas inspiring the amendment.

272. The Committee then proceeded to examine each of the amendments submitted by the Employers' members to delete individual clauses. They sought to delete clause (d) [formerly (c)], arguing that an employer who became insolvent would not be able to give notice of termination of employment because, by giving workers a warning of the impending insolvency, the danger of its materialising would increase. The Workers' members opposed the amendment stating that it was useful to have it in the list from which countries could choose. Having listened carefully to the discussions, the Employers' members withdrew this amendment as it had failed to attract support among the Government members. The clause was adopted without change.

273. The Employers' members then submitted an amendment to delete clause (e) [formerly (d)], arguing that, while a similar clause in Article 6 of the Convention dealt only with severance pay, this clause in the Recommendation covered all types of payments due to workers upon termination of their employment; it covered not only compensation for work done but also compensation for loss of jobs. In their view, this clause would lead to the diminution of the assets of the enterprise, resulting in less money being available in the event of insolvency.

274. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, arguing that the list of clauses in Paragraph 3 set out areas where workers were likely to have claims, and that all these areas should be considered. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, also opposed the amendment, arguing that all types of compensation due to workers upon termination of their employment should be taken into account.

275. The Employers' members stressed that they were not opposed to the coverage of severance pay by a privilege, as provided for in Article 6, subparagraph (c) of the Convention. They then proposed a subamendment to replace the text of (e) [formerly (d)] of Paragraph 3 of the Recommendation by the text adopted in Article 6, subparagraph (c) of the Convention: "severance pay due to workers upon termination of their employment". The Workers' members opposed the subamendment, arguing that the claims protected in Article 6 of the Convention had been reduced from a compensation due upon termination of employment to only one form of such compensation, i.e. severance pay. It was important for the Recommendation to spell out other forms of compensation due upon termination of employment that should be protected. They pointed out that, under Paragraph 4, limitations could be set to the amount of the claims.

276. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, opposed both the amendment and the subamendment, arguing that all types of compensation due to workers upon termination of their employment should be protected. The Government member of Gabon supported the argument of the Government member of Portugal, but sought the deletion of the word "unfair" from the clause, arguing that, in his country, legislation granted severance pay not only in cases of unfair dismissal but also in cases of justifiable dismissal. However, his subamendment was not seconded.

277. The subamendment was put to a vote, and rejected by 54,450 votes against, 33,660 in favour, with 990 abstentions. The Employers' members then withdrew the amendment. Clause (e) [formerly (d)] was adopted without change.

278. The Employers' members then submitted an amendment to delete clause (f) [formerly (e)], arguing that the compensation dealt with by this clause should be the subject of national legislation and not of an international instrument. The amount involved was very important, and if a privilege was granted to it, there might not be any money left for satisfying other privileges. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, arguing that compensation for occupational accidents and diseases was very important to workers, and their exclusion from the list of workers' claims would have extremely negative effects. In view of the little support which their amendment had received from the Committee, the Employers' members withdrew it. Clause (f) [formerly (e)] was adopted without modification.

279. The Employers' members also submitted an amendment to delete clause (g) [formerly (f)], arguing that it did not so much deal with the protection of workers' claims as with the protection of social security institutions. Thus, it would create complications in relation to the texts in the Convention concerning the relationship between workers' claims and those of the State and the social security systems. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, pointing out that the clause was now covered by a new introductory phrase using "could" (or "might") instead of "should", and was therefore very mild. They stressed that its purpose was to eliminate the possibility that workers might lose their coverage by, for example, health insurance.

280. The Government member of Canada sought clarification as to how this clause (and by extension new clauses (h) and (i)) would be interpreted so as not to conflict with Article 8 of the Convention. A member of the Secretariat stated that, although he could not give an official interpretation of the possible relationship between Article 8 of the Convention and this provision, it might be possible to read the two provisions as being in harmony. He pointed out that Article 8 of the Convention referred to the rank of workers' claims, while this provision listed a number of claims which would be assimilated to workers' claims.

281. The Employers' members pointed out that this clause gave privilege to contributions which were to be claimed not by workers but by social security institutions, and therefore should not be in the Recommendation. The Workers' members recalled that this clause had already been discussed extensively in the previous year, and a compromise had been reached to the effect that social security contributions would be protected workers' claims only when workers could lose social security benefits through the non-payment by the employer of the contributions. They were of the opinion that all possible efforts should be made to avoid workers' suffering for such a cause.

282. The Government member of the United States stated that, although this clause would give him some concern if included in the Convention, because it would raise problems of interpretation, he could support it in the Recommendation because it did not impose any obligation on the member States, and only set out principle that whatever way the member State would like to construct the privilege, workers should not be adversely affected. The Employers' members disagreed with this view, and repeated that an international instrument concerning workers' claims should not recognise privileges to social security institutions.

283. In view of the limited support which this amendment was obtaining in the Committee, the Employers' members withdrew this amendment, on the condition that the Committee's report clearly indicated that a privilege was being granted to the claims of social security institutions, not to those of workers. They also withdrew another amendment seeking to repeal clause (h) [formerly (g)]. Clause (g) [formerly (f)], as well as clause (h) [formerly (g)] were adopted without modification.

284. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Goverment members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, declared that she supported the text of clause (g) [formerly (f)] of Paragraph 3 of the Recommendation in view of the change in the introductory phrase from "should" to "could" (or "might"). The word "could" provided the flexibility which was indispensable for the member States to be able to choose the method which suited their interests best.

285. The Employers' members then submitted an amendment to delete clause (j) [formerly (i)], arguing that while the Committee had agreed that there should be a limit to the amount of workers' claims, this clause did not do so, as it only referred to payments due to workers prior to insolvency. The Workers' members stressed the importance of this clause in practice. They referred to the example of women discriminated against in employment, and receiving lower salaries than men; these women were obliged to resort to adjudication or arbitration proceedings in order to obtain equal pay. They further argued that, in the event of the insolvency, the claims of these women should be protected by a privilege, because otherwise, they would be unable to satisfy their claims. The Workers' members therefore rejected the amendment. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, supported the amendment.

286. The Government member of Canada, although not enthusiastic about clause (j), recognised its importance to workers. Therefore, she proposed the following subamendment to replace clause (j): "claims enumerated in clauses (a) to (f) that have been awarded to workers through an arbitration or adjudication, regardless of the time-limit mentioned, provided the award has been determined within twelve months prior to the insolvency." She argued that the Recommendation did not impose obligations upon member States, and this subamendment was reasonable. The Workers' members supported this subamendment.

287. The Government member of Czechoslovakia stated that clause (j) was superfluous and it would create complications, in particular in the absence of final judicial decisions.

288. The subamendment was put to a vote, and rejected by 43,065 votes against, 41,085 votes in favour, with 5,455 abstentions.

289. The Workers' members, expressing surprise at the rejection of the subamendment, appealed to Government members to reject the amendment submitted by the Employers' members, stressing the crucial importance for workers of the subject dealt with in this clause, and expressing willingness to open discussions aimed at finding a satisfactory solution on this subject. They also pointed out that the result of the vote on the subamendment showed that the various points of view were similar and further discussions on this issue were desirable.

290. The amendment was put to a vote, and rejected by 45,045 votes against, 42,075 votes in favour, with 2,424 abstentions.

291. The Employers' members deplored the fact that the Committee opted for an inflexible Paragraph 3, overloaded with all types of claims which workers could acquire. They recalled that they had submitted the following amendment to replace clauses (c) to (i) in the original lettering: "(c) other workers' claims as considered appropriate according to national laws and regulations." However, in view of the certainty of its rejection by the Committee, they withdrew it.

292. The Workers' members then submitted an amendment to replace clause (j) [formerly (i)] by the following text, inserted as a separate subparagraph: "(2) Claims enumerated in clauses (a) to (i) [formerly (h)] of subparagraph (1) that have been awarded to a worker in his or her employment through an adjudication or arbitration, should be covered by the privilege regardless of the time-limit mentioned, provided the award has been determined within a period beginning twelve months before the insolvency and ending with the closing of creditor repayment operations."

293. The Employers' members were of the view that this amendment promised everything, granting all workers' claims a super-privilege at the expense of investment and employment. They stated that they wanted to remain realistic and therefore opposed it.

294. The Government member of the United States drew attention of the Workers' members to the wording of subparagraph (2) of their amendment. The limit provided, in his view, should be a period beginning twelve months before the opening of the insolvency proceedings. He stated that, as the amendment was drafted, it was impossible to know what the totality of claims would be. Therefore, he proposed a subamendment to end the subparagraph after the word "insolvency", and to delete "ending with the closing of creditor repayment operations". The Workers' members accepted the subamendment. The Government member of Australia supported the subamendment, which seemed to her necessary to eliminate any doubt about this privilege. However, she added that she could not see how in her country these claims could be refused once they were awarded by arbitration. The Government member of Canada supported the amendment as subamended, arguing that a clause to this effect was useful where the privilege for workers' claims was limited in time.

295. The amendment as subamended was put to a vote, and adopted by 43,065 in favour and 34,155 against, with 10,375 abstentions. Paragraph 3 was adopted as amended.

LIMITATIONS

Paragraph 4

296. In the absence of any amendment, the Committee adopted this Paragraph by consensus.

CLAIMS WHICH FALL DUE AFTER THE INSOLVENCY PROCEEDINGS HAVE BEEN OPENED

Paragraph 5

297. In the absence of any amendment, the Committee adopted this Paragraph by consensus.

ASSETS IN RESPECT OF WHICH THE PRIVILEGE MAY BE EXERCISED

Paragraph 6

298. The Employers' members sumbitted an amendment to add the words "according to Paragraph 1, subparagraph (3), of this Recommendation" after the words "insolvent employer". They recalled that during the previous sitting the Committee had adopted an amendment to add a subparagraph (3) to the definition on "insolvency" (in Paragraph 1 of the Recommendation), stipulating that national laws, regulations and practice can limit the extent to which an employer's assets are subject to insolvency proceedings.

299. The Workers' members recalled that they had prepared an amendment to this Paragraph to delete the word "unsecured". However, after serious consideration they had concluded that Paragraph 6 was unnecessary. They therefore proposed, in a subamendment to the amendment of the employers' members, deletion of the entire Paragraph. In this regard they quoted a number of comments from Report IV(2A) questioning the need for Paragraph 6, the text of which, it should be remembered, had resulted from an amendment adopted by the Conference in 1991, which had modified the conclusions proposed by the Office. Part of the Paragraph merely stated that privileged claims were claims that should be paid before non-privileged claims, which was a tautology that added nothing new to Article 5 of the Convention. According to another part of the text, the privilege accorded workers' claims should be exercised on the unsecured assets of the insolvent employer. However, in certain countries of Latin America, Africa and Europe workers' claims protected by a privilege should, at least in part, be paid before secured claims, and in other countries where receivership procedures existed workers' claims protected by a privilege may, in full or in part, be paid out of the assets subject to a floating charge, before the debenture holders.

300. The Employers' members did not accept the proposal to delete Paragraph 6. They considered this Paragraph to be very important because it limited the types of assets which would be subject to the privilege and thus protected the rights of the employer's other creditors, in particular those with secured assets.

301. The Government member of the United States noted that this Paragraph contained the only provision in the texts under discussion which referred to the relationship between workers' claims and secured claims. He wondered what effect its deletion would have. A member of the Secretariat commented that this issue could be addressed within the framework of Article 1, paragraph 3, of the Convention as well as in Paragraph 2, subparagraph 3, of the Recommendation. The draft Convention and draft Recommendation that were being discussed laid down rules regarding workers' claims, but the extent to which the employer's assets would be subject to the privilege was left to national laws and regulations.

302. The Government member of Canada thought that Paragraph 6 created confusion and she was in favour of deleting it. The Government member of the United Kingdom shared this view. He considered that the determination of the assets to be involved should come under national laws, regulations and practice. The Government member of France, however, wanted the Paragraph to be retained, but in his opinion it could be improved by removing the reference to "unsecured" assets.

303. The Employers' members stated that Paragraph 6 did not seem confusing to them. They recognised none the less that the determination of the assets to be affected by the privilege should be done by national laws, regulations and practice, in conformity with Article 2 of the Convention, and they therefore accepted the deletion of this Paragraph.

304. Consequently, the Committee decided to delete Paragraph 6. As a result of this decision it was not necessary to consider the above-mentioned amendment submitted by the Workers' members to delete the word "unsecured".

RANK OF PRIVILEGE

Paragraph 7

305. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace this Paragraph by the following text. "7. National laws or regulations should give workers' claims a higher rank of privilege than most other privileged claims". They explained that the aim of their amendment was to retain the same wording in the Recommendation as that found in Article 8 of the draft Convention, as set out in Report IV(2B).

306. The Workers' members recalled that Article 8 of the draft in Report IV(2B) had been amended by the Committee. They therefore submitted a subamendment to replace Paragraph 7 by a text similar to the one the Committee has already approved for the Convention.

307. The Government member of the United States noted that it was meaningless just to repeat in the Recommendation what had already been said in the Convention. Since a Recommendation supplements a Convention, there was no need to repeat everything that had already been stated in the Convention. Instead, a Recommendation should encourage member States to go beyond the provisions of the Convention. For this reason, he submitted a subamendment to delete this Paragraph, and the Employers' members supported his proposal.

308. The Workers' members replied that they did not necessarily agree with this reasoning. There was nothing to prohibit reproducing in the Recommendation a standard that was already in the Convention that it supplemented. Quite the contrary, this was sometimes very useful when a member State did not ratify a Convention, but decided to follow the suggestions put forward in the Recommendation. However, they acknowledged that in this particular case Paragraph 7 could be deleted since there was already a standard in the Convention which put workers' claims above most other claims.

309. The Committee decided by consensus to delete Paragraph 7.

ACCELERATED PAYMENT PROCEDURES

Subparagraph (1)

310. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "to ensure that the claims are paid" and replace them by "which, without prejudice to the rights of the other creditors, permits the payment of all or part of these claims". They explained that according to the draft Recommendation, the way the accelerated payment procedure would work in practice would give workers' claims a super-privilege at the expense of other privileged creditors. This was all the more regrettable since according to clauses (f) and (g) of Paragraph 3, it was not only the workers who benefited from this de facto super-privilege but also the social security institutions which could assimilate their claims to workers' claims. Their amendment clarified the text and protected the interests of other creditors. It should be read together with another amendment they had submitted concerning subparagraph (3) to specify the amount of the privileged claim that should benefit from an accelerated payment procedure.

311. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They stated that the amendment did not clarify the text, nor was it favourable to workers. Workers should be paid as quickly as possible for work they had already done, and their claims should have priority over those of other creditors.

312. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment. He noted that it merely stipulated that the accelerated payment procedure should not prejudice the interests of other creditors, which in his opinion was a useful clarification. The Government member of Canada supported the remarks of the previous speaker. She added that the amendment in no way went against the principle of paying workers' claims quickly. She was in favour of this principle and thought it should be encouraged. However, this should not be done at the expense of creditors who could benefit from a higher rank of privilege than that enjoyed by workers.

313. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, opposed the amendment. She felt that the proposal made by the Employers' members was more restrictive than the original text, and did not make the text any clearer.

314. The Employers' members, stating that they had noticed that only two Government members had supported their amendment, announced that they would withdraw it. The Committee therefore adopted subparagraph (1) without change.

Subparagraph (2)

315. In the absence of any amendment, the Committee adopted this subparagraph without change.

Subparagraph (3)

316. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace this subparagraph by the following: "The accelerated payment procedure should cover a minimum amount of the claim protected by a privilege, to be fixed by national laws, regulations or practice." They explained that, as stated earlier, the principle of accelerated payment had been defined rather vaguely. Their amendment left it up to national laws and regulations to set more precise limits. In their opinion, this would not restrict workers' rights.

317. The Workers' members opposed the amendment because they thought it was recommending that member States should limit the amount of the claim protected by privilege. They added that this issue was already governed by Paragraph 4 and did not need to be repeated in Paragraph 8.

318. The Government member of the United States opposed the amendment. He thought that the original text was clearer than the amendment. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community represented in the Committee, also opposed the amendment. The Employers' members then withdrew it.

319. The Committee adopted subparagraph (3) without change. It then adopted Paragraph 8 without change. Since Paragraphs 6 and 7 had been deleted, this Paragraph was renumbered as Paragraph 6.

III. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS BY A GUARANTEE INSTITUTION

SCOPE

Paragraph 9

320. With no amendment having been submitted, this Paragraph was adopted by consensus. Given the deletion of Paragraphs 6 and 7, Paragraph 9 became Paragraph 7.

OPERATING PRINCIPLES

Paragraph 10

Clause (a)

321. The Employers' members submitted an amendment designed to delete the words "of the employer". They stated their agreement that guarantee institutions should enjoy administrative, financial and legal independance, as provided by clause (a). The phrase "of the employer" was confusing, however. To which employer did it refer – the insolvent employer or an employer who made regular contributions to these institutions? The Employers' amendments removed this ambiguity, because the text would henceforth specify that guarantee institutions should be completely independent.

322. The Workers' members said that clause (a) referred to the insolvent employer. The text posed no problems for them and they thought that guarantee institutions should be independent of employers. They therefore opposed the amendment.

323. The Employers' members then subamended their amendment. Instead of deleting the words "of the employer" they proposed retaining the original text and adding the word "insolvent" before "employer", as suggested by the Workers' members.

324. The Government member of the United States was opposed to the amendment. He thought that if it were accepted, an employer could manage a guarantee institution up to the time of insolvency, after which there would have to be a procedure for withdrawal. Nor could the speaker support the Employers' members' original amendment, to provide that a guarantee institution had to be independent of all supervisory authority, since that would not be possible in many countries.

325. The Employers' members commented that everyone seemed to agree with the principle that guarantee institutions should be autonomous institutions that were independent of the insolvent employer. They then offered another subamendment to add "individual" before the word "employer". The Workers' members opposed this subamendment as well. It specified that the individual employer should not intervene in the operation of the guarantee institution, but it said nothing about intervention by representatives of the employer or employers' associations. They preferred keeping the original text, since in their view it stated that there should be no employer interference in the administration of guarantee institutions.

326. The Employers' members noted that the Committee seemed to be in agreement on the fact that clause (a) referred to the insolvent employer; they then withdrew their amendment.

327. Clause (a) was adopted without change. The Committee adopted, without change, clauses (b), (c) and (d), to which no amendments had been submitted.

New clause

328. The Employers' members submitted an amendment proposing the addition of a new clause (e), to read as follows: "the funds managed by guarantee institutions, other than those from general revenues, must only be used for the purpose for which they were collected". They recalled that they had proposed a similar amendment in the discussion of the draft Convention. A number of Government members had said at that time that they could not support it for inclusion in the Convention, but that they would not be against its inclusion in the Recommendation.

329. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community represented in the Committee, with the exception of the Government member of Germany, stated that they could not accept the amendment. In a number of countries, the funds of guarantee institutions were combined with the resources of other institutions in a general budget. This made it very difficult, if not impossible, to identify the funds collected for the purpose of paying benefits to workers in case of the insolvency of their employer.

330. The Government member of Canada said that the amendment laid down a good principle and, since it appeared in a Recommendation, did not create an obligation. She could therefore support the amendment. The Government member of the United States also found the amendment acceptable and appealed to the Workers' members to support it as well. The Government member of Germany said that he saw no problem with the amendment, since it would appear in the Recommendation.

331. The Employers' members then subamended their amendment, to replace "must" by "should" and then "should" by "could". The Workers' members said that they could accept this proposal.

332. The Chairperson stated that a majority in the Committee had accepted the amendment and delcared its adoption by consensus. The amendment, as subamended, became new clause (e) of this Paragraph.

333. The Committee then adopted Paragraph 10 as amended. With the deletion of Paragraphs 6 and 7, Paragraph 10 became Paragraph 8.

Paragraph 11

334. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "might" by "should" in the introductory phrase. They argued that the guarantee should cover the claims listed in this paragraph. However, with a view to bringing this Paragraph in line with Paragraph 3 of the Recommendation, they proposed a subamendment to their own amendment to the effect that, in addition to this change, the following phrase should be inserted between clauses (e) and (f) to begin a new subparagraph: "The guarantee could cover the following claims:". The Government member of Japan stated that the guarantee institutions should have a solid financial foundation, so the claims guaranteed should be limited; for the same reason, the coverage guaranteed in this paragraph should be limited in order to ensure flexibility in its application. He therefore opposed the use of "should" in this Paragraph. The Government member of the United States, on the other hand, pointed out that the use of the word "should" in a Recommendation would not make the provision mandatory but only recommendatory. Therefore he had no objection to the amendment as subamended.

335. The Employers' members asserted that Paragraph 11 could not be assimilated to Paragraph 3, because the former dealt with guarantee institutions while the latter dealt with privilege. With guarantee institutions, there was certainty about the payment of claims, which was not the case with privilege. In their opinion, if a guarantee institution were to guarantee all the claims listed in this Paragraph, it would have to have even greater funds than the largest in the country. They then submitted their own subamendment to the amendment to use the word "should" with respect to clauses (a) and (b), and "could" with respect to other clauses. They argued that if the Committee was realistic, it should adopt their subamendment because the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Workers' members would substantially weaken the guarantee institutions.

336. The Workers' members disagreed with the arguments of the Employers' members and referred to a survey carried out by the Office in preparing Report V(2) (1991), which showed that guarantee institutions often covered workers' claims above and beyond those claims covered by a privilege. They were of the view that there was no reason for weakening the provisions of this Paragraph in comparison with those in Paragraph 3 simply because they concerned guarantee institutions.

337. After further discussions on this issue, and noting the scarce support which their subamendment was receiving in the Committee, the Employers' members withdrew it. The discussion then centred on the amendment submitted by the Workers' members, as subamended by them. The Government member of Canada stated that in view of the discussion which had taken place regarding Article 12 of the Convention and Paragraph 3 of the Recommendation, it was logical to adopt the amendment as subamended.

338. It was put to a vote, and adopted by 30,108 votes in favour and 924 against, with 24,024 abstentions.

Clause (a)

339. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace "three months" by "six months", recalling that Paragraph 3, clause (a), had set a minimum period of 12 months with respect to privilege, and arguing that the minimum of six months was reasonable for the protection of the same categories of claims by guarantee institutions. The Employers' members opposed this amendment, noting that workers were putting the financial equilibrium of guarantee institutions in danger by claiming more and more from them. They argued that an excessive financial burden on guarantee institutions, which implied a heavy financial burden upon enterprises, would have a negative impact on investment and employment. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, agreed with the opinion of the Employers' members and opposed the amendment, preferring the Office text. The Government member of Canada, referring to an attempt by her Government in 1991 to set up a guarantee institution that would have protected workers' claims for six months, stated that six months was, in her opinion, a reasonable limit to serve as an example. She pointed out that the Recommendation was not binding on member States in any event.

340. The Employers' members pointed out that the "three months" to which Paragraph 11, clause (a), referred was a minimum upon which member States could improve. In their opinion, the fact that a country already satisfied the conditions set out in that provisions was not a reason for supporting the amendment. The Workers' members in response to the Employers' members, stressed that they were not asking for an expansion of entitlements but for the protection of the rights already acquired through work. They pointed out that, through this amendment, they were asking for only 50 per cent of the period protected by privilege, which was 12 months. In their opinion, the protection of compensation for a minimum of six months by guarantee institutions would encourage workers to continue to work, because they were sure to receive compensation. They were also of the view that, if the period of three months were retained, no worker would work after that period, because the guarantee institution would no longer cover them. However, nothing the scarce support their amendment was receiving from the Committee, the Workers' members submitted a subamendment to their own amendment, by substituting the words "four months" for "six months".

341. The Government member of the United States disagreed with the arguments put forward by the Workers' members, and referred to the experience of the Pension Benefit Guarantee Corporation in the United States. Enterprises sometimes stopped paying pension contributions in periods of financial difficulties, and used the money for other purposes, creating a situation of virtual collusion between workers and employers to put a burden on the institution. He stressed that this should not be the purpose of this clause. The Workers' members, in responding to the comment made by the Government member of the United States, pointed out that the effects produced by the operation of the Pension Benefit Guarantee Corporation in the United States were not at the behest of the workers nor of their leaders. However, in order to expedite the work of the Committee, they withdrew their amendment. Clause (a) was consequently adopted without modifications.

342. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace clause (b) by the following: "(b) holiday pay and other types of paid absence, pertaining to work done during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year;". They explained that the purpose of this amendment was to harmonise this clause with Paragraph 3, subparagraph (1), clause (b).

343. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, proposed the following subamendment to replace clause (b): "(b) holiday pay pertaining to work done during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of employment occurred, and in the preceding year; (c) end-of-year and other bonuses provided for by national laws or regulations, collective agreements or individual contracts of employment, relating to a prescribed period which shall not be less than 12 months prior to the insolvency or the termination of the employment; (d) other types of paid absence pertaining to a prescribed period which shall not be less than three months prior to the insolvency or the termination of the employment;".

344. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, explained the main features of this subamendment. The content of clause (b) was the same as that in Paragraph 3, which had already been adopted; clause (c) was also identical to the provision in Paragraph 3 providing for a minimum period of protection of 12 months, the only difference between the two clauses existing in the exclusion of "other types of paid absence" from clause (c) in this subamendment. As to clause (d), Article 12 of the Convention provided for the same period of protection for wages and other types of paid absence; clause (a) of this paragraph provided for the minimum period of three months; therefore, other types of paid absence should be protected for the same minimum period as wages in this paragraph as well, namely three months. The only difference between clauses (c) and (d) was in the lengths of the period of protection. Both the Workers' members and the Empoyers' members accepted the subamendment.

345. Clause (b), as amended, was consequently adopted by consensus. This meant that the lettering of the remaining clauses changed, from (c) in the original text to (e), etc.

Clauses (e) to (k) [formerly (c) to (i)]

346. The Workers' members recalled that the remaining clauses were all duplications of clauses in Paragraph 3 and proposed that, in order to expedite the work of the Committee, they should all be adopted, with the exception of the last clause, for which they were submitting an amendment to replace it with the last clause of Paragraph 3. The Employers' members rejected the proposal, stating that privilege for workers' claims should not be confused with guarantee institutions. As the Workers' members' proposal was not unanimously supported, the Committee had no choice but to proceed with the consideration of the amendments proposed.

347. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to delete clauses (e), (g), (h), (i), (j) and (k) [formerly (c), (e), (f), (g), (h), and (i)]. He recognised the desirability of protecting a wide range of workers' claims under guarantee institutions, but expressed concern about the possible adverse effects of protecting certain types of claims, and explained the reasons with respect to a few of them. First, payments in lieu of notice of termination of employment was not a type of payment regularly paid every month; therefore, there was a risk of abuse by workers and employers, who might collude before the insolvency to put the burden on the guarantee institution. With regard to compensation in respect of occupational accidents and diseases, the financial burden on guarantee institutions might become so great as to threaten their financial basis. Likewise, although monthly wages and severance pay were protected up to a fixed maximum amount, it happened that the guarantee institution in his country had to pay US$32 million a year, thus threatening the foundation of the institution. The Employers' members supported the amendment, but the Workers' members opposed it. After further discussions, the Government member of Japan withdrew the amendment.

Clause (e) [formerly (c)]

348. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this clause, arguing that it was perverse in that employers would never be able to give workers notice of termination of employment in cases of insolvency because they could not know the date of the insolvency in advance. In their opinion, this clause would enable workers to obtain unjusticiable benefits from guarantee institutions in the form of payments in lieu of notice, since not only would such notice be impossible to give, but also termination of employment in insolvency would not occur due to the will of the employer. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, pointing out that this clause dealt with payments due, and employers would not have to pay anything if the workers were owed nothing. They thought this clause should be kept in the list of claims to be protected. After further discussions which showed that the amendment was not supported by a majority of Government members, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment. Clause (e) [formerly (c)] was adopted by consensus without modification.

Clause (f) [formerly (d)]

349. The Employer's members submitted an amendment to delete this clause. They defended the amendment, arguing that this clause was another example of perversity because there was no unfair dismissal in the case of insolvency as the termination of employment was not at the initiative of the employer. They then proposed a subamendment to their own amendment, to replace this clause by a text identical with that in clause (d) of Article 12 of the Convention, which read as follows: "(d) severance pay due to workers upon termination of their employment". The Workers' members opposed this subamendment, arguing that the Committee had already watered down the provisions in Paragraph 3 in order to facilitate their implementation by many countries, and the same provision as that in Paragraph 3 should be retained in this clause. The Government member of Japan supported the amendment, as subamended, because it was a provision that Japan could implement.

350. After further discussions on this amendment, as subamended, the Employers' members, noting that their amendment was not supported by the majority of Government members, withdrew it. The Government member of Japan had submitted an amendment to replace this clause by the following text: "(d) [original lettering] payments, excluding such payments as severance pay and compensation for unfair dismissal due to workers upon termination of their employment;". However, in view of the withdrawal by the Employers' members of their amendment, he also withdrew his own amendment. Consequently, clause (f) [formerly (d)] was adopted without modifications.

Clause (g) [formerly (e)]

351. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this clause. They argued that this clause did not establish any limit either in amount or in time, while the amount in question resulting from occupational accidents was often enormous. With a view to protecting the financial basis of guarantee institutions, they argued that compensation in respect of occupational accidents should remain the responsibility of specialised institutions.

352. The Workers' members opposed this amendment, arguing that limitations on the amount of claims protected would be provided for in Paragraph 12, and stressing the importance of protection related to occupational accidents and diseases. They also recalled that the Committee had adopted an identical provision under Paragraph 3, and hoped that it would adopt this provision under Paragraph 11 as well.

353. The Employers' members urged the Committee not to confuse protection by a privilege with protection by guarantee institutions, which were quite distinct. The Workers' members stated that the issue under discussion was the protection of workers' claims under guarantee institutions in the same manner as under a privilege, both being ways of protecting workers' claims. The Government member of Canada opposed the amendment, stressing that it was even more important to provide coverage for compensation for occupational accidents or diseases under a guarantee institution than by way of privilege since privilege only permitted recovery to the extent of the available assets. She pointed out that, under this clause, the Committee was discussing human beings who had been the victims of accidents or diseases. After further discussions during which the Employers' members repeated their earlier view that this clause should have been covered by "could" and not by "should" when the Paragraph was divided into two subparagraphs, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment in view of the limited support it was getting from Government members. The clause was consequently adopted by consensus without modifications.

Clause (h) [formerly (f)]

354. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this clause. They asked the Government members whether they agreed to having guarantee institutions making payments to social security institutions rather than to workers. The Government member of Germany explained that, in his own country, contributions to social security schemes could be paid by guarantee institutions in cases of insolvency. The Employers' members, after being informed of the German experience, withdrew the amendment. Clause (h) [formerly (f)] was then adopted by consensus without modifications.

Clause (i) [formerly (g)]

355. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this clause. However, in view of the limited support which their previous amendments had received, they withdrew the amendment. Clause (i) [formerly (g)] was then adopted by consensus without modifications.

Clause (j) [formerly (h)]

356. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this clause, but withdrew it for the same reason as for the previous amendment. Clause (j) [formerly (h)] was adopted by consensus without modifications.

Clause (k) [formerly (i)]

357. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this clause, but withdrew it for the same reason as for the previous amendments. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace this clause by the following text: "(k) [formerly (i)] wages, overtime pay, commissions and other forms of remuneration relating to work performed, remuneration for holidays and other types of paid absence, severance pay, compensation for unfair dismissal and other payments due to workers upon termination of their employment and compensation directly payable by the employer in respect of occupational accidents and diseases that are awarded to a worker through arbitration or adjudication". However, in view of the earlier adoption of a similar provision in Paragraph 3, subparagraph 3, of the Recommendation, they subamended their own amendment to replace this clause with a text similar to that provision.

358. The Employers' members declared that they preferred the original text without modification. The Workers' members explained that the reason for this subamendment was to overcome objections raised earlier by Government members. The Government member of Canada supported the subamendment, which was intended to clarify the text. The subamendment was put to a vote, and rejected for lack of quorum by 24,948 votes in favour and 0 against, with 31,724 abstentions.

359. Then the Committee proceeded to the examination of the original amendment submitted by the Workers' members. They explained that this amendment was referring to cases that had been adjudicated/arbitrated, but had not yet been implemented by payment of the compensation awarded. They referred to the examples of women receiving remuneration in violation of legal equal pay requirements, night work undertaken in violation of national law, and the refusal to pay maternity leave. They argued that these were situations where resort to adjudication or arbitration was the only way for a certain group to achieve justice. The Employers' members opposed the amendment, arguing that it was vague, and did not define limitations in time, while adjudication proceedings might last for many years. After further discussions, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment. Clause (k) [formerly (i)] was adopted without modifications. Paragraph 11 was adopted.

Paragraph 12

360. Since no amendment had been submitted, Paragraph 12 was adopted.

New Paragraph

361. Two amendments were submitted to insert a new Paragraph. Both were related to information and consultation rights in cases of insolvency. One was submitted by the Workers' members, and proposed the insertion of the following new Paragraph after Paragraph 12: "PROVISIONS COMMON TO PARTS II AND III. Information and consulation. (1) The concerned employer should provide its employees and their representatives all relevant financial and economic information about the concerned enterprise upon the opening of insolvency proceedings. When practical, this information should be provided prior to the opening of insolvency proceedings. (2) During insolvency proceedings relating to the rehabilitation of the enterprise, the workers concerned and their representatives should be informed and consulted by the employer or the competent authority regarding the maintenance of employment and the rehabilitation of the enterprise."

362. The other amendment was submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom. It proposed the addition of a new Paragraph with the following text: "According to the modalities to be provided for by national law and/or practice, the workers and/or their representatives within the enterprise, where such representatives exist, should receive information and where appropriate be consulted on the consequences for the workers of the insolvency proceedings.

363. The Workers' members withdrew their amendment in favour of the amendment submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom.

364. The Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee, explained that the proposed text was similar to Article 14 of the draft Convention, which had been rejected by the Committee. She stated that the objective of their proposal was to enable workers or their representatives to be informed and consulted on the consequences of insolvency proceedings. She argued that they should indeed be kept informed of the impending proceedings in order to be able to exert their rights. She also proposed the addition of a new phrase, at the end of the last phrase of the clause, as follows: "as provided for in Paragraphs 1(1) and 1(2) of this Recommendation".

365. The Government member of Canada, while supporting the principle underlying the amendment, found the wording to be awkward, and therefore submitted a subamendment. She explained that this subamendment would, among other things, specify that the provision applied to both Parts II and III of the Recommendation. The subamendment would replace the amendment and read as follows: "PROVISION COMMON TO PARTS II and III. Workers or their representatives should receive timely information with regard to the insolvency proceedings which have been opened and to which the workers' claims pertain." She explained that this subamendment took into account the fact that in some countries workers were given information individually, and in others through their representatives. She pointed out that the subamendment incorporated the phrase, "proceedings which have been opened". Although not objecting to consultation occurring before insolvency, she thought that it would not be appropriate for the Recommendation under discussion.

366. The Government member of Portugal pointed out that the subamendment submitted by the Government member of Canada, which they could not accept, had much more limited scope than the amendment of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee. The Government member of Canada, in search of a solution acceptable to all the members in the Committee, proposed a subamendment to her subamendment to insert, after "timely information", the phrase "and to be consulted". This was not accepted by the Government member of Portugal, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Committee. The Government member of the United States supported the subamendment of the Government member of Canada as subamended, pointing out that it had two advantages: (i) it applied to both Parts of the Recommendation; and (ii) it removed the need for consultation prior to insolvency.

367. The Government member of Botswana also supported the subamendment for the same reasons as those stated by the Government member of the United States. The Government member of Canada stressed that her subamendment did include the most appropriate elements of the subamendment submitted by the Government members of the Member States of the European Community which were represented in the Commitee. The Government member of Japan expressed his support for the subamendment. The Employers' members, at the invitation of the Workers' members, supported the subamendment submitted by the Government member of Canada. The subamendment was adopted by consensus.

368. The new provision was adopted as new Part IV and new Paragraph 11 of the Recommendation.

Adoption of the report, draft Convention and draft Recommendation

369. At its 12th sitting, the Committee met to examine its report, presented by the Reporter. The Committee adopted the report unanimously, subject to a few changes requested by several Members.

370. The Committee then adopted the draft Convention that had been submitted by the Drafting Committee, Article by Article and in the entirety. The Committee adopted the draft Convention subject to the following changes:

1. In the French version, in Articles 6(a), 12(a), 12(b), and 12(c), commas were placed after "déterminée" and before "précedant", and Article 12(b), the word" "payés" was inserted between "congés" et "dus".

2. In the English version, in Articles 6(a), 12(a), 12(b) and 12(c), commas were placed after "period" and before "prior to the insolvency", in Article 8, paragraph 1, an "s" was added to "national law" (which became "national laws"); and in Article 12(b) the word "done" was replaced by "performed".

371. The Government member of Switzerland then stated that his country shared the aims of the Convention, but that it had the following reservations: Article 4, paragraph 1 stipulated that the Convention applied to all workers, whereas Swiss national practice excluded from privilege and, indirectly from the guarantee, claims of managers who could take major decisions in the enterprise. In addition, Article 12(b) protected claims for paid leave pertaining to a period of service of six months, whereas in Switzerland this protection only covered a period of service of three months prior to insolvency. Finally, under Article 12(d) the guarantee had to protect severance pay, which was not the case in Switzerland. He added that this statement was without prejudice to a thorough analysis that would be undertaken later for the submission of the Convention, within the period prescribed by the ILO Constitution, to the competent national authorities.

372. The Committee then adopted, Paragraph by Paragraph and in its entirety, the draft Recommendation that had been submitted to it by the Drafting Committee, subject to the following changes:

1. In the French version, the title of Part II was revised to align it with Part II of the Convention: "Protection des créances des travailleurs aux moyen d'un privilège". In Paragraph 3, subparagraph 2(b), the word "du" (before "travail") was put in the place of "d'un" (before "travail"); and in Paragraph 9, subparagraph (1), clauses (a) and (c), commas were placed after "déterminée" and before "précédant".

2. In the English version, the title of Part II was revised to align it with the title of Part II of the Convention: "Protection of workers' claims by means of a privilege". In Paragraph 6, subparagraph (3), to bring the text into line with the French version, the words "or at least a part of it" replaced the words "or at least part of it". In Paragraph 8 (e) the word "may" was put in the place of "could". In Paragraph 9, subparagraph (1) (c) the phrase "which should not be less than 12 months" was set apart by commas. In Paragraph 9, subparagraph (1), clause (d) the words "prior to" were inserted before the words "the termination of the employment".

373. Before closing the sitting, the Committee heard statements by the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons, who took the floor to stress the excellent atmosphere of understanding that had prevailed throughout the Committee's work, in spite of the difficulty of the subject-matter and the opposing interests of the two groups. They expressed their gratitude to the Chairperson for the effective manner in which she had presided over the sittings and to the members of the Secretariat for assisting the Committee in carrying out its work. The Government member of the United States, speaking on behalf of the Government members in the Committee, endorsed the comments of the preceding speakers. The Employer member of Venezuela also congratulated the Chairperson, who had been a credit to her country. The representative of the Secretary-General then stressed that it had been a great pleasure for the Secretariat to work with the members of the Committee throughout this session as well as during the first discussion last year.

374. The Chairperson then thanked the two Vice-Chairpersons, the Reporter, the members of the Drafting Committee, all of the Government members, Employers' members and Workers' members, as well as the Secretariat and, in particular, the interpreters. She said that she was pleased with the good results of the Committee's work and of the quality of the international labour standards that she would be submitting to the plenary session of the Conference. With nothing further on the agenda, the Chairperson stated that the Committee had finished its work.

375. The texts of the draft Convention and the draft Recommendation are reproduced below.

376. The Report of the Committee on Workers' Claims, together with the texts of the draft Convention and draft Recommendation are hereby submitted to the Conference for consideration.

Proposed Convention concerning the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 79th Session on 3 June 1992, and

Stressing the importance of the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer and recalling the provisions on this subject in Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, and Article 11 of the Workmen's Conpensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925, and

Noting that, since the adoption of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, greater value has been placed on the rehabilitation of insolvent enterprises and that, because of the social and economic consequences of insolvency, efforts should be made where possible to rehabilitate enterprises and safeguard employment, and

Noting that since the adoption of the aforementioned standards, significant developments have taken place in the law and practice of many Members which have improved the protection of workers' claims in the event of insolvency of their employer, and considering that it would be timely for the Conference to adopt new standards on the subject of workers' claims,

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention; adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-two the following Convention, which may be cited as the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992.

PART I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 1

1. For the purposes of this Convention, the term "insolvency" refers to situations in which, in accordance with national law and practice, proceedings have been opened relating to an employer's assets with a view to the collective reimbursement of its creditors.

2. For the purposes of this Convention, a Member may extend the term "insolvency" to other situations in which workers' claims cannot be paid by reason of the financial situation of the employer, for example where the amount of the employer's assets is recognised as being insufficient to justify the opening of insolvency proceedings.

3. The extent to which an employer's assets are subject to the proceedings referred to in Paragraph 1 shall be determined by national laws, regulations or practice.

Article 2

The provisions of this Convention shall be applied by means of laws or regulations or by any other means consistent with national practice.

Article 3

1. A Member which ratifies this Convention shall accept either the obligations of Part II, providing for protection of workers' claims by means of a privilege, or the obligations of Part III, providing for the protection of workers' claims by a guarantee institution, or the obligations of both Parts. This choice shall be indicated in a declaration accompanying its ratification.

2. A Member which has initially accepted only Part II or only Part III of this Convention may thereafter, by a declaration communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, extend its acceptance to the other Part.

3. A Member which accepts the obligations of both Parts of this Convention may, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers' limit the application of Part III to certain categories of workers and to certain branches of economic activity. Such limitations shall be specified in the declaration of acceptance.

4. A Member which has limited its acceptance of the obligations of Part III in accordance with Paragraph 3 above shall, in its first report under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, give the reasons for limiting its acceptance. In subsequent reports it shall provide information on any extension of the protection under Part III of this Convention to other categories of workers or other branches of economic activity.

5. A Member which has accepted the obligations of Parts II and III of this Convention may, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, exclude from the application of Part II those claims which are protected pursuant to Part III.

6. Acceptance by a Member of the obligations of Part II of this Convention shall ipso jure, involve the termination of its obligations under Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949.

7. A Member which has accepted only the obligations of Part III of this Convention may, by a declaration communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, terminate its obligations under Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, in respect of those claims which are protected pursuant to Part III.

Article 4

1. Subject to the exceptions provided for in paragraph 2 below, and to any limitations specified in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 3, this Convention shall apply to all employees and to all branches of economic activity.

2. The competent authority, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, may exclude from Part II, Part III or both Parts of this Convention specific categories of workers, in particular public employees, by reason of the particular nature of their employment relationship, or if there are other types of guarantee affording them protection equivalent to that provided by the Convention.

3. A Member availing itself of the exceptions provided for in paragraph 2 above shall, in its reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, provide information on such exceptions, giving the reasons therefor.

PART II. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS BY MEANS OF A PRIVILEGE

PROTECTED CLAIMS

Article 5

In the event of an employer's insolvency, workers' claims arising out of their employment shall be protected by a privilege so that they are paid out of the assets of the insolvent employer before non-privileged creditors can be paid their share.

Article 6

The privilege shall cover at least:

(a) the workers' claims for wages relating to a prescribed period, which shall not be less than three months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(b) the workers' claims for holiday pay due as a result of work performed during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year;

(c) the workers' claims for amounts due in respect of other types of paid absence relating to a prescribed period, which shall not be less than three months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment; and

(d) severance pay due to workers upon termination of their employement.

LIMITATIONS

Article 7

1. National laws or regulations may limit the protection by privilege of workers' claims to a prescribed amount, which shall not be below a socially acceptable level.

2. Where the privilege afforded to workers' claims is so limited, the prescribed amount shall be adjusted as necessary so as to maintain its value.

RANK OF PRIVILEGE

Article 8

1. National laws or regulations shall give workers' claims a higher rank of privilege than most other privileged claims, and in particular those of the State and the social security system.

2. However, where workers' claims are protected by a guarantee institution in accordance with Part III of this Convention, the claims so protected may be given a lower rank of privilege than those of the State and the social security system.

PART III. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS BY A GUARANTEE INSTITUTION

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Article 9

The payment of workers' claims against their employer arising out of their employment shall be guaranteed through a guarantee institution when payment cannot be made by the employer because of insolvency.

Article 10

In giving effect to this Part of the Convention, a Member may, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, adopt appropriate measures for the purpose of preventing possible abuse.

Article 11

1. The organisation, management, operation and financing of wage guarantee institutions shall be determined pursuant to Article 2.

2. The preceding paragraph shall not prevent a Member, in accordance with its particular characteristics and needs, from allowing insurance companies to provide the protection referred to in Article 9, as long as they offer sufficient guarantees.

CLAIMS PROTECTED BY A GUARANTEE INSTITUTION

Article 12

The workers' claims protected pursuant to this Part of the Convention shall include at least:

(a) the workers' claims for wages relating to a prescribed period, which shall not be less than eight weeks, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(b) the workers' claims for holiday pay due as a result of work performed during a prescribed period, which shall not be less than six months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(c) the workers' claims for amounts due in respect of other types of paid absence relating to a prescribed period, which shall not be less than eight weeks, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of employment; and

(d) severance pay due to workers upon termination of their employment.

Article 13

1. Claims protected pursuant to this Part of the Convention may be limited to a prescribed amount, which shall not be below a socially acceptable level.

2. Where the claims protected are so limited, the prescribed amount shall be adjusted as necessary so as to maintain its value.

FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 14

This Convention revises the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, to the extent provided for in Article 3, Paragraphs 6 and 7 above, but does not close that Convention to further ratifications.

Proposed Recommendation concerning the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 79th Session on 3 June 1992, and

Stressing the importance of the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer and recalling the provisions on this subject in Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, and Article 11 of the Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925, and

Noting that, since the adoption of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, greater value has been given to the rehabilitation of insolvent enterprises and that, because of the social and economic consequences of insolvency, efforts should be made where possible to rehabilitate enterprises and safeguard employment, and

Noting that since the adoption of the aforementioned standards, significant developments have taken place in the law and practice of many Members which have improved the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, and considering that it would be timely for the Conference to adopt new standards on the subject of workers' claims, and

Recognising that guarantee institutions, if properly designed, afford greater protection of workers' claims, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992; adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-two the following Recommendation which may be cited as the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Recommendation, 1992.

I. DEFINITIONS AND METHODS OF APPLICATION

1. (1) For the purposes of this Recommendation, the term "insolvency" refers to situations in which, in accordance with national law and practice, proceedings have been opened relating to an employer's assets with a view to the collective reimbursement of its creditors.

(2) For the purposes of this Recommendation, Members may extend the term "insolvency" to other situations in which workers' claims cannot be paid by reason of the financial situation of the employer, and in particular to the following:

(a) where the enterprise has closed down or ceased its activities or is voluntarily wound up;

(b) where the amount of the employer's assets is insufficient to justify the opening of insolvency proceedings;

(c) where, in the course of proceedings to recover a worker's claim arising out of employment, it is found that the employer has no assets or that these are insufficient to pay the debt in question;

(d) where the employer has died and his or her assets have been placed in the hands of an administrator and the amounts due cannot be paid out of the estate.

(3) The extent to which an employer's assets are subject to the proceedings referred to in subparagraph (1) should be determined by national laws, regulations or practice.

2. The provision of this Recommendation may be applied by means of laws or regulations or by any other means consistent with national practice.

II. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS BY MEANS OF A PRIVILEGE

PROTECTED CLAIMS

3. (1) The protection afforded by a privilege should cover the following claims:

(a) wages, overtime pay, commissions and other forms of remuneration relating to work performed during a prescribed period prior to the insolvency or prior to termination of the employment. This period should be fixed by national laws or regulations and should not be less than 12 months;

(b) holiday pay due as a result of work performed during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year;

(c) amounts due in respect of other types of paid absence, end-of-year and other bonuses provided for by national laws or regulations, collective agreements or individual contracts of employment, relating to a prescribed period, which should not be less than 12 months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(d) payments due in lieu of notice of termination of employment;

(e) severance pay, compensation for unfair dismissal and other payments due to workers upon termination of their employment;

(f) compensation payable directly by the employer in respect of occupational accidents and diseases.

(2) The protection afforded by a privilege might cover the following claims:

(a) contributions due in respect of national statutory social security schemes, where failure to pay adversely affects workers' entitlements;

(b) contributions due in respect of private, occupational, inter-occupational or enterprise social protection schemes independent of national statutory social security schemes, where failure to pay adversely affects workers' entitlements;

(c) benefits to which the workers were entitled prior to the insolvency by virtue of their participation in enterprise social protection schemes and which are payable by the employer.

(3) Claims enumerated in subparagraphs (1) and (2) that have been awarded to a worker through an adjudication or arbitration within 12 months prior to the insolvency should be covered by the privilege regardless of the time-limits specified in those subparagraphs.

LIMITATIONS

4. Where the amount of the claim protected by a privilege is limited by national laws or regulations, in order that this amount should not fall below a socially acceptable level it should take into account variables such as the minimum wage, the part of the wage which is unattachable, the wage on which social security contributions are based or the average wage in industry.

CLAIMS WHICH FALL DUE AFTER THE INSOLVENCY PROCEEDINGS HAVE BEEN OPENED

5. Where, in accordance with national laws and regulations, an enterprise in respect of which insolvency proceedings have been opened is authorised to continue its activities, workers' claims arising out of work performed as from the date when the continuation was authorised should not be subject to the proceedings and should be paid, out of the funds available, as and when they fall due.

ACCELERATED PAYMENT PROCEDURES

6. (1) Where the insolvency proceedings cannot ensure rapid payment of workers' privileged claims, there should be a procedure for accelerated payment to ensure that the claims are paid, without awaiting the end of the proceedings, out of available funds or as soon as funds become available, unless the rapid payment of workers' claims is ensured by a guarantee institution.

(2) Accelerated payment of workers' claims may be ensured as follows:

(a) the person or institution responsible for administering the employer's assets should pay such claims as soon as it has been determined that they are genuine and payable;

(b) if the claim is contested, the worker should be able to have its validity determined by a court or any other body with jurisdiction over the matter, so as to have it paid in accordance with clause (a).

(3) The accelerated payment procedure should cover the totality of the claim protected by a privilege, or at least a part of it to be fixed by national laws or regulations.

III. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIM BY A GUARANTEE INSTITUTION

SCOPE

7. The protection of workers' claims by a guarantee institution should have as wide a coverage as possible.

OPERATING PRINCIPLES

8. Guarantee institutions might operate according to the following principles:

(a) they should be administratively, financially and legally independent of the employer;

(b) employers should contribute to financing these institutions, unless this is fully covered by the public authorities;

(c) they should assume their obligations vis-à-vis protected workers irrespective of whether any obligation the employer may have of contributing to their financing has been met;

(d) they should assume a subsidiary responsibility for the liabilities of insolvent employers in respect of claims protected by the guarantee and should, by way of subrogation, be able to act in place of the workers to whom they have made payments;

(e) the funds managed by guarantee institutions, other than those from general revenues, may only be used for the purpose for which they were collected.

CLAIMS PROTECTED BY THE GUARANTEE

9. (1) The guarantee should cover the following claims:

(a) wages, overtime pay, commissions and other forms of remuneration relating to work performed during a prescribed period, which should not be less than three months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(b) holiday pay due as a result of work performed during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year;

(c) end-of-year and other bonuses provided for by national laws or regulations, collective agreements or individual contracts of employment, relating to a prescibed period, which should not be less than 12 months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(d) amounts due in respect of other types of paid absence relating to a prescribed period, which should not be less than three months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(e) payments due in lieu of notice of termination of employment;

(f) severance pay, compensation for unfair dismissal and other payments due to workers upon termination of their employment;

(g) compensation payable directly by the employer in respect of occupational accidents and diseases.

(2) The guarantee might cover the following claims:

(a) contributions due in respect of national statutory social security schemes, where failure to pay adversely affects workers' entitlements;

(b) contributions due in respect of private, occupational, inter-ocupational, or enterprise social protection schemes independent of national statutory social security schemes, where failure to pay adversely affects workers' entitlements;

(c) benefits to which the workers were entitled prior to the insolvency by virtue of their participation in enterprise social protection schemes and which are payable by the employer;

(d) wages or any other form of remuneration consistent with this Paragraph, awarded to a worker through adjudication or arbitration within three months prior to the insolvency.

LIMITATIONS

10. Where the amount of the claim protected by means of a guarantee institution is limited, in order that this amount should not fall below a socially acceptable level, it should take into account variables such as the minimum wage, the part of the wage which is unattachable, the wage on which social security contributions are based or the average wage in industry.

IV. PROVISION COMMON TO PARTS II AND III

11. Workers or their representatives should receive timely information and be consulted with regard to insolvency proceedings which have been opened and to which the workers' claims pertain.

Fourth Report of the Credentials Committee

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Japan

1. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Japan submitted by the National Confederation of Trade Unions (Zenroren).

2. The objecting organisation maintained that the Government of Japan had refused to have any official consultation with Zenroren and had made an arbitrary nomination of the Workers' delegate and advisers from the list of names recommended by the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (Rengo), although Zenroren had demanded that three candidates recommended by it should be nominated. The Government had given as the reason for its action the refusal of Rengo to consent. Zenroren had a membership of more than 1,400,000. Like Rengo, it had been described as one of the "major organisations" in a report derived from the "Basic Survey of Trade Unions" conducted every year by the Ministry of Labour. The nomination of the Workers' delegation from only one organisation, refusing consultation with Zenroren, violated the spirit of the ILO Constitution and disregarded the procedural requirements for the nomination of the Workers' delegation.

3. In a very detailed and comprehensive communication, transmitted to the Committee in response to the latter's request by Mr. Sakutaro Takahashi, Assistant Minister for Labour and delegate to the Conference, the Government of Japan stated that Rengo had a total membership of 7,615,448 and included various major industrial and regional organisations. According to the 1991 "Basic Survey of Trade Unions", Zenroren's total membership was 840,237. Together with Rengo and the National Trade Union Council (Zenrokyo – with a total membership of 298,994), Zenroren was one of the trade union organisations established on a national scale in Japan.

4. In nominating the Workers' delegates and advisers to the Conference, the Government of Japan had consulted Rengo, as the most representative workers' organisation, which was the successor of former industrial organisations that had also been recognised as the most representative. Furthermore, Rengo covered all major industrial trade unions, which was not the case with Zenroren.

5. Both Rengo and Zenroren had recommended persons for inclusion in the Workers' delegation. The Government had immediately informed Rengo of Zenroren's recommendations and had discussed them with Rengo on several occasions. Rengo had, however, found them unacceptable and the Government had therefore decided to nominate the persons recommended by Rengo and had informed Zenroren accordingly. For so long as there was a difference of opinion between Rengo and Zenroren, the only way the Government could carry out its obligations under the ILO Constitution was to nominate the Workers' delegation in line with the views of Rengo. The Government therefore maintained that its consistent practice of nominating its Workers' delegation in consultation and agreement with Rengo was fully in accord with article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution.

6. The Committee considered that there could be no doubt that Rengo was the most representative workers' organisation in Japan. Recalling the obligation of governments to consult all the most representative workers' organisations in the country and to use their best efforts to secure the latter's agreement when nominating the Workers' delegation to the Conference, the Committee noted that the Government of Japan had in good faith sought to take into consideration all the recommendations that had been made to it.

7. In view of the above considerations, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Paraguay

8. The Committee had before it an objection to Mr. Julio Etcheverry Espinola, Workers' delegate of Paraguay, submitted by the Confederación Paraguaya de Trabajadores (CPT). The objection was signed by 28 persons, as members of the National Executive Committee of the CPT.

9. The objecting organisation maintained that the said delegate had not been nominated by the National Executive of that Confederation to represent it at the International Labour Conference. The communication also referred to the suspension by judicial order of the ordinary congress of the CPT which was to take place at the end of last month.

10. By letter of 5 June 1992, the Chairman of the Credentials Committee transmitted the text of the objection to the Government delegation of Paraguay, together with a request for further information. Notwithstanding a reminder of the Secretariat of the Credentials Committee of 15 June 1992, asking that the information requested be submitted by Tuesday, 16 June, no reply had been received from the Government.

11. The Committee deeply regretted that the absence of a response from the Government had prevented it from examining the objection in accordance with its mandate under Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. It considered that there was room for doubt about the representative character of the Workers' delegate of Paraguay. In this connection, the Committee noted that the credentials submitted by the Government did not mention the organisation to which the delegate belonged or which had agreed to his nomination.

12. In view of the lack of information provided by the objecting organisation, the Committee decided not to entertain the objection, trusting that, in future, the appointment of the Workers' delegation would be made in agreement with the most representative workers' organisations as required by article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Guinea

13. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Guinea submitted by the "Union générale des travailleurs de Guinée" (UGTG).

14. The objecting organisation maintained that on the pretext of a presumption according to which the "Confédération générale des travailleurs de Guinée" was the most representative organisation, the Government had nominated as Workers' delegate a member of that organisation without consulting the UGTG, which wanted to participate in the Conference in order to be able to transmit the true message of the workers of Guinea on the dramatic social situation since 1986 and on the application of international labour standards in the country.

15. In a statement made to the Committee at its invitation, Mr. Ibrahima Camara, National Director of Labour and Social Legislation and Government delegate of Guinea to the Conference, explained that until 1990 there had only been one central trade union organisation in Guinea. With the political reforms, the Labour Code had been amended in such a way as to enable all workers to set up trade unions of their choosing and to join any of them. There had been efforts to create some unions and the Government had never sought to prevent this. When considering the composition of the tripartite delegation to the ILO Conference, it had been decided to nominate the only organisation that represented all branches of activity and was on a national scale, without formally consulting the other organisations, which had been recently established and whose representative character was limited to Conakry.

16. The Committee recalled that in previous years, the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Guinea had been given to the Secretary (or Deputy Secretary) of the CGTG – who, at some of the sessions, had been the same person as this year – and there had been no challenge to his credentials. The Committee also noted that, even though there had been changes following the adoption of the Labour Code, the CGTG still appeared, for the moment, to be the most representative organisation at the national level.

17. In view of the above considerations, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection. At the same time, it recalled the obligation of the Government to include in its consultations all the most representative organisations in the country and to seek their agreement when it was nominating the Workers' delegation to the Conference.

Objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sudan

18. The Committee had before it two objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sudan, one submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), and the other submitted by three organisations from Sudan, the Textile Trade Union, the Sudan Railways Trade Union and the Water and Electricity Union grouped together in the Sudan Workers' Trade Unions Federation – Abroad.

19. The objecting organisations indicated that the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sudan violated the letter and the spirit of Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution. They pointed out that in February 1992, the Government has dissolved all the existing trade unions and had promulgated a new trade union law which was completely contrary to Convention No. 87, ratified by Sudan. The new law grouped different categories of workers in trade unions contrary to their wishes and without consulting them. The new trade unions were compelled to join one Federation which had the same name as the dissolved Sudan Workers Trade Union Federation. The elected leaders had been ousted from office – some of them had been imprisoned and ill-treated – and had been substituted by Committees named to manage the unions, comprising of persons who were not associated with the trade union movement and belonged to political parties, Government ministries and the army.

20. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Mahdi Mohamed, Ambassador and Permanent Representative of Sudan, informed the Committee that the mandate of the elected trade union leaders had ended in August 1991 after a national dialogue conference of trade unions in August 1990 democratically decided to unify the trade union movement by creating 26 general unions under the umbrella of one national central organisation. A Higher Council for Trade Unions had been elected by workers' representatives, public officials, professionals and all existing unions. This Higher Council for Trade Unions had then acted as a preparatory committee (Trade Union Preparatory Committee) under the presidency of its elected leader, Mr. Tag Elsir Abdoun, with Mr. Elsadig Atta Elmanan as elected Secretary-General.

21. The Government had requested that Committee to nominate its representatives to the Conference. The Committee had nominated the said President as Workers' delegate and the Secretary-General as adviser and substitute delegate. Both had participated in the previous session of the Conference. The Sudanese trade unions had played an active role in the Sudanese Workers' Trade Union Federation (SWTUF) and had taken part in the process of nomination of the Workers' representatives to the ILO Conference.

22. According to the Government, the objection of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), to which the SWTUF was not affiliated, raised legitimate questions of credibility since the ICFTU did not have access to the facts as it had rejected the invitation of the SWTUF to attend its national conference in 1990. The head of the Workers' delegation had been Secretary for Foreign Relations of the SWTUF from 1973 to 1992 and had attended ILO Conferences since 1976. Finally, the Government reiterated its commitment in favour of trade unions in the country and its readiness to cooperate with the ILO in line with international standards.

23. The Committee, while taking note of the fact that free trade unions elections had taken place in 1992 and of the intention of the Government to cooperate with the ILO, observed that at the present time, given the trade union situation in Sudan as had been described in the 281st report of the Committee on Freedom of Association of March 1992 (Case No. 1508), whose conclusions and recommendations were contained in paragraphs 305 to 310, there was doubt that the Workers' delegation of Sudan was truly representative of the workers of that country. Notwithstanding these doubts and taking into account the fact that questions of freedom of association were within the competence of the Committee on Freedom of Association and that with reference to Sudan, it was being examined by the said Committee, the Credentials Committee decided not to propose invalidation.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Thailand

24. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Thailand, submitted by the Thai Trade Union Congress (TTUC).

25. The objecting organisation stated that it considered the nomination of the Workers' delegate to be illegitimate and requested the Conference to condemn the Government for its abuse of authority. The organisation had been invited by the Government to participate in the election of the Workers' delegate and had recommended, in conformity with the ILO Constitution, that the delegate be nominated from the TTUC, which was the largest representative congress of workers in Thailand. The Government refused, and had nominated the delegate from a less qualified congress which was the subject of a serious internal conflict. No member of the TTUC had been included in the delegation.

26. In a statement made to the Committee, at its invitation, Miss Vichitra Prompunthum and Mrs. Supatra Payakaniti, government substitute delegates of Thailand to the Conference, explained that the Government had consulted all the trade union organisations, which were six in number, and referred to an agreement on rotation, which had been signed by the duly empowered representatives on behalf of all organisations and was to remain in effect for nine years. The Government representatives also provided statistics on membership: the TTUC had 120,000 members; the Labour Congress of Thailand (LTC), 78,166; the National Congres of Thai Labour (NTCL), 29,237, etc. The position of titular Workers' delegate rotated between those three organisations.

27. The Committee noted that the rotation agreement, at least as implemented for the present session, had excluded the largest workers' organisation from any participation in the Workers' delegation, whereas the smallest of the three organisations mentioned above, the NCTL, from which the Workers' delegate had come, had participated in both the sessions that had followed the signing of the rotation agreement in March 1991. The Committee recalled the opinion it had expressed on many occasions that rotation was only one of the means of obtaining agreement among the parties, and noted that the objection of the TTUC, which had been signed by its president, implied that that Congress had ceased to be in agreement with the system of rotation established in 1991.

28. As consultations had taken place, the Committee felt that the objection should not be upheld and trusted that the Government, either through a more appropriate system of rotation or in some other way, would in future nominate the Workers' delegation to the Conference in agreement with the most representative workers' organisations in Thailand.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cameroon

29. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cameroon, submitted by the Agricultural Workers' Union.

30. The objecting organisation stated that the Workers' delegate, Mr. Louis Sombes, General Secretary of the trade union confederation, was not the legitimate representative of the workers in Cameroon, but rather of the ruling party. It pointed out, in support of its objection, that the single trade union central organisation, the Cameroon Trade Union Congress, belonged to the political party in power, giving rise to a monopoly which was at complete variance with ILO standards. Trade union leaders of the English-speaking North-West and South-West Provinces had proposed changes in trade union structures that would reflect the independence of the trade union movement in Cameroon, in the hope of giving particular attention to rural workers' organisations. At the congress held last May, the chairman and two rapporteurs presided over elections in which they were themselves candidates in a list drawn up by the political party in power, thus demonstrating the interference of the authorities in the trade union movement.

31. In a statement made to the Committee at its invitation, Mrs. Claire Nyangang, Director of Labour in the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance, Government delegate to the Conference, assisted by Mr. Martin Mpana, substitute delegate, stressed the importance of the Cameroon Trade Union Congress that had taken place in May: it had followed on from the establishment of pluralism in political parties as from December 1990, had confirmed the political neutrality of the Cameroon trade union organisation, and had given birth to the restructured trade union confederation which had recommended the Workers' delegate for the ILO Conference. The signatory of the objection had actively participated in the Congress. The Government, which had been an observer at the Congress, had no reason to doubt that the Congress had conducted its activities, including the democratic election of the officers of the trade union confederation, in accordance with relevant provisions. The law of Cameroon recognised the right of trade union members to join the political parties of their choice, and the signatory of the objection was himself a member of a political party. The Workers' delegate had thus been chosen in agreement with the most representative workers' organisation, which had acted totally free from any government influence.

32. While regretting the lack of statistical information concerning representative character, the Committee noted that the objection did not question the importance of the trade union confederation that had recommended the Workers' delegate to the Conference, but essentially alleged election irregularities and Government control over this confederation. In view of the lack of evidence to substantiate these allegations, especially in the light of the Government's statement, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection.

Communication concerning the composition of the Workers' delegation of Morocco

33. The Committee received a communication which had initially been sent to the Director-General of the ILO, submitted by the "Confédération démocratique du travail" (CDT) and the "Union générale des travailleurs du Maroc" (UGTM).

34. These organisations maintained that for years now they had demanded the application of the principle of rotation for the position of titular of the Workers' delegation and that the Moroccan authorities had persisted in ignoring a principle which applied in all countries in which trade union pluralism existed. They requested an intervention with the Moroccan authorities so that discriminatory policy would cease.

35. The Committee observed that the organisations which had sent the communication were not objecting to the credentials of the Workers' delegate of Morocco. If that had been the case, the objection would have been irreceivable, under Article 26, paragraph 4(c) of the Conference Standing Orders, since the two organisations were represented as advisers to the Workers' delegate.

36. With regard to the principle of rotation, the Committee recalled the opinion it had expressed on many occasions and also in relation to the composition of the Workers' delegation of Morocco, that rotation was only one of the means of obtaining an agreement between the interested organisations. For this reason, the Committee considered that it could not intervene as requested with the Moroccan authorities and limited its action to transmitting a copy of the communication to the Government delegation of Morocco.

Communication concerning the delegation of Haiti

37. Further to the communication dated 3 June 1992 concerning the Government delegation of Haiti, referred to in paragraph 28 of the Committee's second report (Provisional Record, No. 16, page 16/44), the Committee received from the same source a communication concerning the delegation of Haiti as a whole, including the Employers' and Workers' delegations. The communication indicated that it should be treated as an objection for the purposes of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, as should the previous communication referred to above.

38. The Committee noted that the names of the Employers' and Workers' delegates of Haiti were on the provisional list of delegations published as a supplement to the Provisional Record of 3 June 1992. The later communication received on 12 June therefore fell outside the 72-hour time limit provided for in Article 26, paragraph 4(a) of the Standing Orders, and was accordingly not receivable as an objection. At the same time, the Committee recalled the position that it had previously adopted with respect to the Government delegation, which is reflected in the Committee's above-mentioned second report.

Communication from the Employers' Group

39. The Committee received a communication from the Employers' Group, signed by its Secretary, Mr. Costas Kapartis, wishing to register the protest of the Employers' group at the number of governments which have not respected their obligation under Article 13, paragraph 2(a) of the ILO Constitution to bear travel and subsistence expenses for their delegations. The communication indicated that 37 governments had not fulfilled this obligation. Nine governments, of which four were specifically mentioned, did not offer any financial support at all to their Employers' delegations. The governments of 28 countries, seven of which were specified, had only partially met their obligation in this respect: in nine cases the expenses of advisers had not been paid; in 18 cases, the expenses of some advisers had not been paid, and one Employers' delegation had received only subsistence expenses. Ninety Employer advisers did not have their travel costs and expenses paid by their government. The Employers' delegate of one country and the adviser of another had not been able to attend the Conference because of non-payment by their governments of their travel and subsistence expenses.

40. The communication added that the situation might be much more serious than what appeared from the elements described above and that the Workers' Group might have been similarly treated by governments. The problem took dimensions beyond the fulfilment of the constitutional obligations of member States. It interfered with tripartism, the correct composition of delegations and the smooth functioning of the Conference; it was therefore time for immediate consideration to be given to finding effective remedies.

41. In this connection, as it had done in its second report (Provisional Record, No. 16, page 16/44, paragraph 33), the Committee drew attention to paragraph 17 of its first report (Provisional Record, No.

0, page 10/42), in which it reminded governments of heir obligation to bear the travelling and subsistence xpenses of their delegations in accordance with Ar-cle 13, paragraph 2(a) of the ILO Constitution.

42. At the same time, the Committee recalled that he provisions in the Conference Standing Orders hat set out its mandate, namely Articles 5 and 26, id not include in its functions the consideration of bjections based on non-compliance by a member tate with its obligations under Article 13, paragraph
(a) of the ILO Constitution. The Committee regret-ed that its action was limited, by reason of the tanding Orders at present in force, to taking note of he communications received. It felt that the possibil-
y of introducing an appropriate mechanism to eval-ate the extent to which the obligations under Arti-le 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution were being omplied with should be examined by the competent odies in the ILO.

ate Objection

43. On 9 June 1992 the Committee received a ommunication from the “Syndicat des Enseignants de l'Education Nationale” (SEENA) concerning the Workers' delegate of Gabon.

44. The name of the Workers' delegate of Gabon appeared in the Provisional List of Delegations, published as a supplement to the Provisional Record of 3 June 1992. This communication was, therefore, received after the end of the 72-hour time limit provided for in Article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Conference Standing Orders. The Committee accordingly considered that in so far as it constituted an objection, it was not receivable in accordance with the above-mentioned provision.

45. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

PART ONE

GENERAL REPORT

A. Introduction

1. In accordance with article 7 of its Standing Orders, the Conference set up a Committee to consider and report on item III on its agenda: "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations". The Committee was composed of 178 members (92 Government members, 26 Employers' members and 60 Workers' members). It also included 20 Government deputy members, 39 Employers' deputy members and 87 Workers' deputy members.[1] In addition, 23 international non-governmental organisations were represented by observers.[2]

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. M. Rood (Government member, Netherlands);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. A. Wisskirchen (Employers' member, Germany); and Mr. W. Peirens (Workers' member, Belgium);

Reporter: Mrs. F. Montenegro Diaz (Government member, Nicaragua).

3. The Committee held 22 sittings.

4. The Committee joined the Committee of Experts in paying tribute to Mr. Thiecouta Sidibé, former Director of the International Labour Standards Department of the International Labour Office, who retired at the end of March this year. His long experience and his personal commitment to the defence and promotion of the Organisation's standards, combined with his helpfulness and skill in enabling the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards to complete its tasks have earned him both the respect and the affection of the members of the Committee who have known him. The Committee wishes to record both its gratitude to Mr. Sidibé and its welcome to Mr. Héctor G. Bartolomei, his successor as Director of the Standards Department and representative of the Secretary-General in the Committee.

5. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the following questions: (i) information supplied under article 19 of the Constitution on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopt by the Conference; (ii) reports supplied under ar
cles 22 and 35 of the Constitution on the applicati of ratified Conventions; and (iii) reports request by the Governing Body under article 19 of the Co stitution on the Discrimination (Employment a Occupation) Convention, 1957 (No. 111); and on t Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention (N

mum Wage Fixing Machinery (Agriculture) Conve
tion (No. 99) and Recommendation (No. 89), 19 and the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention (No. 1 and Recommendation (No. 135), 1970.[3]

6. As usual, the Committee began its work with discussion of general aspects of the application
Conventions (particularly ratified Conventions) a
Recommendations and the discharge by memb
States of standards-related obligations under t
ILO Constitution. It then discussed the general s vey made by the Committee of Experts on the App cation of Conventions and Recommendations, whi dealt with minimum wages (wage-fixing machine application and supervision). Finally, it consider various individual cases relating to the application ratified Conventions or compliance with the oblig

the Committee of Experts and to submit Conve

tional authorities. The examination of those cas oral and written explanations provided by t governments concerned. The Committee also r and, where appropriate, the reports of other ILO s pervisory bodies. In view of the short time availab the Committee followed its usual practice of maki

a selection among the Committee of Experts' obs vations and consequently discussed a limited numb of cases. A summary of the information supplied governments, the discussions in the present Co mittee and any conclusions it has drawn is set out in the Provisional Record of the Conference appended to the Committee's report) but also of its general discussions. Having regard to the importance of the general discussion to the supervisory system as a whole, the Employers' members, supported by the Workers' members, proposed postponing any decision until next year, after due reflection. The Committee so decided.

B. General questions relating to international labour standards

I. Supervisory system

(i) Roles of the supervisory bodies

8. The Committee reaffirmed its support for the supervisory system and its reliance on the Committee of Experts' report, prepared as it is on the principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality. The Committee of Experts' report is an essential basis for the work of the present Committee, which recognises its high quality. The Committee believes that the supervisory system depends on a constructive dialogue between the two bodies.

9. The Workers' member of the United States felt that the vast majority of members of the Conference Committee had also adopted the principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality in the evaluations made in its own report to the Conference, as shown in paragraph 20 of its 1989 report: the Committee's conclusion last year in the case of the application of freedom of association under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), by the United Kingdom in respect of the Government Communications Headquarters at Cheltenham – in which case only the Government concerned dissented – showed that the principles were achieved in reality. The Employers' member of the United States thought the supervisory system was now moving into an era when the present Committee could conduct its work free from the political considerations of the past, and with independence, objectivity and impartiality, as the Committee of Experts always has done.

10. The Employers' members recalled that the Committee is prescribed in article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference and that it has competence to consider the measures taken by member States to give effect to the provisions of Conventions to which they are parties and to present a report to the Conference. The Committee is an essential part of the supervisory system and should be strengthened as much as possible. They considered that, while the opinions expressed in the Committee of Experts' report have considerable importance, the present Committee is not formally bound to follow them: this position was legally, historically and logically justified, and if it were not so the dialogue with governments would have no purpose. Each Committee has its own responsibilities; neither was subordinate to the other, but the spirit of mutual respect and cooperation should prevail. In reality the Conference Committee had always played its own independent role and recognising this did not imply a weakening of the supervisory mechanism. On the contrary, it was undeniable that numerous cases where progress had been made were in large part due to the intensive discussions of the present Committee. The theoretical question of this Committee's role should be examined in the interest of intellectual clarity. But, in actual practice, there were never any differences between the Employers' and the Workers' sides: a long list of cases could be made where the spokespersons of the Workers distanced themselves from the findings and the evaluations of the Committee of Experts. On the whole, divergences from the report of the Committee of Experts were more frequent and numerous on the Workers' side than on the Employers' side. The difference merely consisted in that the Employers had explicitly emphasised this fact and explained why this was justified. In actual practice, there was never any difference between the two sides. They acknowledged too that, as shown in paragraphs 18 to 30 of the Committee of Experts' report, the constitutional and other special procedures can help further to solve difficulties, although their variety does not allow the present Committee to follow them. The Government member of Germany agreed with the Employers' position.

11. The Government member of the United Kingdom also thought that the work of the present Committee would be superfluous if the opinions of the Committee of Experts could not occasionally be questioned. The Government member of Pakistan was of opinion that, where a government was forced to depart temporarily from a ratified Convention which it generally applied, understanding should be shown, and this attitude would lead to greater numbers of ratifications. The Government member of Cuba recalled that the Committee of Experts' work should be based on Governments' reports. The Conference Committee's discussions, in so far as they may be objective and impartial, may provide further objective information without implying that the Committee of Experts can circumscribe its comments exclusively on this Committee's discussions.

12. The Employers' member of the United States took the view that the Committee of Experts should respond to questions of method and substance raised in the present Committee and that it should be prepared to explain and re-evaluate its opinions: such further dialogue would serve to strengthen the supervisory machinery, and the Employers' members hoped the Committee of Experts would begin to do more of this next year. The Government member of the United States also said that the Committee needs and is entitled to a response from the Committee of Experts to the various questions raised: the work of the present Committee was becoming more complex and technical in the post-Cold War period and it needed more information in order to do its job correctly.

13. The Workers' members pointed out that they continue to follow the situation in cases not mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report this year; they expect the Committee of Experts to continue to give close attention to the remarks of the present Committee. They added that any reforms of the supervisory system should not in any event weaken the application in law and practice of ratified Conventions, as this would also discriminate against countries which scrupulously respect their engagements. The Workers' member of the Netherlands referred to the value of enriching the Committee of Experts' work with the testimony of Conference Committee members with direct knowledge or experience of the suffering caused, for example, by the abuse of trade union rights. Though the International Labour Office provides a vital link between the two bodies, there was sometimes, as he had observed last year (paragraph 7 of the Committee's 1991 report), a lack of continuity, when it was not clear why certain cases were included in the Committee of Experts' report one year but not another: the Committee should be informed why certain cases were chosen but not others. The Workers' member of France stated that the Committee of Experts' report was silent concerning certain cases of violation of Conventions universally recognised. The Workers' member of Greece stated his view that the Committee of Experts does not always take sufficient account of the factual information – for instance as to the collective bargaining situation – given in the discussions of the present Committee. In a specific case, the Workers' member of Ecuador said that, although his country was noted by the Committee of Experts as a case of progress in relation to the Maternity Protection Convention, 1952 (No. 103), because the Labour Code incorporated the Convention, in practice earlier legislation continued to impede effective guarantee of the right to maternity protection.

14. The Employers' and Workers' members observed that the choice of individual cases in the Committee of Experts' report to be discussed by the present Committee becomes more difficult both because of their increased number and because governments often supply their reports late. The Employers' members thought it would be suitable to examine if the periodicity of the reporting system should again be modified and the interval between the requests for reports increased according to the different categories of Conventions; the old Conventions, especially those which are obsolete, should be revised more rapidly than in the past; and the Committee of Experts' observations could concentrate on essentials and be presented in a more concise manner. The Government member of Ecuador agreed that the Committee of Experts' report formed the basis of the present Committee's work, but drew attention to the difficulties caused to the Conference delegations when the report is received so late that it cannot be given all due forethought.

15. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that many complaints had been made over the years that members of the Committee – especially from developing countries – receive the Committee of Experts' reports only on arrival in Geneva. He intended to make proposals to solve the problem without any increase in expenditure for either the Office or governments. He explained that some cases were not mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report every year because reports were not due every year under the automatic requesting system determined by the Governing Body: this did not mean those cases were lost or neglected, and they would be examined again when the next reports were due. Proposals to deal with this question were also under consideration. The Committee had, notwithstanding, followed up this year on many cases discussed earlier by the present Committee.

(ii) Interpretation of Conventions

16. Several members of the Committee spoke to paragraph 7 of the Committee of Experts' report, which noted the earlier suggestion in the Conference Committee that the implementation of article 37 (2) of the ILO Constitution – which empowers the Governing Body to "make and submit to the Conference for approval rules providing for the appointment of a tribunal for the expeditious determination of any dispute or question relating to the interpretation of a Convention" – should be submitted to the competent bodies of the ILO for a prior in-depth examination. The Government members of Australia, Belgium, Cameroon, France, Germany, Pakistan, the Russian Federation, Saudi Arabia, Spain, Tunisia and the United Kingdom supported the suggestion that the matter should be studied in the Organisation. The Workers' members stated that the suggestion for such a study could serve to reinforce the supervisory system. However, a tribunal should not be used to weaken the roles of the Committee of Experts or the present Committee or throw doubt on the principles and methods of the supervisory bodies. They emphasised the tripartite aspect of the ILO's standard-setting: this is a characteristic not only of the supervision of international labour standards but also of their elaboration, and it must be remembered whenever the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties is invoked as a guide to their interpretation. ILO Conventions were not like other treaties, but had some resemblance to an "international collective agreement".

17. The Employers' members referred to the position they had taken in previous years in the Committee in regard to the interpretation of Conventions (paragraphs 13, 26 and 27 of the Committee's 1991 report): under the ILO Constitution only the International Court of Justice may give a definitive interpretation of a Convention; the present Committee proceeds in an independent manner under article 7 of the Standing Orders and presents a report to the Conference; for the accomplishment of its task it uses the report of the Committee of Experts as an indispensable basis for its work; given the great quality of the report of the Committee of Experts, its opinions also have a considerable importance for the present Committee, which is nevertheless bound neither formally nor legally to follow their views, given that they have no erga omnes effect, and this was logical because the dialogue with governments and other discussions would have no purpose if it were not possible to disagree with the Committee of Experts' views; finally, only those methods of interpretation mentioned in article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties are applicable.

18. The Government member of Spain thought such a tribunal should be an ad hoc body; its members would have to be internationally recognised experts and they would need to base their work on the Vienna Convention. The Government member of Tunisia thought the study should consider the relationship between a tribunal and the existing supervisory bodies; the effect of setting up such a tribunal on the decisions of this Committee, the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association; the relationship between the tribunal and the International Court of Justice; the procedure to be followed (including, whether the Governing Body would be involved); whether it would be a court of first or of last jurisdiction; and the effect of its judgments.

19. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic was in favour of setting up an article 37 (2) tribunal. The Workers' member of Norway stated that such a tribunal should have a tripartite basis, and that it would make the ILO's supervisory machinery more complete. The Workers' member of Finland stated that until recently the established interpretations made by the Committee of Experts have been considered binding by member States until the International Court makes a final decision; however, there was now a need for a special tribunal for speedy resolution of disputes in cases such as those involving Germany or the United Kingdom, where governments did not recognise the interpretations made by the supervisory bodies – including special commissions of inquiry – but at the same time failed to appeal to the International Court of Justice. The Government member of Germany did not believe reliance on the Vienna Convention would lead to ILO Conventions losing value.

20. The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) referred to the quasi-judicial role of the Committee of Experts which allowed the present tripartite Committee to aim through its debates at encouraging member States to apply Conventions effectively rather than condemning them. In his view, establishing an article 37 (2) tribunal would accentuate the judicial character of the supervisory system and made the procedures less flexible; there would be problems if executory judgments were pronounced against governments. Conventions were the fruit of political compromise reached in a tripartite framework and should be supervised too in a tripartite manner: existing mechanisms should be improved but not weakened.

21. The Government member of Iceland, speaking on behalf of the Nordic Governments (Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden) considered it preferable to resolve problems in the spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility than to resort to an article 37 (2) tribunal. The Government members of Pakistan and Portugal emphasised the importance of dialogue between the two Committees, and if that did not resolve problems, solutions other than resort to the International Court of Justice should be sought. The Government member of the United States shared the view of the Nordic governments and considered a tribunal would be no more legally definitive than the Committee of Experts and that it could undermine the key role of the latter in the supervisory process. The Government member of Iraq considered the current machinery based on dialogue preferable to a more judicial one: if after a study it were decided to set up a tribunal, it should be competent only for interpretation and not for dispute settlement; interpretation should be a matter for legal experts, but the Committee of Experts had in certain cases gone a long way in interpreting Conventions beyond the true meaning of the actual text, which could create problems for some countries and discourage them from ratification. The Government member of Morocco doubted the need to create another body: the current system had proved its effectiveness, dominated by the spirit of pragmatism and dialogue; and the qualifications for judges of a tribunal would be the same as those for members of the Committee of Experts; in addition to which, a tribunal would risk bringing greater rigidity into the system at a time when flexibility is wanted. The Employers' member of the United States also considered dialogue preferable to implementation of article 37 (2), which he believed would lead to an alternative appeals procedure and would have the effect of diminishing the stature of the Committee of Experts. He recalled that article 37 (2) was included in the Constitution at a time when it was uncertain whether the ILO would enjoy direct access to the advisory jurisdiction of the International Court reconstituted as a United Nations organ; and the Governing Body had taken no action on the procedure because access to the Court was in fact provided for.

22. The Employers' member of the United States stated that the Committee of Experts had an expansive application of the right to strike, even though the legislative history of Convention No. 87 did not relate to it. He said that the Committee of Experts had first mentioned as an observation the right to strike being contemplated by the Convention more than a decade after the adoption of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, and in the meantime many countries had ratified them with no knowledge that the right to strike was involved. He stated that from 1960 through the 1980s the Committee of Experts had concluded that those Conventions contain an ever-widening right to strike, including sympathy, political and solidarity strikes, and that they applied a narrower and narrower definition of "essential services". He wondered at what moment evolving Committee of Experts' interpretations became "valid and generally recognised". On behalf of the Employers' members, he stated it was preferable to address these questions in the context of specific cases. It was in the interests of the Committee that the Committee of Experts should explain the basis for their decision making more clearly and listen to this Committee's concerns in "the spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility".

23. The Workers' members emphasised their support for the working methods and principles applied by the experts as a whole, including the right to strike.

24. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom observed that a State which does not agree with the Committee of Experts' views may take the matter to the International Court of Justice, but it should not expect the present Committee to contradict the Committee of Experts on points of law. The right of the present Committee to differ on interpretation does not extend to individual governments, as the standard-setting machinery could not exist in those conditions.

25. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the question of an article 37 (2) tribunal would be studied in detail by the Office and submitted in due course to the competent bodies.

(iii) Recent trends: democratisation and tripartism

26. The Committee reflected further on the continuing evolution of the international environment in which the ILO's standard-setting system functions, and the conditions affecting the observance of international labour standards in developing and industrialised countries, especially those undergoing transition to a market economy. It noted with interest the information supplied by various members as to progress made, often with ILO assistance, in revising labour legislation and establishing or enhancing tripartite practices. At the same time, it was concerned that the ILO's standards and principles should nevertheless be strenuously defended and promoted.

27. The Committee welcomed States joining the ILO, since this must strengthen the universality of the Organisation's standards. For the same reason, the Workers' members hoped the new member States which have not yet ratified Conventions would rapidly do so. They remarked that many governments of developing countries, those undergoing transition to a market economy and industrialised ones are tempted to give near absolute priority to economic progress without paying due attention to freedom of association, tripartism and the participation of all social groups: the observance of international labour standards is of primary importance for safeguarding basic rights, social justice and democracy. The Workers' member of Venezuela gave his opinion that democracy and a market economy were not one and the same thing: he wondered whether democracy was only a question of electoral procedure or whether the concept is linked to workers enjoying decent working and living conditions. The Government member of Nicaragua said that tripartism is the most appropriate means of bringing about peace and social justice, and it should operate in all areas such as vocational training, wages policy and establishing conditions of work.

28. The Employers' members considered that major political developments in the world would influence the work of the present Committee in various ways, and the current increase in ILO membership brought about not just a quantitative but a qualitative change. Many States had returned peacefully to the community of democratic States and were making efforts to introduce a market economy: this Employers regard as particularly suited to democracy and individual liberty, although there might be major difficulties during the changeover which are attributable to a former dictatorial system. Imagination, patience and assistance – and the support of the Committee – would be needed. The International Organisation of Employers had also welcomed new members. The Employers noted that individuals and enterprises had a role in taking risks and investing to assist those countries, although changing political, ideological and economic structures is not easy.

29. The Workers' members referred to the role of the ILO in relation to democratisation as discussed in the Director-General's report to the Conference. Efforts by the ILO were needed to reinforce tripartite involvement in the transition to a market economy and structural adjustment; a market economy is not in itself a guarantee of the development of democracy, but it should be accompanied by real and increasing participation by all social groups, complete social and economic democracy, tripartism and free bargaining. They considered that new divisions in countries changing to a market economy and undergoing structural adjustment must not jeopardise the principles and working methods of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. The Workers' member of Colombia said that people in developing countries face the re-establishment of the old economic order disguised as a new one, with the imposition of a neo-liberal model provoking social marginalisation and, as events show, threatening the fragile democracies of Latin America: the ILO had an important role in that respect, and the present Committee should, as the political conscience of the ILO, ensure further progress by following up the work of the Committee of Experts and promoting on-the-spot missions to establish the facts. The WFTU representative said that the slowing of ratifications, frequent insufficiency of reporting and denunciations resulted less from standards being ill-adapted to conditions than from the development of neo-liberal approaches to labour and social rights, deregulation since the 1970s, and the threat to the protection of labour rights caused by ideas of financial profitablity – all of this to the cost of full employment and social progress.

30. The Government member of Iceland speaking on behalf of the Nordic Governments observed that international political changes had had a noticeable effect on the Committee: arguments about "double standards" had subsided, enabling the Committee to carry out its work more efficiently. The Government member of Saudi Arabia in this context stressed the importance of directing dialogue with governments towards encouraging them, in particular, to ratify Conventions. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom feared that the disappearance of the East-West ideological divide might give rise to new alignments in the Committee and a new problem of different attitudes to rich and to poor countries in cases of failure to fulfil obligations under Conventions. The Workers' member of Italy stated that the end of ideological conflicts made more concrete work possible, and the supervisory machinery could now turn from an analytical to a synthetical phase, dealing with larger issues such as the maintenance of peace, internationalisation of the economy, the environment, new technology management, and North-South imbalances. As concerns social standards and technical cooperation in the field of work, the ILO should remain the privileged source of reference.

31. Several members representing governments of countries involved in the transition process informed the Committee of their experience, and in particular of assistance received from the ILO. The Government member of the Russian Federation indicated that international labour standards were, with the Office's advice, forming the basis for new labour legislation in his country; practices of tripartism and negotiation of conflicts were being turned to. He considered that further assistance from the ILO would help deal with problems of discrimination against the Russian-speaking population in certain newly independent States formerly part of the USSR. The Government member of Lithuania also referred to the creation of tripartite structures in her country and she hoped for continuing ILO technical assistance in relation to standards and reporting. The Government member of Latvia similarly described ILO assistance received in relation to standards and tripartism: his country looked to international norms as indicators for national legislation; eight of the most basic ILO Conventions had been newly ratified, and Latvia hoped for continuing help from the ILO. The Government member of Romania talked of the benefit his country had had from ILO assistance in respect of labour legislation for the democratisation of social relations.

32. The Workers' member of Italy remarked that the supervisory bodies were the pillars on which the ILO stands in order to reinforce democracy and social justice in the world. The Committee noted from the Committee of Experts' report that the highest ever number of observations had been received this year from employers' and workers' organisations, demonstrating their active interest in the supervision of standards and, as the Workers' members observed, considerably reinforcing the efficiency of all components of the supervisory system. The Government member of Uruguay informed the Committee of the contribution to economic integration in Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay made by a tripartite committee set up to deal with common labour and social questions: subject to the review of some international legal issues, the committee had, by listing certain international labour Conventions to be ratified as a minimum by those countries, established a consensus among them. The Government member of Portugal thought ratification of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), had stimulated organisations into participating in the supervisory procedures, and she emphasised the value of the Office's work, especially for promoting and strengthening national tripartite machinery.

33. The Workers' member of Spain, supported by the Workers' member of Colombia, regarded tripartism as an essential element of the ILO over the last 40 years but was concerned that the principle was in crisis in many countries, especially where, as in his country, there is no real negotiation. He appealed for genuine negotiations, where each side listens. The Workers' member of Ecuador viewed governments' neglecting reporting obligations and their denunciation of Conventions as the reflection of an attack on workers' rights, with serious consequences for their living conditions and for tripartism and democracy, especially where these are already very weak.

(iv) Reporting obligations

34. The Committee noted with concern that the proportion of reports on ratified Conventions received in time for the Committee of Experts was, at just under 70 per cent, exceptionally low this year. It recalled that the supply of reports due is an important constitutional obligation on which the supervisory system is based, and that when reports are received either late or not at all or are incomplete, the work of the Committee of Experts and the present Committee risks destabilisation. Whilst recognising that most member States fulfil their reporting obligations, the Employers' and Workers' members hoped that all governments would make greater efforts in this respect. The Workers' member of Ecuador pointed out that a government such as his own could be considered by the Committee of Experts as having complied with reporting obligations even though the only action it had taken was to refer matters to the National Congress without making effort to make the necessary adjustments to legislation. He was concerned at some governments' lack of replies to comments of the Committee of Experts.

35. The Employers' members noted the reference in paragraph 116 of the Committee of Experts' report to certain governments systematically sending their reports during the period between the end of that Committee's session and the beginning of the Conference. They iterated their proposal, supported by the Workers' members, that such governments should be named, as their conduct constitutes a rather sophisticated form of obstruction to the supervisory system. The Committee was informed by the representative of the Secretary-General that the wish to see such list in the body of the Committee of Experts' report with a view to assisting this Committee's discussions would be duly transmitted.

36. The Employers' members pointed out that the deterioration in performance of the reporting obligation coincided with a constant increase in the absolute numbers of Conventions and of reports due. It might therefore be right to re-examine the periodicity of reporting on ratified Conventions. The number of observations had also increased, as well as the size of the report – double that of ten years ago. The Workers' members called for prior consultation of this Committee before decisions were taken changing reporting obligations. They stressed that in general the new arrangements should reinforce the supervisory system as a whole and not weaken it, given that it is a dynamic system.

37. Members representing Governments of industrialised as well as developing countries (Australia, Cuba, France, Germany, Iceland (and the other Nordic countries), Iraq, Italy, Morocco, Nigeria, Pakistan, Syrian Arab Republic, United Kingdom, United States) referred to an increasing reporting burden and difficulties in meeting deadlines. The Government member of Pakistan warned of particular difficulties for federal States. The Government member of Iraq pointed to the difficulty in meeting time-limits because of having to consult various authorities and employers' and workers' organisations and obtain required information, and because of delays in correspondence with the ILO. And the Workers' member of Poland observed that the increasing numbers of comments being made by employers' and workers' organisations, while in itself encouraging, placed further pressure on the time-limits for dealing with the Committee of Experts' comments: he suggested that the Committee of Experts authorise the Office, where it received comments from organisations which had simultaneously been sent by them to the Government concerned, to invite the Government to comment immediately. The Government member of Morocco suggested sending requests for reports 12 months in advance and reducing the number of Conventions on which reports are due. Some Government members (Kenya, Pakistan, Portugal) indicated that the Office's assistance can help overcome administrative and technical difficulties. Others (Belgium, Cuba, Nigeria, United Kingdom, United States) called for further ILO consideration of the problem, with a view perhaps to staggering reporting deadlines through the year (United Kingdom), or otherwise extending deadlines (Iceland and the other Nordic countries, Syrian Arab Republic), or being more selective in reporting requirements (Australia). The Government member of France considered in this respect that account should be taken of which Conventions are formally listed by the Governing Body as priority ones; he further noted that the workload has increased also for the International Labour Standards Department and the Committee of Experts.

38. The Committee was assured by the representative of the Secretary-General that the possibility of a selective system of reporting was being examined, valuing quality over quantity. Any proposals the Office made would be submitted to the Governing Body in due course. It was demonstrated to the Committee by reference to earlier statistics that, after an initial decline in the numbers of reports requested following the introduction of changes in their periodicity, later increases meant there was in the end a worse result.

II. Principles of standard-setting

(v) Standard-setting policy

39. The Committee listened to the views of several members as to the form of future and some present ILO standards. Several speakers (the Employers' members, the Government members of Australia, Germany, Italy, the Syrian Arab Republic) considered that some older Conventions are out of date or no longer relevant and should be revised: the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95); the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96); and – so far as they have special provisions for women – the White Lead (Painting) Convention, 1921 (No. 13), the Maximum Weight Convention, 1967 (No. 127) and the Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136), according to the Government member of Australia; and the Marking of Weight (Packages Transported by Vessels) Convention, 1929 (No. 27), according to the Government member of Germany. The Government members of Australia, France, Kenya, Nicaragua and Tunisia stressed the need for Conventions to be flexible or drafted as a "framework", in order to facilitate ratification by countries at all stages of development. The Government member of Iceland, speaking on behalf of the Nordic Governments, agreed on the need for flexibility but stressed that future instruments should not be drafted so flexibly as to leave it up to ratifying States to determine whether or how to implement them. Similarly, several members of the Committee (the Government members of France, the Syrian Arab Republic, the United Kingdom) referred to the need to ensure that the principle of universality is retained in international labour standards. The Government member of Morocco stressed the need for new standards to take account of new developments. The Government members of Australia and the United States called for relaxation of the pace of standard-setting, so that Conventions adopted would have a better chance of being ratified and implemented.

40. With regard to the link between the elaboration and application of standards, the Employers' members were of the opinion that this close link should not be overlooked. A number of governments complained regarding their ability to apply Conventions. The problem was not here however but with governments voting in favour of new international instruments containing highly complex and technical standards. These governments should adopt a more coherent policy in this respect. An examination of ratifications over the past 15 years showed that the new Conventions obtained fewer ratifications. An explanation for this could perhaps be found in the complexity of these instruments.

41. The Government member of Bangladesh noted that many developing countries do not understand the need to adopt so many standards dealing with the informal sector at one extreme and highly sophisticated manufacturing and operational units at the other. There was in the current adoption procedures no guarantee of effective interaction between the Office and the member States. The vast majority of States failed to participate in the committees drawing up Conventions and Recommendations due to the inadequate size of their delegations and their lack of expertise; thus, instruments adopted did not reflect the situations in member States, and the latter would not be able to implement or ratify them. He proposed greater time for member States to interact in the adoption process; a greater breathing space particularly for developing countries before deciding whether to ratify; examination of the subjects already covered by standards, to restrain the tendency to bring new areas dealt with by national legislation within the international norms; the revision of existing standards with a view to eliminating overlapping, if necessary, rather than the adoption of more new standards; and the highlighting of flexibility in order to encourage ratification and implementation. The Government member of Australia also referred to the lack of resources in many countries to enable effective participation in the standard-setting process: this detracts from the universality of standards.

42. The Government members of France, Germany and Tunisia pointed out that some recent Conventions are unclearly drafted, partly because they represent compromises reached in the Conference. The Government member of Germany mentioned that reservations cannot be made when ratifying. However, the Workers' members considered too general standards would create problems of interpretation. It was necessary also to avoid putting off problems met with in the tripartite technical committees for solution in the present Committee. The problems of protecting workers were moreover highly complex in view of the increasing complexity of work organisation and technology. The Government member of Iceland speaking on behalf of the Nordic Governments called for the International Labour Standards Department to be represented in technical committees elaborating new standards or revising old ones; and the Government member of France wished also for the responsible technical branches of the ILO to be made more aware of the problem when the original questionnaires are drafted. The Government member of Tunisia also thought the Standards Department had an important role to play in the adoption process.

43. The WFTU representative viewed requests for the slow-down of standard-setting and for revision of standards to make them more flexible in the context of social regression resulting from international competitiveness. The Government member of the Russian Federation called for current gaps in international labour law to be filled with adoption of new Conventions and Recommendations. The report showed quite clearly that coordination on standard-setting between the ILO and the United Nations system should be reinforced. In this coordination the eminent position of the ILO in the development of international labour standards was obvious.

44. The Committee noted with interest the consideration given by the Governing Body to some preliminary suggestions as to the standard-setting system made by the Director-General. It noted that various matters would be examined further, and it hoped that the Office and the Governing Body would bear in mind the views expressed in the Committee. Preliminary consultation and cooperation with this Committee before decisions on the sending of reports would be very useful in ensuring the success of any decisions taken.

III. General aspects of the application of standards

(vi) Ratifications

45. The Committee welcomed the indication in the Committee of Experts' report that there were 58 ratifications in 1991, making a total of some 1000 new ratifications since 1980. The Government member of Saudi Arabia and the Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic stated the importance of the ILO's role in promoting and encouraging further ratifications. The Government member of Tunisia called on the Committee of Experts to make an analysis of ratifications, showing the tendencies and drawing conclusions; they should be presented by country and by Convention and a study should be undertaken of the difficulties in ratifying all Conventions, especially the human rights ones.

46. The Workers' members noted the low number of new ratifications in the Asian/Pacific Region (five in 1991) and in North America despite some recent improvements. The Workers' member of Japan regretted stagnation in the pace of ratifications. He spoke of the stress placed on ratification of Conventions by the ILO Asian Regional Conference held in Bangkok in 1991: with a few exceptions, despite the remarkable economic development there, Asian countries had a poor record in this respect, in particular relating to basic human rights Conventions such as the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The Workers' member of Finland regretted also that so few ratifications of basic human rights Conventions and those on trade union rights were registered in 1991. The Workers' member of France pointed out that large industrialised States sometimes ratify few ILO Conventions.

47. The Committee noted with interest the indications by several Government members that ratifications were envisaged or under consideration as follows: Australia (Minimum Age (Sea) Convention (Revised), 1936 (No. 58); Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92); Accommodation of Crews (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1970 (No. 133); Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135); Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141); Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151)); Belgium (Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140); Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159); Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171)); Germany (Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148); Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162); Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167)); India (Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150)); Iraq (Working Conditions (Hotels and Restaurants) Convention, 1991 (No. 172)); Italy (Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171)); Lithuania (Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81); human rights Conventions); Portugal (Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171)); Romania (Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144); Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154); Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988 (No. 168)); Russian Federation (Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144); Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154)).

(vii) Denunciations

48. The Committee took note of the indications in paragraphs 12-17 of the Committee of Experts' report, concerning in particular eight denunciations of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), not accompanied by ratification of the Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171). The Employers' members called for careful examination of the reasons behind denunciations, as conflicts may arise between the requirements of Conventions such as No. 89, which discriminated against women, and new realities. The Government member of Italy considered that Convention No. 89 maintained its importance for different situations and systems; and in this respect the Committee should relaunch debate on the relation between standards and the different contexts in which they are applied. The Workers' members were concerned also at the denunciation by Malaysia of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), in 1990, which goes against the ILO's essential values. Whilst regretting the large number of denunciations registered, the Government member of India called for greater understanding for governments compelled to change their position as national conditions evolved.

49. The Workers' members pointed to the dangers of deregulation of working conditions which, in the case of night work, might be inspired by considerations of equal treatment, but risk harming weaker groups in the labour market – especially women and those in the unorganised sector, and especially when the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), is not ratified and equal remuneration not satisfactorily guaranteed in law and practice. They feared that all the necessary tripartite consultations had not taken place in the EEC and the member States concerned. The agreement of 31 October 1991 between the European Trade Union Confederation and the organisations of employers in the private and public sectors as to an EEC consultation and bargaining model could solve and avoid problems of tripartism at the Community level. For the Workers' members, denunciation of Convention No. 89 was unnecessary in order to remedy difficulties met with by some member States. Member States could either observe Convention No. 89 as a whole or ratify its Protocol adopted by the Conference in 1990 in order to introduce greater flexibility in so far as derogations from the prohibition of night work are called for. They stressed the need for measures in aid of all workers through ratification of Convention No. 171, so as to promote the principle of equality of treatment in respect of salaries and conditions of work. They urged all States to ratify Convention No. 171.

50. The Government member of Tunisia also pointed out that Convention No. 89 could not be regarded as conflicting with the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), given amongst other things the adoption of the 1990 Protocol; measures for the protection of women were not considered discriminatory under the 1979 UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women; and it was notable that recent denunciations of Convention No. 89 had not been accompanied by any new ratifications of Convention No. 171. No one disagreed with the fact that night work causes inconveniences for workers. The Workers' member of Uganda stated that one of the main reasons given for denunciation of Convention No. 89 was the principle of sexual equality; yet the workers' representatives spoke for both sexes and had never complained that men were discriminated against under that Convention; he rejected arguments alleging discrimination under the Convention and pointed out the hardships of mothers obliged to work nights. The Government member of Kenya thought there must be some particular difficulty preventing the eight denunciations of Convention No. 89 being accompanied by ratification of No. 171, and he suggested reexamination of the matter to ensure the necessary protection.

51. Several Government members supplemented the reasons for denunciation reproduced in paragraph 13 of the Committee of Experts' report. The Government member of Cuba stated that her country had denounced Convention No. 89 after consulting workers' organisations and other interested groups; the Federation of Cuban Women also favoured denunciation; legislation protects equality of economic, social and family rights for men and women in Cuba and night work is prohibited for pregnant women. Her Government considered Convention No. 89 contrary to the principles of an employment policy based on equality. The Government member of Belgium explained why Belgium had denounced the Convention: the Minister of Employment and Labour had been led by the adoption of the ILO's night work instruments in 1990, the Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Community of 25 July 1991 and the Community Directive on the practical application of the principle of equality of treatment as between men and women in the workplace to consult the National Labour Council on the question of night work and equal opportunity. Following its opinion given on 10 February 1992, the Government decided to denounce Convention No. 89 and to initiate the procedure for ratifying No. 171 by preparing new legislation on night work and it suggested that a tripartite working party should elaborate a draft based on the principle of the prohibition of night work for women and men with exceptions based on precise criteria drawn up by the social partners. The Government member of Spain pointed out that his country was bound by Convention No. 111 and the UN Convention on discrimination against women, and it was on the basis of the Spanish Constitution that the legislation had been reviewed: workers' and employers' organisations, supported by the Women's Institute of the Ministry of Social Affairs, favoured the denunciation of Conventions which could be used to prevent the integration of women in the labour force; denunciation of Convention No. 89 was also in keeping with the EEC Directive. The Government member of Portugal mentioned also her country's ratification of Convention No. 156 concerning workers with family responsibilities; the Government had consulted employers' and workers' organisations before denouncing Convention No. 89.

52. The Government member of Morocco commented that denunciation was often incorrectly seen as a backwards step. The Government members of Germany and the United Kingdom recalled that States have the right to denounce Conventions after due consideration of changing conditions and following the established procedures, particularly in relation to consultations. The Workers' member of Finland reminded governments of the Governing Body's request for them always to give reasons when denouncing Conventions.

53. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that following discussion in the Governing Body of the question of denunciation of Convention No. 89 by certain members of the European Community the Office had been requested to prepare a document on the subject, which raised complex legal and institutional issues: the document would be made available to the Committee in due course.

54. The Workers' members also dealt with one denunciation of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96): transparency in the labour market is important for industrialised and developing countries; and the Convention allows not only the abolition but also the regulation of fee-charging agencies, which means that certain kinds of regulation of phenomena such as temporary work agencies are not necessarily excluded provided that workers' organisations at the national level agree. Total denunciation, as shown by the Committee of Experts, is not technically necessary; nor is it acceptable to the Workers' members, whether in industrialised countries under the pressure of EEC institutions, in developing countries or those in transition to a market economy. The Workers' member of Finland feared further denunciations of the Convention: his organisation was opposed to such a course, especially when application of the Convention had caused no problems.

(viii) Application of standards in particular circumstances: export-processing zones; offshore installations; "international" shipping registers

55. The Committee noted the Committee of Experts' indication (paragraphs 66-67 of its report) that it examines the application of ratified Conventions in export-processing zones and enterprises within the framework of the regular procedures. The Workers' members urged further examination of the matter, especially as regards the working conditions of young women working shifts and observance of fundamental Conventions such as those on freedom of association: the increases in numbers of zones put at risk the universal application of standards when governments operate exceptional labour legislation there. The WFTU representative also mentioned non-application of freedom of association standards in the zones. The Workers' member of Argentina pointed out that the proliferation of zones – for example, in Dominican Republic – has resulted in the disappearance of industries such as electronics in some countries.

56. The Government member of Nicaragua informed the Committee of a meeting of Ministers of Labour of Central America and Dominican Republic in April 1992, which called on the ILO Office in San José (Costa Rica) to make a study of the legislation and practice in free-trade zones. She recognised that there were abuses and labour inspection deficiencies in the zones. Responsible finance ministers had been invited to meet the labour ministers so that the encouragement of investment should not be at the cost of workers' rights, and thought had been given to drawing up a list of uniform standards for the region's zones. She hoped the ILO Area Office would be able to help and called on the Committee of Experts to make a greater contribution in future. She suggested to the Conference a Recommendation or resolution on the subject.

57. With reference to paragraphs 64-65 of the Committee of Experts' report, concerning offshore industrial installations, the Workers' members again requested particular attention to be given to problems of safety, hygiene and health for workers, who face very difficult conditions.

58. As regards the Committee of Experts' reference to a possible study of the effects of "international" registers and external ship management on seafarers' working and living conditions (paragraphs 62-63 of its report), the Employers' members thought the Committee of Experts was beginning to take a more realistic approach and the complex issues involved needed careful study before conclusions were reached. The Government member of Germany welcomed the fair position taken by the Committee of Experts. The Workers' members continued to be concerned at the problem of "social dumping" caused by "international" registers and flags of convenience.

59. The Workers' member of Argentina observed that the establishment of "international" registers and flag transfers are spreading alarmingly in developing and traditional maritime countries of the world, with a weakening effect on labour laws and Conventions. His own country had by decree made it possible to transfer to flags of convenience. The WFTU representative saw the phenomena of flags of convenience and export processing zones as evidence of the erosion of social protection by neo-liberal approaches and deregulation.

(ix) Application of particular safety and health standards

60. The Committee took note of the Committee of Experts' general observation on the application of the Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115). The Workers' members stressed the importance of the subject, given the dispersal of nuclear installations and equipment in the world and the danger to workers of radiation exposure. The observations of the Committee of Experts being well founded on technical standards and recommendations of specialist bodies, governments should fully adhere to the radiation levels prescribed, giving full weight to the Committee of Experts' observations. The Employers' members agreed on the importance of radiation protection, but they observed that the experts formulated a long introduction to the Convention and treated amongst others in paragraph 25 of this general observation a very delicate problem in comparison with the protection against radiation, relating to the restrictions of the right to strike, to which question they would come back later.

61. The Committee of Experts' general observation on the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139), calling on governments to take the necessary measures, was welcomed particularly by the Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic.

(x) Application of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100)

62. The Committee noted the Committee of Experts' recommendation (paragraph 58 of its report) that the Office should endeavour to respond further to requests for technical assistance in implementing the Convention. The Workers' members emphasised the need to ratify and apply in law and practice Convention No. 100 especially in conditions where Convention No. 89 concerning night work for women is being denounced or where the Night Work Protocol has been ratified so as to allow derogations from the prohibition on night work. The Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic supported the use of technical cooperation to implement Convention No. 100, as did the Government member of Portugal, who pointed out that a key human right is involved which all ILO members are constitutionally obligated to promote.

(xi) Freedom of association

63. The Committee noted the Committee of Experts' general observation on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which asked governments reporting on the application of the Convention to include information on particular aspects, including the right to strike and the right of lockout. The Workers' members expressed concern at violations of trade union rights. The Workers' member of Nicaragua considered that the restriction of freedom of association for economic or political reasons hinders democracy and economic and social development. The Workers' members of the Syrian Arab Republic and Uganda praised the ILO's work in this area – and especially that of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association. The Workers' members expressed concern for the future of trade union movements in Latin America. The Workers' member of France referred to efforts being made to include the right to strike expressly in a Convention, and noted that industrial relations do not evolve without conflict: well-adapted Conventions and evolving labour legislation influenced by collective bargaining would allow further social progress to be made. The WFTU representative remarked on the detriment to social and trade union rights caused by the pressure of international competition: calls for a loosening of the supervisory mechanism were exemplified by the position taken last year by Employers' members as to the right to strike; the right to strike was in fact laid down in article 8 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the Committee of Experts took into consideration general international law including universal human rights standards.

64. The Workers' member of Poland supported the Committee of Experts' request for indications as to the right to strike and the right of lockout; but, while finding that requirements and procedures for exercising the right to strike are over-regulated in Eastern Europe, he considered lockouts under-regulated. He hoped the Committee of Experts would redress the balance. He also regretted there was no mention in the general observation of the issue of redistribution of former monopoly trade unions' assets, a problem in most countries in transition to democracy, where the trade union system was being transformed into a pluralistic one. Governments should contribute to the means of independent and democratic unions in these circumstances; the concept of "acquired rights" should be no defence. He pointed to the report of the Commission of Inquiry on the complaint against Romania relating to Convention No. 111 (referred to in paragraph 20 of the Committee of Experts' report), which stated in that case that the assets of the former monopoly union should be redistributed among the new unions, and he thought the supervisory bodies' position on this point should be consistent.

65. The Government member of the United States thought that, with a view to promoting more and better dialogue among the supervisory bodies, it was not too early for the Committee of Experts to start giving thought to its 1994 General Survey on Freedom of Association. That Survey would be an especially good vehicle for providing the Conference Committee with an understanding of how the experts formulated their views on freedom of association and collective bargaining and how their views related to the conclusions of the tripartite Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body.

66. The Employers' member of the United States also referred to the forthcoming General Survey on Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and stated the experts would have the opportunity to address issues the Employers have had with respect to the Experts' interpretations regarding the right to strike. In this connection he made the further points mentioned in paragraph 22 above.

(xii) Labour inspection and enforcement of standards

67. The Committee supported the Committee of Experts' recommendations as to the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (paragraphs 55-57 of its report). The Workers' members considered that problems in the application of these Conventions are often the result of deliberate policy and a manifestation of the Government's priorities; and they particularly subscribed to the idea that employers' and workers' organisations should complement government intervention, and that the ILO's technical cooperation would help, without in any way removing responsibility from governments. The victims were often workers and employers who respect standards and the social security institutions and funds. The Government member of Portugal also agreed with the Committee of Experts' conclusions; and the Employers' members in addition emphasised the importance of labour inspection and recalled the Committee of Experts' 1985 general survey of the subject.

68. The Government members of Iraq and Syrian Arab Republic referred to the practices in their countries of carrying out inspections in cooperation with employers' and workers' representatives. The Government members of Kenya and Nigeria informed the Committee of technical cooperation received from the ILO: in the former there was a comprehensive project with resources and equipment to enhance the effectiveness of the labour inspectorate; in the latter, a tripartite mission from the ILO had enabled the evaluation of the inspection system and identification of the needs. The Workers' member of Pakistan underlined the need to extend labour inspection to agriculture, where new technologies are affecting health, safety and working conditions.

69. Referring to paragraph 135 of the Committee of Experts' report, the Employers' members considered that sanctions to ensure the application of Conventions should not be read into instruments which do not expressly provide for them. The Conventions which do not provide for these sanctions leave it up to countries and their national legislation to freely so provide and it would be inappropriate for these supervisory bodies to provide for such sanctions.

(xiii) Minimum age for employment

70. The Committee noted with concern the problems described by the Committee of Experts (paragraphs 59-61 of its report). The Government member of Cuba described child labour as an expression of extreme poverty and the absence of effective social and economic policies which amongst other things guarantee all children education despite the difficult economic situation, her own Government had placed no budgetary restriction, on education, which was considered a priority of social policy. The Workers' members too attributed the phenomenon of child labour not only to difficult economic conditions but also to political choice; they thought the ILO's interdepartmental programme would help. They highlighted the Committee of Experts' references to the wide scope of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and the policy it lays down of progressively increasing the minimum age – a point which industrialised countries too should remember; it also shows how to deal with questions of apprenticeship. Governments should provide full information on its application.

71. The Workers' member of China was concerned that the problem of child labour had worsened, and he emphasised the need for complete prohibition of child labour together with the provision of far-sighted education facilities. Legislation such as that in his own country against the employment of children under 16 should be enforced by all social sectors, including trade unions.

72. The Employers' members placed the protection of children in the context of the ILO's collaboration with other international organisations in human rights matters, and they supported the idea of concrete projects in this area. The Government member of Kenya described an ILO project which had taken place in his country under the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour in order to apply more fully Convention No. 138, which Kenya ratified in 1979.

73. The Government member of the United States pointed out that child labour often violates the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), one of the oldest, most fundamental and most widely ratified of ILO Conventions. She considered that, although it might take time to eliminate child labour, the Committee of Experts' observations on Convention No. 29 showed that more should be done to end the forced labour of children.

(xiv) Application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

74. The Committee noted the Committee of Experts' comments in paragraphs 48-54 of its report, which the great majority of members found both sober and sobering. The Workers' members remarked that the tendency towards increasing production and employment levels had not persisted, and unemployment had either gone up or stabilised at very high levels; labour market policy measures, while important, were not sufficient in themselves; economic, financial and monetary policy was still aimed at reducing inflation: it should be reoriented towards employment promotion, including internationally. Structural adjustment programmes imposed by international financial institutions or governments themselves should be the object of consultations with national organisations of employers and workers, since the social dimension – involving labour standards, education and training and health services – could not be ignored if such programmes were to be successful. The Employers' members found that the Committee of Experts had nuanced its comments more than in previous years, stating that employment policy cannot be taken in isolation: adaptation and restructuring are continuous processes in a market economy, and internationalisation and globalisation of markets requires closer and more active international cooperation.

75. The Government member of Iceland speaking on behalf of the Nordic Governments looked to the Conference Committee on Human Resources to give further guidance to the governments formulating structural adjustment policies. Several members of the Committee (the Workers' members of China, Ecuador, Pakistan and Venezuela and the Government members of Poland and Portugal) stressed the need for the ILO's values to be given greater weight in international consideration of structural adjustment; the Workers' member of Pakistan indicated that mass unemployment in the Third World has been aggravated by structural adjustment policies pursued by governments under pressure from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, and the ILO's role should be more active to attenuate their influence.

76. The Workers' members were disturbed at the widespread precarious employment in Latin America and the tendency to introduce ever greater flexibility into the legislation. The Workers' member of Ecuador noticed that in many Latin American countries of high unemployment and underemployment labour flexibility was imposed as a pretext for creating employment, although it adversely affects workers' fundamental rights to employment stability and freedom of association. The Workers' member of Venezuela also viewed the problem of employment as directly linked to workers' income-earning capacity; neo-liberal policies encouraged productivity to the detriment of employment prospects: privatisation had led to drastic workforce reductions; nor had small and medium-sized enterprises had any benefit from structural adjustment.

77. The Workers' members were equally concerned as to Africa, and they called for greater resources to be put into education, health and social institutions. Current revisions of labour codes in various countries should fully observe international labour standards. The Workers' members also stressed that serious problems persist in Asia, even though this was only briefly mentioned in the report. The Workers' member of Uganda and the Government member of Cameroon drew particular attention to the problem of compiling labour statistics in developing countries, although labour market information systems are vital to employment policy implementation. They hoped the Office and the Committee of Experts would continue to consider the matter. The Government member of India informed the Committee of special efforts made in his country in respect to statistics, including ratification of the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160). The Government member of Syrian Arab Republic pointed to employment policy measures in his country involving investment promotion and tax exemptions. The Workers' member of Iraq talked of his organisation's role in aiding workers to find jobs or providing subsidies; he mentioned also the impact of the economic embargo on both prices and unemployment in his country. The Workers' member of China hoped the ILO would give close attention to employment in his country, where, despite heavy demographic pressures, policies to reduce unemployment were being pursued. The Workers' member of Pakistan stressed the role of governments in providing infrastructure and employment to workers while at the same time respecting the role of private enterprise.

78. The Workers' members noted the absence of growth strategy in OECD countries. In the transition economies, even if reforms did comply with international standards, unemployment remains a serious problem. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom referred to unnecessarily harsh reforms in the new Eastern European democracies: although the market was a necessary mechanism for economic progress, it could not, uncontrolled and unregulated, solve problems such as high unemployment – as countries in the West had found. The Government member of the Russian Federation made mention of the growth of unemployment in his country. And the Government member of Poland described the need for development of an active employment policy in her country, with further assistance from the ILO and some other nations: she emphasised the connection between the general economic situation and the labour market situation, and the importance of stimulating the economy, creating public employment offices, financing labour market programmes, and providing facilities for self-employment.

79. As well as the Workers' members, who recalled the requirement of consultations in Convention No. 122, the Government member of Portugal shared the views of the Committee of Experts as to the importance of engaging in a broad dialogue on employment policy with the social partners, including representatives of workers in the informal and rural sectors.

80. The Government member of the United Kingdom referred to paragraph 52 of the Committee of Experts' report: he found their comments and criticisms regarding the policies of some governments on unemployment unhelpful; and he felt the Committee of Experts had over-reached itself, because it was composed of legal experts and ill-equipped to judge economic policy in this way. The Workers' members particularly regretted the, in their view, unfounded allegations made in respect of the points made by the Committee of Experts as to Convention No. 122 by the Government member of the United Kingdom, which run counter to the spirit of mutual cooperation and responsibility in the relation between the Conference and the Committee of Experts.

(xv) Submission to the competent authorities

81. The Committee referred to the indications in paragraphs 136-146 of the Committee of Experts' report as to the fulfilment of the Constitutional obligation to submit instruments adopted by the Conference to the national authorities. The Workers' members dealt with the question of submission of certain instruments by ILO member States also members of the European Community to the competent Community authorities and favoured a solution which reinforces the commitment of those States to the ILO while also fostering the development of social policy inside the EEC. They considered that the agreement on 31 October 1991 between the European Trade Union Confederation and the European employers' organisations in the public and private sectors would help resolve or avoid problems relating to tripartism and submission at the level of the Community. The Government member of Belgium indicated that his Government avoided any problem by submitting to both the national Parliament and the Community authorities; he wished for further examination of the question of the competent authorities in the European context.

IV. Other standards-related activities

(xvi) Technical cooperation relating to standards

82. The Committee strongly supported the Office in the assistance it gives to governments in the form of direct contacts, informal advisory missions, seminars, training and legislative information in order to help them fulfil their standards-related obligations. The Employers' and other members recommended reinforcing the Office's activities in this respect as much as possible; and the Workers' members considered that governments which do not fulfil reporting obligations can have little excuse, given the Office's efforts to provide technical assistance. The Government members of Latvia and Romania praised the Office's helpfulness in giving practical advice in their countries' transition period, including on the drafting of labour legislation. The Government member of India mentioned ILO assistance in his country in clarifying Conventions being considered for ratification. The Workers' member of Pakistan mentioned too assistance given to employers' and workers' organisations to enable them to contribute to the implementation of ILO standards. The Government member of Morocco referred to the importance of the translation of ILO standards into national languages. The Government member of Bangladesh suggested exploring the possibility of associating officials from member States and representatives of workers' and employers' organisations with the work of the Office and the Committee of Experts so as to contribute to the ILO's standards-related activities.

83. The Committee was informed that the International Labour Standards Department is increasing the staff and other resources devoted to promotional activities and giving technical assistance, without any effect on the Department's overall resources. This should benefit in particular countries undergoing democratisation and structural adjustment. The Department's work for the application of standards would not suffer. The Office would take full account of the Committee's proposals and concerns in relation to these and other questions as to standard-setting activities.

84. The Committee noted with interest the discussion initiated in the Governing Body by the Director-General on the dynamic interaction of standards and technical cooperation. The Workers' member of Japan stated that this Committee had long underlined the need for effective organic links between the two aspects of ILO activities, and he welcomed the Director-General's confirmation that standards must be the back-bone of the Organisation. The Government members of Belgium, Cuba, Germany and the United Kingdom agreed that there should be no "conditionality" between the observance of standards and the grant of technical cooperation: the Government member of Germany said it would be an element of discrimination against Third World countries, since industrialised countries do not receive technical assistance. At the same time, several members of the Committee (the Workers' member of Pakistan and the Government members of China, Italy, Portugal, Russian Federation, United Kingdom) stressed that the ILO's technical cooperation activities should aim more systematically to improve the implementation of the Organisation's standards. The Government member of Germany thought the ILO's Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour exemplary in this respect. The Government member of Portugal recognised the importance of the social partners participating in ILO activities in this connection. The Government member of India urged that technical cooperation should be accorded on a priority basis to countries facing the social consequences of structural adjustment or which had inherited a poverty syndrome.

85. The Workers' member of Pakistan and the Government members of Bangladesh and the Russian Federation emphasised the role of the ILO within the UN system as a whole, with particular reference to the need for coordination with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the international financial institutions. The Government member of Bangladesh called for greater resources to be found for technical cooperation, from the UNDP, from the ILO's regular budget and from bilateral sources.

(xvii) Collaboration with other international organisations, especially on human rights issues

86. The Committee noted with interest from the Committee of Experts' report (paragraphs 31-47) the attention given by the ILO to the need to work together with other international organisations for the promotion of the rights and standards falling within the ILO's terms of reference. The Workers' members and the Government member of Iceland speaking on behalf of the Nordic Governments particularly valued the ILO's involvement in preparations for the 1993 World Conference on Human Rights. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom considered that the present Committee's contribution to the World Conference would be to ensure that within its field of competence – especially where trade unionists are being killed or tortured or are disappearing – no violation of human rights would go unnoticed or uncondemned.

87. Together with the Government member of Italy, the Workers' members in addition called for closer relations with the European Community with a view to the development of the Community's social policy. The former called on the Community's Council of Ministers to adopt Convention No. 171 on night work. The Government member of Belgium stated that the Commission of the European Community had requested the Court of Justice of the Community to pronounce on the Commission's capacity to ratify ILO Conventions. The Government members of Belgium, Spain and Iceland speaking on behalf of the Nordic Governments praised the Office's role in revitalising the European Social Charter of the Council of Europe.

88. The Employers' members attached special importance to the protection of children as a matter of essential human rights, and to the ILO's role in respect of projects relating to their education, training and employment. The Workers' member of Pakistan saw these activities specifically in the context of developing countries and the implementation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

C. Reports requested under article 19 of the ILO Constitution

(i) Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

89. Following the decision of the Governing Body at its 208th (November 1978) Session, governments of States which have not ratified Convention No. 111 were asked under article 19 of the Constitution to supply reports on the effect given to the Convention. In accordance with its previous practice for these special article 19 reports, the Committee of Experts included in its general report a section (paragraphs 82-96) summarising the information received and providing its own comments.

90. The Committee noted with regret that 22 of the 40 member States requested to send reports had not done so. The Government member of Portugal declared nevertheless that the special article 19 procedure had produced good results in that there had been 14 new ratifications since it was instituted.

91. The Workers' members regarded the Convention as sufficiently flexible to take into account particular situations and encouraged all member States to ratify it. The Workers' member of Japan underscored the non-ratification of the Convention by three major industrial powers (Japan, United Kingdom, United States) and noted with regret that the Government of Japan provided no information as to any ratification prospect. The Government member of Portugal suggested that the Office could help overcome problems, for example through the "special studies" procedure alluded to by the Committee of Experts.

92. The Employers' and Workers' members and the Government members of Argentina and the Russian Federation pointed to the need to give greater attention to newly-democratic countries where there has been a resurgence of ethnic, racial, religious and cultural discrimination and conflict: the Convention was as relevant as ever in these conditions, and the ILO should give all due assistance.

(ii) Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention (No. 26) and Recommendation (No. 30), 1928; Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery (Agriculture) Convention (No. 99) and Recommendation (No. 89), 1951; Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery Convention (No. 131) and Recommendation (No. 135), 1970
